

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

B 1,014,447

GENERAL LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.

THE Hagerman Collection

OF BOOKS RELATING TO HISTORY AND POLITICAL SCIENCE

BOUGHT WITH MONEY PLACED BY JAMES J. HAGERMAN OF CLASS OF '61

IN THE HANDS OF Professor Charles Kendall Adams

IN THE YEAR
1883.

201
1721

65 231

HANSARD'S
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

THIRD SERIES:

COMMENCING WITH THE ACCESSION OF

WILLIAM IV.

42° VICTORIÆ, 1879.

VOL. CCXLVI.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM

THE NINTH DAY OF MAY 1879,

TO

THE SIXTEENTH DAY OF JUNE 1879.

Fourth Volume of the Session.

LONDON:

PUBLISHED BY CORNELIUS BUCK,

AT THE OFFICE FOR "HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,"

22, PATERNOSTER ROW. [E.C.]

1879.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TO

VOLUME CCXLVI.

THIRD SERIES.

LORDS, FRIDAY, MAY 9.

Page

CHINA—THE CHEFOO CONVENTION—Question, Observations, The Earl of Carnarvon, Lord Hammond, Lord Stanley of Alderley; Reply, The Marquess of Salisbury	1
---	---

Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Bill [H.L.]— Presented (The Lord Chancellor); read 1 ^a (No. 76)	8
---	---

COMMONS, FRIDAY, MAY 9.

QUESTIONS.

TREATY OF BERLIN—EASTERN ROUMELIA—Questions, Mr. Hanbury, Sir Alexander Gordon; Answers, Mr. Bourke	9
CRIMINAL LAW—ALLEGED CRUELTY AT HANLEY—Question, Earl Percy; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	11
DOMINION OF CANADA—FORTUNE BAY, NEWFOUNDLAND — Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Mr. Bourke	12
ARMY—COMMISSARIAT AND TRANSPORT DEPARTMENTS—RE-ORGANIZATION—Question, Sir Henry Havelock; Answer, Colonel Stanley	12
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1870—FOREIGN SHEEP—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, Lord George Hamilton	13
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—LONDON SCHOOL BOARD—MR. GEORGE POTTER—Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, Lord George Hamilton	14
TREATY OF BERLIN—THE GREEK FRONTIER—Questions, Mr. W. Cartwright, Mr. Monk, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Bourke	14
CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF EDMUND GALLEY—Questions, Sir Eardley Wilmot; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	16
PRISONS ACT—PERTH PRISON—Questions, Mr. Macdonald; Answers, Mr. Assheton Cross	16
ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—BILLETING, &c.—Question, Major Nolan; Answer, Colonel Stanley	17
THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE—Questions, Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. C. Beckett-Denison; Answers, Mr. Bourke	18
AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—EXECUTION OF PRISONERS OF WAR—Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, Mr. E. Stanhope	18

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 9.]	Page
CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL—Question, Mr. Thomson Hankey; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	19
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—Questions, The Marquess of Hartington, General Sir George Balfour, Mr. Rylands; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Assheton Cross ..	19

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
 “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

THE LAW OF DISTRESS—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,
 To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “it is desirable that the power of distraint for the rent of agricultural holdings in England, Wales, and Ireland should be abolished,”—(Mr. Blennerhassett),
 —instead thereof 20

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After long debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 202, Noes 92; Majority 110.—(Div. List, No. 84.)

Main Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—
 Motion, by leave, withdrawn:—Committee deferred till Monday next.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION (re-committed) BILL [Bill 138]—
 Bill considered in Committee [Progress 8th May] 88
 After some time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

WEST INDIA LOANS BILL—Resolution [May 8] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson); presented, and read the first time [Bill 167] 99

BANKING AND JOINT STOCK COMPANIES (No. 2) BILL—Considered in Committee:—Resolution agreed to, and reported:—Bill ordered (Dr. Cameron, Sir Andrew Lusk, Mr. Hopwood, Mr. Earp); presented, and read the first time [Bill 168] 99

LORDS, MONDAY, MAY 12.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE LATEST TELEGRAMS—Observation, Earl Cadogan 100

RACECOURSES (Metropolis) BILL (No. 45)—
Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a,”—(The Viscount Enfield) .. 100
 Amendment moved, to leave out (“now”) and add at the end of the Motion (“this day six months,”)—(The Lord St. Leonards).
 After debate, on Question, That (“now”) stand part of the Motion?
 Their Lordships divided:—Contents 84, Not-Contents 57; Majority 27.
 Division List, Contents and Not-Contents 117
Resolved in the Affirmative:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

ARMY—BRIGADE DEPÔT CENTRES—ADDRESS FOR A RETURN—
Moved, “That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for a Return showing for what number of troops the barracks at each ‘Brigade Depôt Centre’ throughout the United Kingdom are at present constructed or in course of construction,”—(The Earl of Galloway) 119
Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 12.]

Page

Workmen's Compensation Bill (No. 7)—

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read ..	119
Adjourned debate on Motion for Second Reading put off to Tuesday the 24th of June next.

METROPOLIS—GRAVEL IN THE PARKS—Question, Observations, The Duke of Rutland ; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon ..	120
--	-----

COMMONS, MONDAY, MAY 12.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN—Notice of Motion, Mr. E. Jenkins ..	121
--	-----

QUESTIONS.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—TELEGRAPH CLERKS—Question, Mr. M. Brooks ; Answer, Lord John Manners ..	121
CONSTABULARY (IRELAND) — CASE OF SUB-CONSTABLE JOYCE — Question, Major O'Beirne ; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther ..	122
AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—GENERAL ROBERTS' DESPATCH — Question, General Shute ; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope ..	122
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—SURGEON MAJOR REYNOLDS — Question, Mr. Errington ; Answer, Colonel Loyd Lindsay ..	123
ARMY—THE ZULU WAR—THE 60TH RIFLES—COURT MARTIAL—Question, Mr. French ; Answer, Colonel Loyd Lindsay ..	123
MEDICAL REFORM — Question, Mr. Errington ; Answer, Lord George Hamilton ..	124
SPAIN—LABOUR IN CUBA—Question, Mr. Errington ; Answer, Mr. Bourke ..	124
INDIA FAMINE COMMISSION—Question, General Sir George Balfour ; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope ..	125
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — BIRMINGHAM BOARD SCHOOLS—Questions, Mr. Hardcastle, Mr. Chamberlain ; Answers, Lord George Hamilton ..	125
TREATY OF BERLIN—THE BALKAN GARRISONS—Question, Mr. Baxter ; Answer, Mr. Bourke ..	127
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1870 — CATTLE FROM THE UNITED STATES—Question, Mr. Mundella ; Answer, Lord George Hamilton ..	128
INDIA—THE INDIAN BUDGET—Questions, Observations, Mr. Fawcett ; Replies, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Speaker ..	129
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—RAILWAYS—Question, Colonel Beaumont ; Answer, Colonel Loyd Lindsay ..	131
MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—SHIPPING OFFICE FEES—Question, Mr. Gourley ; Answer, Viscount Sandon ..	131
NAVY—H.M.S. "IRON DUKE"—Question, Mr. Gourley ; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith ..	131
PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN—Alteration of Motion, Mr. Dillwyn ..	132
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE LATEST TELEGRAM—Observation, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	133
INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND)—Question, Mr. W. Holms ; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson ..	133
THE NATIONAL FINANCES AND TREATIES—CONTROL OF PARLIAMENT—Question, Mr. Newdegate ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	133
PARLIAMENT—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS—Question, Mr. Mac Iver ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	134
THE METROPOLITAN BRIDGES—Question, Sir James Lawrence ; Answer, Sir James M'Garel-Hogg ..	135

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 12.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—[Progress.] (In the Committee.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

- (1.) £23,343, to complete the sum for the Patent Office, &c. ..
- (2.) £20,744, to complete the sum for the Paymaster General's Office. ..
- (3.) £8,332, to complete the sum for the Public Works Loan Commission and West India Islands Relief Commission.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 136
- (4.) £17,420, to complete the sum for the Record Office. ..
- (5.) £38,801, to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, England.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 136
- (6.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £377,088, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for Stationery, Printing, and Paper, Binding, and Printed Books for the several Departments of Government in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and some Dependencies, and for the two Houses of Parliament, and for the Salaries and Expenses of the Establishment of the Stationery Office, and the cost of Stationery Office Publications, and of the Gazette Offices; and for sundry Miscellaneous Services, including a Grant in Aid of the publication of Parliamentary Debates" .. 137
- After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £376,918, be granted, &c.,"—(Major Nolan :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
- Original Question again proposed .. 145
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £372,088, be granted, &c.,"—(Sir Patrick O'Brien :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
- After further short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (7.) £19,386, to complete the sum for the Woods, Forests, &c., Office.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 149
- (8.) £33,684, to complete the sum for the Works and Public Buildings Office.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 150
- (9.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £19,700, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services" .. 151
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £14,100, be granted, &c.,"—(Mr. Rylands :)—After short debate, Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 59, Noes 155; Majority 96.—(Div. List, No. 87.)
- Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (10.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £5,246, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer in Exchequer, Scotland, of certain Officers in Scotland, and other Charges formerly on the Hereditary Revenue" .. 155
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £5,028, be granted, &c.,"—(Sir Andrew Lusk :)—After short debate, Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 30, Noes 107; Majority 77.—(Div. List, No. 88.)
- Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (11.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £10,783, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Fishery Board in Scotland, and certain Grants in Aid of Piers or Quays" .. 159
- After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £5,783, be granted, &c.,"—(Mr. O'Donnell :)—After further debate, Question put, and negatived.
- Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (12.) £4,621, to complete the sum for the Lunacy Commission, Scotland. ..
- (13.) £5,409, to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, Scotland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 178
- (14.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £15,523, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor, and for Expenses under the Public Health and Vaccination Acts, including certain Grants in Aid of Local Taxation in Scotland" .. 180

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
[May 12.]
SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.
Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £13,323, be granted, &c."—(Mr. J. W. Barclay :)—After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
Original Question put, and agreed to .
(15.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £5,852, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries of the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other Expenses" ..	193
Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £4,290, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Edward Jenkins :)—After short debate, Question put :—The Committee divided ; Ayes 44, Noes 165; Majority 121.—(Div. List, No. 89.)
Original Question again proposed ..	201
Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £5,596, be granted, &c."—(Sir George Campbell :)—After short debate, Question put, and negatived .
Original Question again proposed ..	204
Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £5,524, be granted, &c."—(Major O'Beirne :)—After short debate, Question put :—The Committee divided ; Ayes 49, Noes 193; Majority 144.—(Div. List, No. 90.)
Original Question put, and agreed to .
Motion made, and Question proposed "That a sum, not exceeding £24,840, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in Dublin and London, and Subordinate Departments" ..	207
Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £24,440, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Whitwell :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
Original Question again proposed ..	212
Moved , "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. O'Shaughnessy :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
Original Question, by leave, withdrawn .
(16.) £13,109, to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, Ireland.
(17.) £18,596, to complete the sum for the Valuation and Boundary Survey, Ireland.
Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday .
Summary Jurisdiction Bill [Bills 69-138]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 9th May] ..	214
After some time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed . [Bill 169.]
Courts of Justice Building Act (1865) Amendment Bill —
Order for Second Reading read ..	225
After short debate, Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday .
Blind and Deaf-Mute Children (Education) Bill [Bill 93]—
Moved , "That the Bill, as amended, be now taken into Consideration,"
—(Mr. Wheelhouse)	226
Question put, and negatived .
Consideration, as amended, deferred till To-morrow .
Inclosure Provisional Order (Matterdale Common) Bill—Ordered (Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross); presented, and read the first time [Bill 171] ..	226
Inclosure Provisional Order (Redmoor and Golberdon Commons) Bill—Ordered (Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross); presented, and read the first time [Bill 172]	226
Inclosure Provisional Order (Maltby Lands) Bill—Ordered (Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross); presented, and read the first time [Bill 173] ..	227
Inclosure Provisional Order (East Stainmore Common) Bill—Ordered (Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross); presented, and read the first time [Bill 174] ..	227

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, TUESDAY, MAY 13.	Page
TREATY OF BERLIN—THE BALKAN FORTRESSES—Question, Earl Stanhope; Answer, The Marquess of Salisbury	227
Supply of Drink on Credit Bill—
Bill to consolidate and amend the enactments which relate to the Supply of Intoxicating Drinks on Credit— Presented (The Earl Stanhope) ; read 1 ^a (No. 84)	229

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MAY 13.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

City of London School Bill [Lords]—

Moved , “That the City of London School Bill be referred to a Select Committee, Three to be nominated by the House, and two by the Committee of Selection. “That all Petitions against the Bill, presented on or before the 17th instant, be referred to the Committee, and that such Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petitioners. “That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records:—That Three be the quorum,”—(Mr. Raikes)	231
Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF JOHN STANLEY—Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Sir Matthew White Ridley	231
UNCERTIFICATED LEGAL PRACTITIONERS (SCOTLAND)—Question, Mr. Fraser Mackintosh; Answer, The Lord Advocate	232
EAST INDIA (DUTIES ON COTTON GOODS) — GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT, 1858—Question, Sir William Harcourt; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	233
ARMY—THE ZULU WAR—THE 60TH RIFLES—COURT MARTIAL—Question, Mr. French; Answer, Colonel Stanley	234
SOUTH AFRICA — THE TRANSVAAL — Questions, Sir George Campbell; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	234
THE SUGAR INDUSTRIES—THE SELECT COMMITTEE—Question, Mr. Ritchie; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	235
EGYPT—FINANCIAL CHANGES—DISMISSAL OF MR. RIVERS WILSON AND M. DE BLIGNIERES—Question, Mr. E. Jenkins; Answer, Mr. Bourke	236
INDIA (FINANCE, &C.)—THE INDIAN BUDGET—Observations, Question, The Marquess of Hartington; Reply, The Chancellor of the Exchequer; Observations, Sir George Campbell	237
ARMY—VOLUNTEERING FROM THE MILITIA TO THE LINE—Question, Colonel Mure; Answer, Colonel Stanley	239
PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN—Observations, Question, Mr. Fawcett; Reply, Mr. Dillwyn	240

MOTIONS.

PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN—RESOLUTION—

Moved, “That to prevent the growing abuse by Her Majesty’s Ministers of the prerogative and influence of the Crown, and consequent augmentation of the power of the Government in enabling them, under cover of the supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign, to withdraw from the cognizance and control of this House matters

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 13.]	Page
PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN—RESOLUTION—continued.
relating to policy and expenditure properly within the scope of its powers and privileges, it is necessary that the mode and limits of the action of the prerogative should be more strictly observed,"—(Mr. Dillwyn)	242
Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "by the Constitution and Laws of this Realm, it is the right and duty of the Sovereign, with the advice of the Council, and only by that advice, or by the advice of Parliament, to direct the foreign policy of the Country, to negotiate and enter into Treaties, and to declare war or conclude a peace,"—(Lord Robert Montagu),—instead thereof.
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After long debate, Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Sir Robert Peel :)—Question put :—The House divided ; Ayes 46, Noes 347 ; Majority 301.—(Div. List, No. 91.)
Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question"	321
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Major Nolan :)—After short debate, Question put :—The House divided ; Ayes 43, Noes 307 ; Majority 264.—(Div List, No. 92.)
Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question"	324
Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. O'Sullivan :)—Motion agreed to :—Debate adjourned till Tuesday next.
UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL—Observations, The O'Connor Don ; Reply, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	325
Wormwood Scrubs Regulation Bill [Bill 96]—
Moved , "That Mr. Shaw Lefevre be a Member of the Select Committee on the Bill"	326
Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Sir Charles W. Dilke :)—Motion agreed to :—Debate adjourned till Thursday.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—REPORT—Resolutions [12th May] reported	327
After short debate, Resolutions agreed to .

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Killarney, &c.) Bill—Ordered (Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland) ; presented , and read the first time [Bill 178]	328
--	-----

EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—

Ordered, That the several Accounts and Papers which have been presented to this House in this Session of Parliament, relating to the Revenues of India, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the whole House,—(Mr. Edward Stanhope.)
Committee thereupon upon Thursday 22nd May.

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, MAY 14.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill [Bill 51]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Shaw)	329
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months,"—(Sir Sydney Waterlow .)

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 14.]

Page

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill—continued.

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question:"

—After long debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 91, Noes 263; Majority 172.—(Div. List, No. 93.)

Words added:—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to:—Second Reading put off for six months.

Salmon Fishery Law Amendment (No. 2) Bill—Ordered (Colonel Kingscote, Sir Joseph Bailey, Mr. Stafford Howard) 379

Indian Marine Bill—Ordered (Mr. Edward Stanhope, Mr. John G. Talbot); presented, and read the first time [Bill 182] 379

Common Law Procedure and Judicature Acts Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr..
Waddy, Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Ridley); presented, and read the first time [Bill 181] 379

LORDS, THURSDAY, MAY 15.

FOREIGN POLICY OF HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT—Question, Observations,
The Earl of Beaconsfield; Reply, The Duke of Argyll .. 380 PARLIAMENT—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS—Question, Earl Granville; Answer, The Earl of Beaconsfield 381
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—RE-INFORCEMENTS—Question, Lord Truro; Answer, Viscount Bury 381

Cathedral Statutes Bill (No. 4)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d,"—(The Lord Bishop of Carlisle) .. 381
After short debate, Motion and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Habitual Drunkards Bill (No. 26)—

House in Committee (according to Order) 388
Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Friday the 23rd instant; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 86.)

COMMONS, THURSDAY, MAY 15.

QUESTIONS.

COLLEGE OF SCIENCE, DUBLIN—PROFESSOR GALLOWAY—Question, Mr. Lyon
Playfair; Answer, Lord George Hamilton 391
CRIMINAL LAW—MANSLAUGHTER OF A GAME-WATCHER—THE SENTENCE—
Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross .. 392
CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—THE RE-ORGANIZATION SCHEME—Questions, Mr.
Ritchie, Mr. Pease; Answers, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson .. 393 ADMIRALTY AND WAR OFFICE REGULATION ACT—THE SECRETARIAT OF THE ADMIRALTY—Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith .. 393
PUBLIC HEALTH ACT—SUPERVISION OF SLAUGHTER-HOUSES—Question, Sir
Eardley Wilmot; Answer, Mr. Sclater-Booth 394
INTOXICATING LIQUORS (IRELAND) BILL—Question, Mr. O'Shaughnessy;
Answer, Mr. Sullivan 395
IRISH CHURCH TEMPORALITIES COMMISSIONERS—MR. BALL—Questions, Mr.
Sullivan; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer 395
POST OFFICE—AUSTRALIAN COLONIES—CONVEYANCE OF MAILS—Question,
Mr. Baxter; Answer, Lord John Manners 397
ARMY MILITARY PENSIONS—ROYAL WARRANTS, 1877, 1878—Question, Colonel Arbuthnot; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson .. 398
TREATY OF BERLIN—ARTICLE 23—Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer,
The Chancellor of the Exchequer 398

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 15.]	Page
ISLAND OF CYPRUS—ORDINANCES OF THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL—Question, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answer, Mr. Bourke	399
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—ESTIMATES OF EXPENDITURE—Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	399
THE MEDICAL BILLS—THE SELECT COMMITTEE—Question, Mr. Lyon Playfair; Answer, Lord George Hamilton	400
THE SAMOAN ISLANDS—Question, Colonel Mure; Answer, Mr. Bourke	400
THE LAW OF DISTRESS—LEGISLATION—Question, Colonel Barne; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	400
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—TEACHERS' SALARIES—Question, Mr. Sampson Lloyd; Answer, Lord George Hamilton	401
POST OFFICE, EDINBURGH—TELEGRAPH CLERKS—Question, Mr. M'Laren; Answer, Lord John Manners	401
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—ESTIMATE OF MILITARY EXPENDITURE—Question, Mr. Whitwell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	401
ARMY—THE 60TH RIFLES—COURT MARTIAL—Question, Mr. French; Answer, Colonel Stanley	402
PUBLIC WORKS LOANS COMMISSIONERS—THE REPORT—Question, General Sir George Balfour; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson	402
BLIND AND DEAF-MUTE CHILDREN (EDUCATION) BILL—Observations, Mr. Monk, Mr. Sclater-Booth	402

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—

Moved, "That the Orders of the Day subsequent to the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill be postponed until after the Notice of Motion for leave to bring in a Bill for promoting University Education in Ireland,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

After short debate, Motion agreed to.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 8th May] 407

After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MOTION.

University Education (Ireland) Bill—

Motion for Leave (The O'Conor Don) 475

After debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill to make better provision for University Education in Ireland, ordered (The O'Conor Don, Mr. Kavanagh, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Mitchell Henry, Lord Charles Beresford, Mr. Parnell); presented, and read the first time [Bill 183.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 3) Bill [Lords] [Bill 121]

Moved, "That the Bill be read a second time To-morrow, at Two of the clock" 506

Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 39, Noes 16; Majority 23.—(Div. List, No. 96.)

Hares (Ireland) Bill [Bill 165]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Richard Power) 506

Motion agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 15.]

Page

Trustees Relief Bill [Bill 145]—

Moved, "That the Bill be read a second time To-morrow, at Two of the clock,"—(Mr. Wheelhouse) 507
Second Reading deferred till To-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS—

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, the sum of £6,694,816 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

Metropolis (Whitechapel and Limehouse) Improvement Scheme Amendment Bill—Ordered (Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross); presented, and read the first time [Bill 184]

.. .. . 508

LORDS, FRIDAY, MAY 16.

FOREIGN POLICY OF HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT—Observations, The Duke of Argyll; Reply, The Earl of Beaconsfield:—Debate thereon 508

COMMONS, FRIDAY, MAY 16.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Belfast Water Bill (by Order)—

Order for Consideration, as amended, read 566
 Bill, as amended, considered; to be read the third time.

QUESTIONS.

TREATY OF BERLIN—EXECUTION OF ARTICLES—Question, Sir William Harcourt; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer 567
 THE RAILWAY COMMISSION—PROLONGATION OF POWERS—Question, Mr. J. W. Barclay; Answer, Viscount Sandon 569
 OPEN SPACES (METROPOLIS)—Question, Mr. W. H. James; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross 569
 LLOYDS' PATRIOTIC FUND—Question, Sir Henry Havelock; Answer, Lord George Hamilton 570

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 15th May] 571
 After long time spent therein, it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

■ The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 16.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—:0:—

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

BREWERS’ LICENCES—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the nature and incidence of the Tax upon Brewers’ Licences,”—(Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen),—instead thereof

616

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 115, Noes 53; Majority 62.—(Div. List, No. 99.)

Main Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”
—Motion, by leave, withdrawn:—Committee deferred till Monday next.

Noxious Gases Bill [Bill 123]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Solater-Booth)

644

Moved, “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Sir Henry James):—
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Debate adjourned till Monday next.

Wormwood Scrubs Regulation Bill [Bill 96]—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [13th May]:— Question again proposed:—Debate resumed

648

Question put, and agreed to:—Mr. Gordon, Colonel Kingscote, and Colonel Lloyd Lindsay nominated other Members of the Committee.

Medical Act (1858) Amendment Bill [Bill 2]—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [12th March], “That the Bill be now read a second time:”—And which Amendment was, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months,”—(Mr. Serjeant Simon):—Question again proposed:—Debate resumed

648

Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed to the Select Committee on Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 3) Bill [Lords].

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]—

Order for Committee read:—Moved, “That this House will, upon Tuesday next at Two of the clock, resolve itself into the said Committee,”— (Colonel Stanley)

649

After short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 92, Noes
15; Majority 77.—(Div. List, No. 100.)

Hypothec Abolition (Scotland) Bill [Bill 119]—

Order for Consideration, as amended, read 650
Consideration, as amended, deferred till Friday next.

Dispensaries (Ireland) Bill [Bill 66]—

Bill considered in Committee 650
Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 16.]

Page

Licensing Laws Amendment Bill [Bill 25]—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [17th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time :"—
And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months," —(Sir Harcourt Johnstone :)—Question again proposed :—Debate resumed 651 Question put :—The House divided ; Ayes 48, Noes 30 ; Majority 18.—
(Div. List, No. 101.)
Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday next.

WAYS AND MEANS—

Resolution [May 15] reported, and agreed to :—Ordered, That a Bill be brought in upon the said Resolution ; and that Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson do prepare and bring it in. Bill presented, and read the first time.

M O T I O N S .

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACTS [SALARIES, &C.]—

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the extension of the provisions of the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts 1873, and 1875, relating to the salaries and pensions of puisne Judges of the High Court of Justice, and of the officers attached to their persons, to any additional Judge who may be appointed under the provisions of any Act of the present Session for amending the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

VOLUNTEER CORPS (IRELAND) [PAY AND ALLOWANCES, &C.]—

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of Pay and Allowances, Half Pay, and Pensions to Members of the Volunteer Force, and of pensions to their widows ; also of allowances to Clerks of general meetings of Lieutenancy in Ireland, which may become payable under the provisions of any Act of the present Session, to authorise the enrolment of Volunteer Corps in Ireland.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING ACT (1865) AMENDMENT [EXPENSES]—

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of any Expenses which may be incurred in keeping order in, cleaning, and in the management and use of, the Royal Courts of Justice, under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to amend "The Courts of Justice Building Act, 1865."

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Dorset, &c.) Bill—Ordered

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Selater-Booth) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 186] .. 653

Local Government Highways Provisional Orders (Gloucester and Hereford)

Bill—Ordered (Mr. Salt, Mr. Selater-Booth) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 185] 653

Tramways Orders Confirmation Bill—Ordered (Mr. John G. Talbot, Viscount Sandon) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 187] .. 653

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, MONDAY, MAY 19.

	Page
TREATY OF BERLIN—THE GREEK FRONTIER—Question, Observations, The Earl of Morley; Reply, The Marquess of Salisbury	654
AFGHANISTAN—THE PEACE NEGOTIATIONS—Observation, Viscount Cranbrook	655

TREATY OF BERLIN, ARTICLE 22—OCCUPATION OF BULGARIA AND EASTERN ROUMELIA—MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE—

Moved , "That the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and other Powers on Article 22 of the Treaty of Berlin be laid upon the Table,"—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell)	655
After short debate, Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn .

LANDED ESTATES COURT (IRELAND)—MOTION FOR RETURNS—

Moved, for, I. Return (in continuation of No. 238, 1876,) showing (1) in Provinces, and (2) in Counties, the Landed Estates held either in fee, fee farm, for lives renewable for ever, or for terms of years of which sixty shall have been unexpired, sold in one or more lots in the Landed Estates Court for each of the years ending respectively 31st December 1876, 1877, and 1878, giving the following particulars in each of the foregoing periods:

- (3) The name of the estate;
- (4) The cost of sale;
- (5) The tenure of each lot;
- (6) The number of each lot;
- (7) The acreage (statute measure) of each lot;
- (8) The profit rent;
- (9) The Poor Law valuation of each lot as set out in the rental filed in the Landed Estates Court;
- (10) The amount of purchase money;
- (11) The number of years purchase:

II. Return, in Provinces and Counties, of Estates sold during the years 1876, 1877, and 1878 in one or more lots in the Landed Estates Court under Part III. of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, in which charging orders have been made in favour of the Board of Works, giving in each case the same particulars as in Return No. I.—(The Duke of Argyll.)

Motion agreed to :—Returns ordered to be laid before the House.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE RE-INFORCEMENTS—CONDITION OF THE REGIMENTS—Observations, Lord Truro, Viscount Hardinge; Reply, Viscount Bury :—Short debate thereon	666
---	-----

COMMONS, MONDAY, MAY 19.

QUESTIONS.

PERSIA—RETIREMENT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER—Question, General Sir George Balfour; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	685
PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT, SEC. 27—THE PRISONS BOARD—MEDICAL OFFICERS—Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	685
IRELAND—RELIGIOUS DISTURBANCES AT OMEY ISLAND, COUNTY GALWAY—Questions, Observations, Mr. Errington, Mr. Macartney, Mr. O'Donnell; Replies, Mr. Speaker, Mr. J. Lowther	686
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Mitchell Henry :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
POST OFFICE—THE NEW INTERNATIONAL POST CARD—Questions, Mr. Sullivan; Answers, Lord John Manners	692
SCOTLAND—RELIGIOUS DISTURBANCES AT DUNDEE—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, The Lord Advocate	693
INDIA—THE FOUR AND A HALF PER CENT LOAN ALLOTMENT—Question, Sir Charles Mills; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope	694

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 12.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—[Progress.] (In the Committee.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

- (1.) £23,343, to complete the sum for the Patent Office, &c. ..
- (2.) £20,744, to complete the sum for the Paymaster General's Office. ..
- (3.) £8,332, to complete the sum for the Public Works Loan Commission and West India Islands Relief Commission.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 136
- (4.) £17,420, to complete the sum for the Record Office. ..
- (5.) £38,801, to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, England.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 136
- (6.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £377,088, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for Stationery, Printing, and Paper, Binding, and Printed Books for the several Departments of Government in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and some Dependencies, and for the two Houses of Parliament, and for the Salaries and Expenses of the Establishment of the Stationery Office, and the cost of Stationery Office Publications, and of the Gazette Offices; and for sundry Miscellaneous Services, including a Grant in Aid of the publication of Parliamentary Debates" .. 137
- After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £376,918, be granted, &c."—(Major Nolan :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
- Original Question again proposed .. 145
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £372,088, be granted, &c."—(Sir Patrick O'Brien :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
- After further short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (7.) £19,388, to complete the sum for the Woods, Forests, &c., Office.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 149
- (8.) £33,684, to complete the sum for the Works and Public Buildings Office.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 150
- (9.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £19,700, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services" .. 151
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £14,100, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Rylands :)—After short debate, Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 59, Noes 155; Majority 96.—(Div. List, No. 87.)
- Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (10.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £5,246, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer in Exchequer, Scotland, of certain Officers in Scotland, and other Charges formerly on the Hereditary Revenue" .. 155
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £5,028, be granted, &c."—(Sir Andrew Lusk :)—After short debate, Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 30, Noes 107; Majority 77.—(Div. List, No. 88.)
- Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (11.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £10,783, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Fishery Board in Scotland, and certain Grants in Aid of Piers or Quays" .. 159
- After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £5,783, be granted, &c."—(Mr. O'Donnell :)—After further debate, Question put, and negatived.
- Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (12.) £4,621, to complete the sum for the Lunacy Commission, Scotland. ..
- (13.) £5,409, to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, Scotland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 178
- (14.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £15,523, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor, and for Expenses under the Public Health and Vaccination Acts, including certain Grants in Aid of Local Taxation in Scotland" .. 180

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 19.]

Page

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.

- will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Police Courts of London and Sheerness" 716
 Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £1,763, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Chamberlain :)—After short debate, Question put :—The Committee divided : Ayes 38, Noes 74; Majority 36.—(Div. List, No. 103.)
 Original Question put, and agreed to.
 (13.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £352,800, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for contribution towards the Expenses of the Metropolitan Police, and of the Horse Patrol and Thames Police, and for the Salaries of the Commissioner, Assistant Commissioners, and Receiver" 725
 Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £252,800, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Chamberlain :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
 Original Question put, and agreed to.
 (14.) £890,148, to complete the sum for Police, Counties and Boroughs (Great Britain.)
 —After debate, Vote agreed to 729
 (15.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £359,126, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the superintendence of Convict Establishments, and for the Maintenance of Convicts in Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies" 743
 After short debate, Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Parnell :)—Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
 After further short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

Customs and Inland Revenue Bill [Bill 150]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) 756

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will not recognize or accept as binding any Treaty or other engagements entered into by Her Majesty's Ministers which might forestall or limit the control of this House over the financial resources and taxation of this Country, until full information as to such contemplated engagements has been laid upon the Table of this House, and this House shall have had the opportunity of expressing an opinion thereon,"—(Mr. Newdegate,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Valuation of Lands and Assessments (Scotland) Bill [Bill 144]

Bill considered in Committee 783
 After short time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

Great Seal Bill [Lords] [Bill 180]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Attorney General) 788
 After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

Indian Marine Bill [Bill 182]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Edward Stanhope) 791 Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Whitwell :)—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Debate adjourned till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, TUESDAY, MAY 13.	Page
TREATY OF BERLIN—THE BALKAN FORTRESSES—Question, Earl Stanhope;
Answer, The Marquess of Salisbury	227
Supply of Drink on Credit Bill—
Bill to consolidate and amend the enactments which relate to the Supply of Intoxicating Drinks on Credit— Presented (The Earl Stanhope) ; read 1 ^a (No. 84)	229

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MAY 13.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

City of London School Bill [Lords]—

- Moved*, "That the City of London School Bill be referred to a Select Committee, Three to be nominated by the House, and two by the Committee of Selection.
- "That all Petitions against the Bill, presented on or before the 17th instant, be referred to the Committee, and that such Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petitioners.
- "That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records:—That Three be the quorum,"—(Mr. Raikes) 231
- Motion agreed to.*

QUESTIONS.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF JOHN STANLEY—Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor;
Answer, Sir Matthew White Ridley	231
UNCERTIFICATED LEGAL PRACTITIONERS (SCOTLAND)—Question, Mr. Fraser
Mackintosh; Answer, The Lord Advocate	232
EAST INDIA (DUTIES ON COTTON GOODS) — GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT, 1858—Question, Sir William Harcourt; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	233
ARMY—THE ZULU WAR—THE 60TH RIFLES—COURT MARTIAL—Question,
Mr. French; Answer, Colonel Stanley	234
SOUTH AFRICA — THE TRANSVAAL — Questions, Sir George Campbell;
Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	234
THE SUGAR INDUSTRIES—THE SELECT COMMITTEE—Question, Mr. Ritchie;
Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	235
EGYPT—FINANCIAL CHANGES—DISMISSAL OF MR. RIVERS WILSON AND M.
DE BLIGNIERES—Question, Mr. E. Jenkins; Answer, Mr. Bourke	236
INDIA (FINANCE, &c.)—THE INDIAN BUDGET—Observations, Question, The Marquess of Hartington; Reply, The Chancellor of the Exchequer;
Observations, Sir George Campbell	237
ARMY—VOLUNTEERING FROM THE MILITIA TO THE LINE—Question, Colonel
Mure; Answer, Colonel Stanley	239
PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN—Observations, Question, Mr. Fawcett; Reply,
Mr. Dillwyn	240

MOTIONS.

PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN—RESOLUTION—

- Moved*, "That to prevent the growing abuse by Her Majesty's Ministers of the prerogative and influence of the Crown, and consequent augmentation of the power of the Government in enabling them, under cover of the supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign, to withdraw from the cognizance and control of this House matters

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 20.]	Page
ARMY—COURT OF INQUIRY AT NETLEY IN 1873—Questions, Sir Alexander Gordon; Answers, Colonel Stanley	837
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—TRANSPORT SERVICE IN NATAL—Questions, Mr. W. H. James; Answers, Colonel Stanley ..	838
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—DEBATE ON THE INDIAN BUDGET—Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	839

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 16th May]	840
After long time spent therein, it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again upon Thursday .
Customs and Inland Revenue Bill [Bill 150]— Order for Committee read	887
Resolution [5th May] read, as followeth :— “That it is expedient to amend the Laws relating to the Customs and Inland Revenue.” Instruction to the Committee on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, That they have power to make provision therein pursuant to the said Resolution. Bill considered in Committee. Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday . The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock. The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTIONS.

PROBATE, LEGACY, AND SUCCESSION DUTIES—RESOLUTION— Moved , “That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that in lieu of Probate and Administration Duty, which is now payable according to unequal rates, upon the personal estate of deceased persons, and in lieu of Legacy Duty, which is now payable at various rates and various times in respect of each separate gift by will, and each separate share of an intestate’s estate, one Duty only should be levied, at a uniform rate, upon the value of the personal estate of every deceased person,”—(Mr. Dodds)	887
Amendment proposed, To leave out from the word “expedient” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “to reconsider and revise the progressive rates of Probate and Administration Duty, and to afford greater facilities for the assessment and settlement of Legacy and Succession Duties upon future or contingent events, and for the relief of executors, administrators, and trustees in respect of the same,”—(Mr. Gregory),—instead thereof.
Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :”—After debate, Question put :—The House divided ; Ayes 59, Noes 131 ; Majority 72.—(Div. List, No. 105.) Words added :—Main Question, as amended, put :—The House divided ; Ayes 131, Noes 24; Majority 107.—(Div. List, No. 106.) Resolved , That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to reconsider and revise the progressive rates of Probate and Administration Duty, and to afford greater facilities for the assessment and settlement of Legacy and Succession Duties upon future or contingent events, and for the relief of executors, administrators, and trustees in respect of the same.
SUGAR INDUSTRIES— Moved , “That the Select Committee do consist of 17 Members,”—(Mr. Ritchie)	925
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to :—List of the Committee	929
VOL. CCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.] [d]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, MAY 21.	Page
Committees—
Ordered , That Committees shall not sit To-morrow, being Ascension Day, until Two of the clock, and have leave to sit until Six of the clock, notwithstanding the sitting of the House,—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)	930

ORDER OF THE DAY.

University Education (Ireland) Bill [Bill 183]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time," — (The O'Conor Don)	930
Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "while this House recognises that the funds set free by the disestablishment of the Irish Church should be devoted to the benefit of the people of Ireland, provided they are not again applied to the support of any sectarian religion, it is not desirable to devote additional public funds to the further promotion of higher education in Ireland till adequate provision is first made for elementary teaching in that Country without aid from Imperial funds exceeding that given to other parts of the United Kingdom,"—(Sir George Campbell),—instead thereof.
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After long debate, Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Synan :)—After further short debate, Motion agreed to :—Debate adjourned till To-morrow .

Entail (Scotland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. James Barclay, Mr. Mackintosh) : presented , and read the first time [Bill 193]	1003
--	------

COMMONS, THURSDAY, MAY 22.

QUESTIONS.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—"KAIN v. FARMER"—Question, Mr. Mac Iver ; Answer, Viscount Sandon	1003
CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—THE DUNGARVAN MAGISTRATES—Questions, Mr. O'Donnell ; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	1004
CONGRESS OF BERLIN—THE GREEK FRONTIER—Question, Mr. Laing ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1005
PATENTS—THE PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS BILL—Questions, Mr. B. Samuelson ; Answer, The Attorney General	1006
ARMY—BALANCES OF DECEASED SOLDIERS—Question, Major O'Beirne ; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1006
ARMY—VETERINARY WARRANT OF MAY 1, 1878—Question, Colonel Arbuthnot ; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1007
POST OFFICE—THE CHINA MAILS—Question, Mr. Dalrymple ; Answer, Lord John Manners	1007
CONSPIRACY AND PROTECTION OF PROPERTY ACT, 1875—"BESETTING"—Question, Mr. Burt ; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	1007
SOUTH AFRICA—THE FORCES IN ZULULAND—Questions, Mr. Waddy ; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1008
INDIA—THE DISTURBANCES IN BOMBAY—Question, Mr. Hanbury ; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope	1008
ARMY—REGIMENTAL COMMANDS—THE FIVE YEARS' RULE—Question, Major Nolan ; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1010
ARMY—CIVIL EMPLOYMENT FOR DISCHARGED SOLDIERS—Question, Sir Henry Havelock ; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1010
ARMY—THE 88TH REGIMENT—VOLUNTEERS—Questions, Sir Henry Havelock ; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1011

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 22.]	Page
ARMY—FIRST-CLASS ARMY RESERVE—Question, Colonel Mure; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1012
LUNACY LAWS — LEGISLATION — Question, Mr. Dillwyn; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross ..	1012
MALTA—THE MALTESE CIVIL SERVICE—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	1013
EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1878—EXAMINATION OF HIGH CLASS SCHOOLS —Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, Lord George Hamilton ..	1013
WESTMINSTER IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS—Question, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Answer, Mr. Gerard Noel ..	1014
BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)—CARRICK-ON-SUIR BRIDGE —Question, Mr. A. Moore; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther ..	1014
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—ALLEGED CRUELITIES—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	1015
SOUTH AFRICA — INDENTURE OF NATIVES IN NATAL — Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	1016
ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACTS — THE BUCKINGHAM SCHOOL BOARD — Question, Mr. E. Hubbard; Answer, Lord George Hamilton ..	1017
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE RE-INFORCEMENTS—Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1018
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE ROYAL MARINES—Questions, Mr. Otway, Mr. Rylands, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answers, Mr. W. H. Smith, Colonel Stanley ..	1018
THE STATE OF TRADE—STATEMENT OF THE PRIME MINISTER—Question, Observations, Mr. Mac Iver; Reply, Mr. Speaker ..	1019
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Mac Iver :)—Question put, and negatived .
PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL— Question, Observations, The O'Connor Don; Reply, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1020
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Shaw :)—After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
QUESTIONS—RULES AND ORDERS OF THE HOUSE—RULE 153—THE "HOME RULE PARTY"—Question, Sir Julian Goldsmid ..	1040

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

INDIA—EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—FINANCIAL STATEMENT—
Order for Committee read :— Moved , "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	1040
Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, regarding with apprehension the present state of Indian Finance, approves the decision to reduce Expenditure,"—(Mr. Fawcett :)—instead thereof.
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn .
Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :"—
Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Sir George Campbell :)— Motion agreed to :—Debate adjourned till To-morrow .
Summary Jurisdiction Bill [Bill 136]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration,"—(Mr. Secretary Cross) ..	1093

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 22.]

Page

Summary Jurisdiction Bill—continued.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, compensation should be made to clerks of the peace, now paid by fees, for the diminution of their incomes which will be caused by the provisions of this Bill,"—(Mr. Morgan Lloyd,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration," put, and agreed to :—Bill, as amended, considered.

Further Amendments made :—Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.

GREAT SEAL [SALARY]—

Order for Committee read :—Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) 1109

After short debate, Question put :—The House divided; Ayes 22, Noes 13; Majority 9.—(Div List, No. 108.)

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Matter considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of additional Salary to any Officer which may become payable under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to amend the Law respecting the manner of passing Grants under the Great Seal, and respecting Officers connected therewith.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

Costs Taxation (House of Commons) Bill [Bill 190]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Raikes) .. 1109

Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

LORDS, FRIDAY, MAY 23.

Children's Dangerous Performances Bill (No. 64)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Earl De La Warr) .. 1110

After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

THE METROPOLITAN WATER SUPPLY AND FIRE BRIGADE—REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR PAPERS—

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Correspondence between the Society of Arts and the Secretary of State for the Home Department respecting the Water Supply of the Metropolis,"—(The Earl Granville) .. 1113

After short debate, Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENT—STANDING ORDERS Nos. 95 AND 96—Observations, Lord Waveney; Reply, The Lord Chancellor 1128

Statute Law Revision (Ireland) Bill (No. 80)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Chancellor) .. 1133

Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, FRIDAY, MAY 23.

Page

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Thames River (Prevention of Floods) Bill—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a third time,"—(Sir James M'Garel Hogg) .. 1134
 After short debate, Motion agreed to (Prince of Wales's Consent, as Duke of Cornwall, signified):—Bill read the third time, and passed.

QUESTIONS.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND) ACT—LOANS FOR PAVING WORKS IN DUBLIN— Question, Mr. M. Brooks; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther ..	1135
ARMY—THE WARRANT OF AUGUST 13, 1877—SUPERSESSION OF GENERAL OFFICERS—Question, Colonel North; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope ..	1136
THE PATRIOTIC FUND—POWERS OF COMMISSIONERS—Question, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1136
MINE INSPECTORS' REPORTS—Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross ..	1137
ROYAL COMMISSION ON ACCIDENTS IN MINES—EXCLUSION OF THE PRESS AND CONSTITUTION OF THE COMMISSION—Questions, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross ..	1137
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—LORD CHELMSFORD'S DESPATCHES— Question, Sir Alexander Gordon; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1139
IRISH PRISONS BOARD—INFIRMARY SURGEONS—Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther ..	1139
"GENERAL STATISTICAL ABSTRACT"—FOREIGN TARIFFS ON BRITISH PRODUCE—Questions, Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. John Bright; Answers, Viscount Sandon ..	1140
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—RE-INFORCEMENTS FROM INDIA— Question, Mr. Rylands; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1141
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—Questions, Mr. Monk, Mr. Newde- gate, Mr. Dillwyn; Answers, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1141

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—

THE BRITISH INDIAN ASSOCIATION—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,
 To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House regrets that Lord Lytton and his advisers have shown such unwise disrespect for the sentiments of a vast population, which is at the same time deprived of all constitutional representation, and subject to a harsh and grinding taxation of the most oppressive kind,"—(Mr. O'Donnell),—instead thereof .. 1142 Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 215, Noes 36; Majority 179.—(Div. List, No. 109.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—

THE NETTERVILLE TRUST PROPERTY—THE LOUTH INSTITUTION—Observations, Mr. Kirk; Reply, The Attorney General for Ireland:—Short debate thereon .. 1146

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn:—Committee deferred till Monday next.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
[May 23.]
INDIA — EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS — FINANCIAL STATEMENT — AD- JOURNED DEBATE [SECOND NIGHT]—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [22nd May]:—
Question again proposed:—Debate resumed ..	1160
After long debate, Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"— (Mr. J. K. Cross):—After further short debate, Motion agreed to :— Debate further adjourned till Thursday , 12th June.
 EAST INDIA [LOAN]—
Considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)
Moved , "That it is expedient to authorise the Secretary of State in Council of India to raise in the United Kingdom any sum or sums of money, not exceeding £10,000,000, for the service of the Government of India, on the security of the Revenues of India,"—(Mr. E. Stanhope)	1199
Amendment proposed, to leave out "£10,000,000," in order to insert "£5,000,000,"—(Mr. Edward Stanhope),—instead thereof.
Question proposed, "That '£10,000,000' stand part of the proposed Resolution:"—After short debate, Question put, and negatived .
Question, "That '£5,000,000' be inserted, instead thereof," put, and agreed to .
Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to .
Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.
 INTOXICATING LIQUORS (IRELAND) BILL—THE ADJOURNED DEBATE—Observa- tions, Mr. Callan, Mr. Speaker
	1201
 Common Law Procedure and Judicature Acts Amendment Bill [Bill 181]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Waddy) ..	1201
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and com- mitted for Monday 9th June.
 Costs Taxation (House of Commons) Bill [Bill 190]—
Order for Committee read:— Moved , "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Raikes)	1202
Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. James):—After short debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 21, Noes 41; Majority 20.—(Div. List, No. 110.)
Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to :—Bill considered in Committee, and reported , without Amend- ment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.
 <hr style="width: 10%; margin: 10px auto;"/>
Barristers (Ireland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Callan, Mr. Patrick Martin, Mr. King-Harman); presented , and read the first time [Bill 194]	1203
Registration of Parliamentary Voters (Ireland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Callan, Mr. Maurice Brooks, Major Nolan); presented , and read the first time [Bill 195] ..	1204

LORDS, MONDAY, MAY 26.

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—SIGNATURE OF A TREATY OF PEACE—Observation, Viscount Cranbrook	1204
SOUTH AFRICA—NATAL AND THE TRANSVAAL—APPOINTMENT OF SIR GARNET WOLSELEY AS HIGH COMMISSIONER—Statement, The Earl of Beacons- field; Question, The Earl of Kimberley; Answer, The Earl of Beacons- field	1204

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 26.]

Page

ARMY—THE BRIGADE DEPÔT SYSTEM—RESOLUTIONS—

Moved to resolve—

- "1. That the military system of brigade depôts or sub-districts introduced in the year 1872 has proved a source of expense to this country incommensurate with its general results, and that steps should therefore be taken for their gradual absorption or diminution in number.
- "2. That the present state of our military organisation is a source of immediate anxiety quite irrespective of the extreme youth of the regular forces of the Army occasioned by enlistment for short service; and that in view of the various reports on the subject of the several Committees already appointed by successive Secretaries of State for War, this House hears with concern the intimation that Her Majesty's Government are unprepared with any remedial measures without the preliminary investigation of a further additional Committee,"—(The Earl of Galloway.)

After short debate, Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

Consolidated Fund (No. 3) Bill—

Read 2^a (according to order); Committee negatived; Then Standing Orders Nos. XXXVII. and XXXVIII. considered (according to order), and dispensed with; Bill read 3^a, and passed.

COMMONS, MONDAY, MAY 26.

P E T I T I O N.

AFGHANISTAN (EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS)—INCIDENCE OF EXPENDITURE—Petition presented (Mr. Gladstone) 1226

Q U E S T I O N S.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE CIVIL AND MILITARY COMMANDS—Statement, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Question, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1227
AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS—THE CORN RETURNS—Question, Mr. Clare Read; Answer, Viscount Sandon ..	1227
RIBBONISM (IRELAND)—Questions, Mr. Verner, Mr. Mitchell Henry, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther ..	1228
POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—FEMALE CLERKS—Question, Mr. Chamberlain; Answer, Lord John Manners ..	1230
IRISH CHURCH MISSION—DISTRIBUTION OF TRACTS—Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther, The Attorney General for Ireland ..	1230
PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS—HADDINGTON BURGHS—Question, Mr. Hopwood; Answer, The Lord Advocate ..	1232
AFRICA (WEST COAST)—TREATIES WITH NATIVE CHIEFS—Question, Mr. Ashbury; Answer, Mr. Bourke ..	1233
AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—GENERAL ROBERTS' SUPPLEMENTARY DESPATCH—Question, General Shute; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope ..	1233
EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) ACT—BARVAS (ISLAND OF LEWIS) SCHOOL BOARD—Question, Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; Answer, The Lord Advocate ..	1234
FIJI—EXECUTION OF NATIVE PRISONERS—ALLEGED BARBARITIES—Question, Mr. A. Moore; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	1234
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—OVERTURES OF PEACE—Question, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	1235
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BLESSINGTON DISPENSARY (NAAS UNION) MEDICAL OFFICER—Question, Mr. Parnell; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther ..	1236
SOUTH AFRICA—(EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS)—ESTIMATE OF EXPENDITURE—Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1237

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 26.]	Page
TURKEY—THE ANGLO-TURKISH CONVENTION—CONSULAR APPOINTMENTS IN ASIA MINOR—Question, Mr. J. Holms; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson	1237
FRANCE—PROLONGATION OF THE TREATY OF COMMERCE—Question, Mr. W. Cartwright; Answer, Mr. Bourke	1238
TURKEY—ANTI-SLAVE TRADE TREATY—Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, Mr. Bourke	1238
CRIMINAL CODE (INDICTABLE OFFENCES) BILL—REPEAL OF STATUTES—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The Attorney General	1238
PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING—RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE—Question, Mr. Chamberlain; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1239
PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1240
SOUTH AFRICA—EGYPT—FURTHER PAPERS—Questions, The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Chamberlain; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1240
SOUTH AFRICA—THE CIVIL AND MILITARY COMMANDS—Explanation, Sir Robert Peel	1241
Moved, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Sullivan:)—After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL—Notice of Amendment to Motion, Mr. O'Donnell; Observation, Mr. Speaker	1265
AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—SIGNATURE OF A TREATY OF PEACE—Observations, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1266

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o:—

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES [Progress.] (In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

- (1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £339,680, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Commissioners and other Officers appointed under the 6th and 7th Sections of the Prison Act, 1877, and the Expenses of the several Prisons in England and Wales to which that Act applies" 1266
 After debate, Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Parnell:)—After further debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
 Original Question again proposed 1287
 After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item for Pay and Allowances of Officers, including Uniform, be reduced by the sum of £75,000,"—(Mr. Parnell:)—After further short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided:—Ayes 24, Noes 120; Majority 96.—(Div. List, No. 111.)
 Original Question again proposed 1295
 After debate, Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. O'Connor Power:)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
 Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (2.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a further sum, not exceeding £1,101,400, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge for the following Civil Services and Revenue Departments for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, viz.:—[Then the several Services are set forth] 1322 Moved, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. O'Connor Power:)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
 Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock; Committee to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 26.]

Page

EAST INDIA [LOAN]—

Resolution [May 23] reported .. 1325
 After short debate, Resolution agreed to:—Bill ordered (Mr. Raikes, Mr. Edward Stanhope, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer); presented, and read the first time [Bill 197.]

Public Health Act (1875) Amendment Bill [Bill 33]—

Bill considered in Committee. [Progress, 7th April] .. 1326
 (In the Committee.)

After short time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday 12th June.

EAST INDIA LOAN [CONSOLIDATED FUND]—

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to issue, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the sum of two million pounds sterling, during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, by way of Loan, to the Secretary of State in Council of India. Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Conveyancing and Land Transfer (Scotland) Act (1874) Amendment Bill—

Ordered (Mr. Yeaman, Mr. Baxter, Dr. Cameron); presented, and read the first time [Bill 198] .. 1328

Lord Clerk Register (Scotland) Bill—Ordered (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross);

presented, and read the first time [Bill 196] .. 1328

Grand Juries (Ireland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland);

presented, and read the first time [Bill 199] .. 1328

LORDS, TUESDAY, MAY 27.

PRIVATE BILLS—

Ordered, That the time for the Second Reading of any Private Bill brought from the House of Commons, limited by the Order of the 4th day of March last to the 10th day of June next, be extended to the 17th day of June next.

PRIVATE AND PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION BILLS—

Ordered, That Standing Orders Nos. 92. and 93. be suspended; and that the time for depositing petitions praying to be heard against Private and Provisional Order Confirmation Bills, which would otherwise expire during the adjournment of the House at Whitsuntide, be extended to the first day on which the House shall sit after the recess.

SOUTH AFRICA—NATAL AND THE TRANSVAAL—APPOINTMENT OF SIR GARNET

WOLSELEY AS HIGH COMMISSIONER—Questions, Observations, The Earl of Carnarvon; Reply, Earl Cadogan; Question, The Earl of Kimberley; Answer, Earl Cadogan .. 1329

West Donegal Railway Bill [H.L.]—

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee" .. 1331

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—House in Committee accordingly.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

Prosecution of Offences Bill (No. 74)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Chancellor) .. 1335

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 27.]	Page
Disqualification by Medical Relief Bill (No. 6)—
House in Committee	1338
Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.
THE ADMINISTRATOR OF THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS—THE SULTAN OF JOHOR —MOTION FOR PAPERS—
Moved , "That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of the Treaty of 1855 between the Sultan of Johor and his Tumonggong, and for the correspondence respecting Muar since the death of the late Sultan of Johor,"—(The Lord Stanley of Alderley)	1341
After short debate, Motion agreed to .
THE ADMIRALTY—THE NAVAL DEPARTMENT—Question, Observations, The Earl of Camperdown; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon ..
	1350

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MAY 27

QUESTIONS.

SALMON DISEASE (ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND)—Question, Captain Milne-Home; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	1352
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—RETURNS OF KILLED, &c.—Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1352
THAMES RIVER TRAFFIC COMMITTEE—THE REPORT—Questions, Captain Pim, Lord Francis Hervey; Answers, Mr. J. G. Talbot	1353
THE "PRINCESS ALICE" CALAMITY—PROCEEDINGS AT THE INQUEST—Question, Captain Pim; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	1353
CYPRUS—ADMINISTRATION OF THE GOVERNMENT—Questions, Sir Julian Goldsmid; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1354
CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF EDMUND GALLEY—Question, Mr. Hopwood; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	1355
POOR LAW—DUDLEY, &c.—THE TRUCK SYSTEM—Question, Mr. H. B. Sheridan; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth	1356
RIBBONISM (IRELAND)—TYRONE—Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	1356
NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND)—LEGISLATION—Question, Sir Joseph M'Kenna; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	1356
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—INSTRUCTIONS TO SIR GARNET WOLSELEY—Question, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1357
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—MONAGHAN BOARD OF GUARDIANS—Questions, Mr. Callan, Mr. Newdegate; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther	1358
THE ADMIRALTY—THE DIRECTOR OF NAVAL CONSTRUCTION—Question, Mr. D. Jenkins; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith	1359
CYPRUS—ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—THE ORDINANCES—Question, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answer, Mr. Bourke	1360
GREECE—CYPRUS—FURTHER PAPERS—Questions, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Monk; Answers, Mr. Bourke	1360
EGYPT—THE FRENCH AND ENGLISH GOVERNMENTS—Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, Mr. Bourke	1361
WELLINGTON COLLEGE—THE COMMISSION—Question, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	1362
TURKEY—CONSUL BLUNT'S REPORT—Question, Lord Elcho; Answer, Mr. Bourke	1362
PARLIAMENT—RULES AND PRACTICE OF THE HOUSE—THE CROSS BENCHES AND THE GALLERY—Observations, Mr. C. Beckett-Denison; Reply, Mr. Speaker	1362

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 27.]	Page
SOUTH AFRICA — THE ZULU WAR — THE TRANSVAAL — Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	1363
PARLIAMENT — PUBLIC BUSINESS — DOGS REGULATION IRELAND BILL — Question, Major Nolan; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther ..	1364
SOUTH AFRICA—SIR BARTLE FRERE—Question, Mr. Courtney; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	1364

M O T I O N S .

THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS—

Moved, "That this House, at its rising, do adjourn until Monday 9th June,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) .. 1364

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—Observations, Mr. Sullivan:—Debate thereon 1364

AGRICULTURAL DEPRESSION IN IRELAND—Observations, Mr. O'Donnell .. 1389
Amendment proposed, to leave out "9th," in order to insert "2nd,"—(Mr. O'Donnell,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That '9th' stand part of the Question:"—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House, at its rising, do adjourn until Monday 9th June.

O R D E R S O F T H E D A Y .

EAST INDIA LOAN [CONSOLIDATED FUND]—

Resolution [May 26] reported .. 1399

After short debate, Resolution agreed to:—Bill ordered (Mr. Raikes, Mr. Edward Stanhope, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Metropolis (Little Coram Street, Bloomsbury, Wells Street, Poplar, and Great Peter Street, Westminster) Improvement Provisional Orders Confirmation Bill [Lords]—

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, with an Amendment .. 1400

Moved, "That the Bill, as amended, be considered upon Tuesday 10th June, at Two of the clock:"—After short debate, Motion agreed to.

Hypothec Abolition (Scotland) Bill [Bill 119]—

Moved, "That the Bill, as amended, be now taken into Consideration,"—(Mr. Vans Agnew) .. 1401

After short debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Ernest Noel):—After further short debate, it being 10 minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day.

LORDS, THURSDAY, MAY 29.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1878—AMERICAN PIGS—Question, The Earl of Belmore; Answer, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon .. 1406

Omnibus Regulation Bill (No. 41)—

Committee put off to Tuesday the 17th of June next .. 1406

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 29.]	Page
Children's Dangerous Performances Bill (No. 64)—
House in Committee (according to Order) ..	1407
After short debate, House to be again in Committee on Tuesday the 17th of June next.
TURKEY—CRETE—REPORTED DISTURBANCES—Question, Observations, Lord Colchester; Reply, The Marquess of Salisbury ..
	1408
CRIMINAL LAW—31 VICT. C. 24—EXECUTION OF CATHERINE CHURCHILL AT TAUNTON—ADMISSION OF THE PRESS—Question, Observations, Lord Houghton; Reply, Earl Beauchamp:—Short debate thereon ..
	1412
Metropolitan Public Carriage Act Amendment Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord Steward); read 1^a (No. 105) ..
	1415

LORDS, FRIDAY, MAY 30.

ARMY—ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE COMMITTEE—Question, Observations, Lord Truro; Reply, The Lord Chancellor ..	1416
---	------

Hares (Ireland) Bill (No. 89)—

Moved , "That the Bill be now read 3 ^a ,"—(The Viscount Massereens) ..	1417
Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 16th of June next.

ARMY—THE CONDITION OF THE ARMY AND THE SHORT-SERVICE SYSTEM—

Address for Papers (Lord Strathnairn) ..	1418
After short debate, Motion amended, and agreed to.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for,

1. The number and their rank of officers of battalions on foreign service or on first appointment on the Linked Battalion system who since the 1st of April 1876 have served at Brigade Depôts, and how long; also the number of rank and file and of non-commissioned officers, being the respective strength of the companies forming the Brigade Depôts, including non-effectives, and their employment; and also the average monthly strength of a Brigade Depôt:
2. The number since the 1st of April 1876 of Brigade Depôt parades and drills, stating what drills, or movements under the colonel commandant of the four Depôt Companies, including the Auxiliary Forces, Militia, &c.:
3. The annual expense of the colonels commandant, the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the Brigade Depôts actually and practically formed together, with the expense of concentration of troops, if any, travelling, officers mess, and other miscellaneous expenses attendant on the Brigade Depôt system:
4. The armed force, whether line, brigade depôt, first class army reserve, militia, yeomanry, volunteers, or pensioners whom the colonel commandant is authorised to inspect or call out for drill purposes in his sub-district, or for aid, if necessary, to the civil power:
5. The armed force and of what description in a sub-district under the orders of its colonel commandant:
6. Whether the first class army reserve men are concentrated in a sub-district at the Brigade Depôt stations for their seven days annual instruction, and, if not, where and by whom drilled, and in what drill:
7. Number of recruits since 1871 tried for fraudulent enlistment, that is for having sworn, although under age, in their attestation papers that they were of the proper age; and what steps have been taken to prevent the award of "bringing money" for fraudulent enlistments:
8. Any battalion, which on account of the Linked Battalion system and of the necessity of its being at home in order to relieve its linked or other battalion at the termination of its foreign service, or on account of any other cause, has been ordered home in breach of the rules of the Regulation Foreign Service Roster before the completion of its foreign service:
9. Return in continuation of a Return to an Address of the House of Lords, dated the 28th of February 1876:
10. Return of Double or Linked Battalions at home being stationed in the district or sub-district of their Brigade Depôt or Centre:

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 30.]

Page

ARMY—THE CONDITION OF THE ARMY AND THE SHORT-SERVICE SYSTEM—continued.

11. Any reports of the opinions of general officers commanding districts at home or in command of troops abroad of the disadvantages of the under age of the men under their command :
12. A Return of the First Class Army Reserve men who have volunteered lately, specifying whether they were in civil employment or without it,—(The Lord Strathnairn.)

CHURCH OF ENGLAND—GLEBE LANDS—MOTION FOR A RETURN—

Moved for, “A Return from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and from the Governors of Queen Anne’s Bounty of all sales of lands belonging to or held in trust for parochial benefices or districts which have been effected or assented to by them respectively during the last ten years, specifying in each case the amount of land sold, the rental of the same, and the price obtained for it; also the like particulars of all cases in which sales have been refused within the same period,”—(The Bishop of Peterborough) 1427 Motion agreed to :—Return ordered to be laid before the House.

Convention (Ireland) Act Repeal Bill (No. 77)—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a,”—(The Lord O’Hagan) .. 1428

Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 16th of June next.

COMMONS, MONDAY, JUNE 9.

QUESTIONS.

INDIA — RETURN OF ECCLESIASTICAL SALARIES — Question, Mr. Baxter;
Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope	1430
TREATY OF BERLIN—THE 23RD ARTICLE—THE EUROPEAN PROVINCES OF
TURKEY—Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, Mr. Bourke	1430
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—THE MONAGHAN BOARD OF GUARDIANS—Question,
Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	1431
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—OVERTURES OF PEACE—DETENTION OF MESSENGERS—Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Sir Michael
Hicks-Beach	1432
PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS—GREECE AND CYPRUS—Questions, Sir Charles W.
Dilke, Sir Julian Goldsmid; Answers, Mr. Bourke	1433
PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE — Questions, The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Callan; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer,
Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson	1433

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES [Progress.]
(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

- (1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £129,351, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Expense of the Maintenance of Juvenile Offenders in Reformatory, Industrial, and Day Industrial Schools in Great Britain, and for the Salaries and Expenses of the Inspectors of Reformatories 1434
- Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Item of £112,000, for Industrial Schools, England, be reduced by the sum of £6,891,”—(Mr. James Stewart.)—
- After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
- After further debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (2.) Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £20,125, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Maintenance of Criminal Lunatics in the Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, England” 1449

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 9.]

Page

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.

- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £18,126, be granted, &c.,"—(Mr. Rylands :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (3.) £49,613, to complete the sum for the Lord Advocate and Criminal Proceedings, Scotland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 1460
- (4.) £45,931, to complete the sum for Courts of Law and Justice, Scotland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 1464
- (5.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £27,268, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices in Her Majesty's General Register House, Edinburgh" .. 1471
- After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £26,268, be granted, &c.,"—(Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (6.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £63,433, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Expenses of the Prison Commissioners for Scotland, and of the Prisons under their control, including the Maintenance of Criminal Lunatics and the Preparation of Judicial Statistics" .. 1484
- After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the item of £140, for Salary of Scripture Reader in Perth Prison, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—(Mr. Biggar :)—After further short debate, Question put :—The Committee divided : Ayes 4, Noes 162 ; Majority 148.—(Div. List, No. 112.)
Original Question again proposed .. 1509
- After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £200 for the Salaries of Female Scripture Readers in Perth Prison be reduced by £100,"—(Mr. Biggar :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Question put, and agreed to.
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £65,521, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, of Criminal Prosecutions and other Law Charges in Ireland, including certain Allowances under the Act 15 and 16 Vic. c. 83" .. 1510
- Moved*, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Parnell :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
- (7.) £28,888, to complete the sum for the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, &c. Ireland.
- (8.) £8,387, to complete the sum for Probate, &c. Registries, Ireland.
- (9.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £7,574, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and the incidental Expenses of the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland" .. 1513
- After short debate, Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Rylands :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (10.) £1,196, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Court Registry, Ireland.

CLASS VI.—SUPERANNUATION AND RETIRED ALLOWANCES, AND GRATUITIES FOR CHARITABLE AND OTHER PURPOSES.

- (11.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £289,772, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for Superannuation and Retired Allowances to Persons formerly employed in the Public Service, and for Compassionate or other Special Allowances and Gratuities awarded by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury" .. 1517
- Moved*, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Whitwell :)—After short debate, Question put :—The Committee divided : Ayes 30, Noes 120 ; Majority 90.—(Div. List, No. 113.)
After further short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock ; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 9.]

Page

Customs and Inland Revenue Bill [Bill 150]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 20th May] 1518
After some time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday next.

Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment Bill [Lords]—

Bill considered in Committee [Bill 134] 1541
Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

M O T I O N S .

Spirits Bill—

Acts read; considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Moved, "That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to consolidate the Law relating to the distilling, rectifying, or compounding, and dealing in or retailing spirits,"—(The Attorney General) 1541

Motion agreed to:—Resolution reported:—Bill ordered (Mr. Attorney General, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson); presented, and read the first time [Bill 203.]

Linen and Hempen Manufactures (Ireland) Bill—Acts read; considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported:—Bill ordered (Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland); presented, and read the first time [Bill 202] 1542

POOR REMOVAL—

Select Committee nominated:—List of the Committee 1542

Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 3) Bill—

Select Committee nominated:—List of the Committee 1542

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 10.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Felixstowe Railway and Pier Bill [Lords] (by Order)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time" 1543

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Colonel Jervis.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question:"

—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed.

Q U E S T I O N S .

RAILWAYS—THE BOARD OF INLAND REVENUE—SEASON TICKETS—Question, Mr. W. H. James; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer .. 1548
ITALY—THE ITALIAN POLICE—Question, Sir Eardley Wilmot; Answer, Mr. Bourke 1548
THE CUSTOM HOUSE—SANITARY IMPROVEMENTS—Question, Mr. Fawcett; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson 1549
CYPRUS—ADMINISTRATION OF THE ISLAND—Question, Sir Julian Goldsmid; Answer, Mr. Bourke 1550

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 10.]	Page
ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—Questions, Major O'Beirne, Sir Henry Havelock; Answers, Colonel Stanley ..	1550
ARMY ORGANIZATION — THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE — Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1551
PARLIAMENT — ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS — Question, Sir David Wedderburn; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1551
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—Questions, Sir Robert Peel, Sir Julian Goldsmid; Answers, Colonel Stanley ..	1552
ARMY ORGANIZATION — THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE — Observations, Mr. Gourley ..	1553
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Gourley :)—After short debate, Question put, and negatived .
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—INSTRUCTIONS TO SIR GARNET WOLSELEY —Question, Mr. Parnell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1562

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 8th May] .. 1563
 After long time spent therein, it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTIONS.

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD EXPENDITURE—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That the rapidly increasing expenditure of the London School Board requires the early attention of the Government, with the view of imposing on it some more effectual checks than appear at present to exist,"—(Mr. Reginald Yorke) .. 1624

After long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Mundella :)—After further short debate, Motion agreed to :—Debate adjourned till Monday next.

Metropolitan Board of Works (Water Expenses) Bill—Ordered (Sir James M'Garel Hogg, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Rodwell); presented, and read the first time [Bill 204] 1649

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 11.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Hours of Polling (Boroughs) Bill [Bill 11]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Chamberlain) 1650
 Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Mr. Ascheton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question :"
 —After long debate, Question put :—The House divided; Ayes 165, Noes 190; Majority 25.—(Div. List, No. 117.)

Words added :—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to :—Second Reading put off for three months.

[June 11.]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Page

MOTION.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS—

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the Contagious Diseases Acts, 1866—1869, their administration, operation, and effect:—List of the Committee.

Ordered, That all Reports and Returns thereto relating be referred to the said Committee.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to receive Evidence which may be tendered concerning similar systems in British Colonies or in other Countries, and to report whether the said Contagious Acts should be maintained, extended, amended, or repealed,—(Colonel Stanley) .. 1696

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JUNE 12.

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—ESTIMATE OF EXPENDITURE—Questions, Mr. Childers, Sir George Campbell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1695
ARMY MEDICAL SERVICE—INVALIDED MEDICAL OFFICERS—Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1697
THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT—Question, Mr. J. G. Hubbard; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1697
NORTHERN BORNEO—CESSION OF LAND, &c.—Questions, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, Mr. Bourke ..	1698
AFRICA—WEST COAST—SIERRA LEONE CUSTOMS DUTIES—Question, Mr. A. M'Arthur; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	1699
Ceylon—FOOD SCARCITY—Question, Mr. Potter; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	1700
INDIA—THE KIRWEE PRIZE MONEY—Question, General Shute; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope ..	1701
ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—LEGISLATION AS TO BOOTY OF WAR—Question, General Shute; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1701
POST OFFICE—EASTERN MAIL CONTRACT—Questions, Sir George Campbell; Answers, Lord John Manners ..	1702
CHURCH OF SCOTLAND—RETURN OF COMMUNICANTS—Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, The Lord Advocate ..	1702
CUSTOMS RE-ORGANIZATION—Question, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson ..	1703
HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (IRELAND)—BUSINESS IN THE CHANCERY DIVISION—Question, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland ..	1703
SLAVE TRADE IN SOUTH AFRICA—TREATY WITH PORTUGAL—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Bourke ..	1703
TURKEY—THE TURKISH GUARANTEED LOAN, 1855—Questions, Mr. Dodson, Mr. Monk; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1704
CYPRUS—THE NEW COINAGE—Question, Mr. Thomson Hankey; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1705
CYPRUS—REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE ACCOUNTS—Question, Mr. Dodson; Answer, Mr. Bourke ..	1705
LAW OF COPYRIGHT—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Hanbury Tracy; Answer, Lord John Manners ..	1706
NAVY—PENSIONS OF SERGEANTS OF ROYAL MARINES—Question, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith ..	1706
ARMY—COMPULSORY RETIREMENT—THE ROYAL WARRANT OF MAY, 1878—Question, Mr. Stacpoole; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1707
POST OFFICE—SOLDIERS LETTERS FROM SOUTH AFRICA—Questions, Mr. Oliver Walker, General Shute; Answer, Lord John Manners ..	1707

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 12.]	Page
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—ALLEGED CRUELTY OF THE BRITISH TROOPS—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	1708
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. O'Donnell :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
CRIMINAL LAW—CIRCULATION OF DISGUSTING LITERATURE—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross ..	1718
CRIMINAL CODE (INDICTABLE OFFENCES) BILL—REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS—Question, Sir Henry James; Answer, The Attorney General	1719
DEBTORS ACT (1869) AMENDMENT BILL—Question, Mr. M. T. Bass; Answer, The Attorney General ..	1719
UNREFORMED MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—REPORT OF THE COMMISSION—Question, Mr. Whitwell; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross ..	1720
POST OFFICE—MAIL CONTRACT WITH THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM COMPANY—Question, Mr. J. Holms; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson ..	1720
FRANCE—DEMONETISATION OF SILVER—Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Mr. Bourke ..	1720
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—INSTRUCTIONS TO SIR GARNET WOLSELEY—Question, Mr. Parnell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1721
ARTIZANS' DWELLINGS ACT, 1868—PRIVATE BURYING GROUNDS—Question, Mr. Waddy; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross ..	1721
PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF BUSINESS—MORNING SITTINGS—Questions, Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Childers, Mr. Rylands; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1722
EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—Petitions presented, Mr. John Bright, Mr. Gladstone ..	1723

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

INDIA—EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—ADJOURNED DEBATE. [THIRD NIGHT]—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [22nd May]:—
Question again proposed:—Debate resumed ..	1724
After long debate, Question put, and agreed to .
ACCOUNTS considered in Committee ..	1795
(In the Committee.)
After further short debate, Resolved , That it appears by the Accounts laid before this House that the Ordinary Revenue of India for the year ending the 31st day of March 1878 was £51,795,866; the Revenue from Productive Public Works, including the Net Traffic Receipts from Guaranteed Companies, was £7,173,435, making the total Revenue of India for that year £58,969,301; that the Ordinary Expenditure in India and in England, including Charges for the Collection of the Revenue, for Ordinary Public Works, and for Interest on Debt exclusive of that for Productive Public Works, was £55,147,832; the Expenditure on Productive Public Works (Working Expenses and Interest), including the payments to Guaranteed Companies for Interest and Surplus Profits, was £7,364,556, making a total Charge for that year of £62,512,388; that there was an excess of Expenditure over Income in that year amounting to £3,543,087; and that the Capital Expenditure on Productive Public Works in the same year was £4,791,052.
Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.
East India Loan (£5,000,000) Bill [Bill 197]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Edward Stanhope) ..	1803
Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Sir George Campbell :)
After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 12.]

Page

Common Law Procedure and Judicature Acts Amendment Bill [Bill 181]—

Bill considered in Committee 1804
[House counted out.]

LORDS, FRIDAY, JUNE 13.

Their Lordships met;—and having gone through the Business on the Paper, without debate, [House adjourned.]

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JUNE 13.

QUESTIONS.

—o—o—o—
NAVY—THE LATE MR. W. FROUDE—Question, Mr. E. J. Reed; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith	1806
GENERAL NATIONAL FUND FOR RELIEF OF FAMILIES OF SOLDIERS, SAILORS, &c.—Question, General Shute; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1806
ARMY REGULATION ACT—CASHIERED PURCHASE OFFICERS—Question, General Shute; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1807
FISHERY LAWS—VIOLATION BY STEAM TRAWLERS — Question, Sir David Wedderburn; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith	1807
MINES REGULATION ACT, 1872 — INSPECTION OF COAL MINES—Question, Mr. Burt; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	1808
ISLAND OF CYPRUS — PUNISHMENT OF PRIESTS — Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, Mr. Bourke	1809
PRISONS (IRELAND)—RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS—Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	1809
ILLEGAL LOTTERIES—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland	1810
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—OVERTURES OF PEACE — Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	1810
ARMY—THE FIRST CLASS ARMY RESERVE—VOLUNTEERS—Question, Colonel Arbuthnot; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1811
COAL MINES—THE DINAS COLLIERY EXPLOSION—Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	1811
CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF RYAN—Question, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	1812
PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—Questions, Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Callan; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1813

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”—

METROPOLIS—LOCAL TAXATION—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—
Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, “a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the powers of the Vestries of the Metropolis, and their administration of the funds at their disposal,”—(Mr.
Baillie Cochrane,)—instead thereof 1813

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :”—After debate, Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”—

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 13.]	Page
SUPPLY—Order for Committee read— continued .
RAILWAYS—RAILWAY ACCIDENTS—THE ADOPTION OF CONTINUOUS BRAKES—Observations, Mr. Baxter :—Debate thereon ..	1832
ARMY—SOLDIERS IN UNIFORM—Observations, Colonel Mure; Reply, Colonel Stanley; Observations, Sir Walter B. Barttelot ..	1868
NAVY—CASE OF MR. JOHN CLARE—Observations, Mr. Biggar; Reply, Mr. A. F. Egerton; Observations, Mr. Parnell ..	1872
IRELAND—CARRICK-ON-SUIR BRIDGE—Observations, Mr. O'Donnell :—Short debate thereon	1873
Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn :—Committee deferred till Monday next."

Customs and Inland Revenue Bill [Bill 150]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 9th June] ..	1875
After short time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

Inclosure Provisional Order (Whittington Common) Bill— Ordered (Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross); presented , and read the first time [Bill 207] ..	1886
---	------

LORDS, MONDAY, JUNE 16.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND—THE CHAPTER OF YORK CATHEDRAL—CASE OF THE REV. JAMES FLEMING—Observations, Question, Lord Hampton; Reply, The Earl of Beaconsfield; Observations, The Archbishop of York	1887
--	------

Hares (Ireland) Bill (No. 89)—
House in Committee (according to Order) ..	1897
Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

Convention (Ireland) Act Repeal Bill (No. 77)—
Moved , "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee upon the said Bill,"—(The Lord O'Hagan) ..	1898
Motion agreed to ; House in Committee :—Bill reported , without Amendment; an Amendment made; and Bill to be read 3 ^d To-morrow .

SPAIN—CONTRABAND TRADE AT GIBRALTAR—CASE OF THE "ROSSLYN"—Question, Observations, The Duke of St. Albans; Reply, Earl Cadogan; Observations, Lord Napier of Magdala ..		1898
--	--	------

ARMY—ARMY ORGANIZATION—DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE—Question, Observations, Lord Truro; Reply, Viscount Bury :—Short debate thereon		1901
---	--	------

COMMONS, MONDAY, JUNE 16.

QUESTIONS.

CYPRUS—THE ORDINANCES—Question, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answer, Mr. Bourke ..	1908
IRELAND—THE FISHERIES OF SLIGO AND THE BONET RIVER—Question, Major O'Beirne; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther ..	1909
LOCAL FINANCE—ANNUAL STATEMENT—THE PUBLIC WORKS LOAN BILL—Questions, Mr. Pell, Mr. Chamberlain; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1909
INDIA—PETITION OF MR. WILLIAM TAYLER—SIR FREDERICK HALLIDAY—Questions, Mr. Staveley Hill, Sir Eardley Wilmot; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope	1910

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 16.]

Page

NORTHERN BORNEO—CESSION OF TERRITORY—Questions, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answers, Mr. Bourke	1911
REPRODUCTIVE LOAN FUND (IRELAND)—LOANS TO CLARE FISHERMEN— Question, Lord Francis Conyngham; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther ..	1912
IRELAND—SUPPLY—THE VOTE FOR CHIEF SECRETARY'S OFFICE—Question, Major O'Beirne; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson ..	1912
JAMAICA—COOLIES—Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks- Beach	1912
EGYPT—MR. VIVIAN—THE PAPERS—Questions, Mr. Otway, Mr. Whitwell; Answers, Mr. Bourke	1913
THE RAILWAY COMMISSION BILL—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, Viscount Sandon	1914
VICTORIA—THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION—Question, Mr. A. Mills; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	1914
NAVY—COALING AT ST. VINCENT—Question, Colonel Beresford; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith	1914
CRIMINAL CODE (INDICTABLE OFFENCES) BILL—MEMORANDUM OF THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE—Questions, Mr. Herschell, Mr. Wheelhouse; Answers, The Attorney General, Mr. Assheton Cross	1915
ARMY—THE 42ND REGIMENT—Questions, Mr. H. Samuelson; Answers, Colonel Stanley	1915
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE FIGHT AT RORKE'S DRIFT—Ques- tion, Mr. Stacpoole; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1916
ARMY—BEARDS—Question, Mr. Stacpoole; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1916
IRELAND—FORCIBLE DISPERSION OF A MEETING AT COOKSTOWN—Questions, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther	1916
IRELAND—REGISTRARS OF COUNTY COURTS—Question, Mr. Meldon; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland	1918
SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL—Question, Mr. Courtney; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	1919

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES—[Progress.]

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £50,600, Divine Service.—After short debate, Vote agreed to	1919
(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £29,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Administration of Military Law, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880"	1922
Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £2,000, for the Salary of the Judge Advocate General, be omitted from the proposed Vote," — (Major O'Beirne :)—After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn . After further short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.
(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £266,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Medical Establishments and Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880"	1949
After debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £261,200, be granted, &c.," — (Mr. Meldon :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn . Original Question again proposed	1970
After debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £262,200, be granted, &c.," — (Mr. Parnell :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn . Original Question put, and agreed to.
(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £495,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay and Allowances of a Force of Militia, not exceeding 132,526, including 30,000 Militia Reserve, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880"	1990

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 29.]	Page
Children's Dangerous Performances Bill (No. 64)—
House in Committee (according to Order) ..	1407
After short debate, House to be again in Committee on Tuesday the 17th of June next.
TURKEY—CRETE—REPORTED DISTURBANCES—Question, Observations, Lord Colchester; Reply, The Marquess of Salisbury ..	1408
CRIMINAL LAW—31 VICT. c. 24—EXECUTION OF CATHERINE CHURCHILL AT TAUNTON—ADMISSION OF THE PRESS—Question, Observations, Lord Houghton; Reply, Earl Beauchamp:—Short debate thereon ..	1412
Metropolitan Public Carriage Act Amendment Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord Steward); read 1^a (No. 105)	1415

LORDS, FRIDAY, MAY 30.

ARMY—ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE COMMITTEE—Question, Observations, Lord Truro; Reply, The Lord Chancellor ..	1416
---	------

Hares (Ireland) Bill (No. 89)—

Moved , "That the Bill be now read 3 ^a ,"—(The Viscount Massereene) ..	1417
Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 16th of June next.

ARMY—THE CONDITION OF THE ARMY AND THE SHORT-SERVICE SYSTEM—

Address for Papers (Lord Strathnairn)	1418
After short debate, Motion amended , and agreed to .

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for,

1. The number and their rank of officers of battalions on foreign service or on first appointment on the Linked Battalion system who since the 1st of April 1876 have served at Brigade Depôts, and how long; also the number of rank and file and of non-commissioned officers, being the respective strength of the companies forming the Brigade Depôts, including non-effectives, and their employment; and also the average monthly strength of a Brigade Depôt:
2. The number since the 1st of April 1876 of Brigade Depôt parades and drills, stating what drills, or movements under the colonel commandant of the four Depôt Companies, including the Auxiliary Forces, Militia, &c.:
3. The annual expense of the colonels commandant, the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the Brigade Depôts actually and practically formed together, with the expense of concentration of troops, if any, travelling, officers mess, and other miscellaneous expenses attendant on the Brigade Depôt system:
4. The armed force, whether line, brigade depôt, first class army reserve, militia, yeomanry, volunteers, or pensioners whom the colonel commandant is authorised to inspect or call out for drill purposes in his sub-district, or for aid, if necessary, to the civil power:
5. The armed force and of what description in a sub-district under the orders of its colonel commandant:
6. Whether the first class army reserve men are concentrated in a sub-district at the Brigade Depôt stations for their seven days annual instruction, and, if not, where and by whom drilled, and in what drill:
7. Number of recruits since 1871 tried for fraudulent enlistment, that is for having sworn, although under age, in their attestation papers that they were of the proper age; and what steps have been taken to prevent the award of "bringing money" for fraudulent enlistments:
8. Any battalion, which on account of the Linked Battalion system and of the necessity of its being at home in order to relieve its linked or other battalion at the termination of its foreign service, or on account of any other cause, has been ordered home in breach of the rules of the Regulation Foreign Service Roster before the completion of its foreign service:
9. Return in continuation of a Return to an Address of the House of Lords, dated the 28th of February 1876:
10. Return of Double or Linked Battalions at home being stationed in the district or sub-district of their Brigade Depôt or Centre:

TWENTY-FIRST PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.

COMMONS.

NEW WRIT ISSUED.

TUESDAY, MAY 13, 1879.

For Limerick City, v. Isaac Butt, esquire, deceased.

NEW MEMBERS SWORN.

FRIDAY, MAY 9.

Canterbury—Robert Peter Lawrie, esquire.

MONDAY, JUNE 9.

Clare County—The O'Gorman Mahon.

Limerick City—Daniel FitzGerald Gabbett, esquire.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 9.]

Page

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.

- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £18,125, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Rylands :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (3.) £49,613, to complete the sum for the Lord Advocate and Criminal Proceedings, Scotland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 1460
- (4.) £45,931, to complete the sum for Courts of Law and Justice, Scotland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 1464
- (5.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £27,268, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices in Her Majesty's General Register House, Edinburgh" .. 1471
- After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £26,268, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (6.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £63,433, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Expenses of the Prison Commissioners for Scotland, and of the Prisons under their control, including the Maintenance of Criminal Lunatics and the Preparation of Judicial Statistics" .. 1484
- After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the item of £140, for Salary of Scripture Reader in Perth Prison, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—(Mr. Biggar :)—After further short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 4, Noes 152; Majority 148.—(Div. List, No. 112.) .. 1509
- Original Question again proposed .. 1509
- After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £200 for the Salaries of Female Scripture Readers in Perth Prison be reduced by £100,"—(Mr. Biggar :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Question put, and agreed to.
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £65,521, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, of Criminal Prosecutions and other Law Charges in Ireland, including certain Allowances under the Act 15 and 16 Vic. c. 83" .. 1510
- Moved*, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Parnell :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
- (7.) £28,888, to complete the sum for the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, &c. Ireland.
- (8.) £8,387, to complete the sum for Probate, &c. Registries, Ireland.
- (9.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £7,574, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and the incidental Expenses of the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland" .. 1513
- After short debate, Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Rylands :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (10.) £1,195, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Court Registry, Ireland.

CLASS VI.—SUPERANNUATION AND RETIRED ALLOWANCES, AND GRATUITIES FOR CHARITABLE AND OTHER PURPOSES.

- (11.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £289,772, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for Superannuation and Retired Allowances to Persons formerly employed in the Public Service, and for Compassionate or other Special Allowances and Gratuities awarded by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury" .. 1517
- Moved*, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Whitwell :)—After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 30, Noes 120; Majority 90.—(Div. List, No. 113.) .. 1517
- After further short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

IN THE

SIXTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FIRST PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 5 MARCH, 1874, AND THENCE CONTINUED TILL 5 DECEMBER, 1878, IN THE FORTY-SECOND YEAR OF
THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

FOURTH VOLUME OF THE SESSION.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 9th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) * (76);
Convention (Ireland) Act Repeal * (77);
Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, Amendment * (78); Local Government Provisional Orders (Ashton-under-Lyne, &c.) * (79).
Committee—Report—Land Drainage Provisional Order (Bispham, &c.) * (65).
Third Reading—Railways and Telegraphs in India * (63); Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (Brighton and Preston, &c.) * (48), and passed.

CHINA—THE CHEFOO CONVENTION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I wish to ask the noble
Viscount the Secretary of State for India, Whether any or what steps have been taken under the Chefoo Convention of September, 1876, to give effect to the clauses relating to the importation of opium, the mission of exploration to Thibet and thence to India, and the appointment of a Commission to regulate the differences between the Colony of Hong Kong and the City of Canton? There are many questions of much importance comprised in the Chefoo Convention; but I shall only call your Lordships' attention to those points that are indicated in my Question.

VOL. CCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

The Convention was agreed to two years ago. The first point to which I shall refer are the clauses regulating the importation of opium into China. These clauses, I may explain, provide that the opium should be put into bond, and that when taken out for the purposes of sale it should be subject to a certain tax called the li-kin; the exact conditions of which were to be the subject of agreement. The tax was originally a war tax, imposed in consequence of the Taeping rebellion; but, like our own Income Tax in England, has since been maintained as an ordinary source of Revenue. Before any final settlement had been arrived at, Sir Thomas Wade, our Minister in China, who had come to this country, was sent to India, which country the question mainly affected, in

B

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 10.]	Page
ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—Questions, Major O'Beirne, Sir Henry Havelock; Answers, Colonel Stanley ..	1550
ARMY ORGANIZATION — THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE — Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1551
PARLIAMENT — ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS — Question, Sir David Wedderburn; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1551
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—Questions, Sir Robert Peel, Sir Julian Goldsmid; Answers, Colonel Stanley ..	1552
ARMY ORGANIZATION — THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE — Observations, Mr. Gourley ..	1553
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Gourley :)—After short debate, Question put, and negatived .
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—INSTRUCTIONS TO SIR GARNET WOLSELEY —Question, Mr. Parnell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1562

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—o—o—

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 8th May] .. 1563
 After long time spent therein, it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.
 The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.
 The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTIONS.

—o—o—o—

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD EXPENDITURE—RESOLUTION—
Moved, "That the rapidly increasing expenditure of the London School Board requires the early attention of the Government, with the view of imposing on it some more effectual checks than appear at present to exist,"—(Mr. Reginald Yorke) .. 1624
 After long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Mundella :)—After further short debate, Motion agreed to :—Debate adjourned till Monday next.

Metropolitan Board of Works (Water Expenses) Bill—Ordered (Sir James M'Garel Hogg, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Rodwell); presented, and read the first time [Bill 204] 1649

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 11.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—o—o—

Hours of Polling (Boroughs) Bill [Bill 11]—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Chamberlain) 1650
 Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Mr. Ascheton.)
 Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question :"
 —After long debate, Question put :—The House divided; Ayes 165, Noes 190; Majority 25.—(Div. List, No. 117.)
 Words added :—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to :—Second Reading put off for three months.

Kong and China would be arranged in a manner satisfactory at once to the Colony of Hong Kong and to the Chinese Government. As regarded the opening up of intercourse between China and India through Thibet, it was most desirable, before we attempted to send another mission of exploration, that we should be sure there was no risk of the repetition of the disaster which had occurred in attempting to open intercourse between China and India through Burmah.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that two years ago he had been asked by those who were interested in the China trade to put the first of the Questions now put to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; but he had to postpone it as the Government had not then come to any decision. The Chinese Government had fulfilled their part of the Treaty, and quite recently an English traveller had journeyed unmolested from Shanghai to Burmah. It was putting Sir Thomas Wade in an unfair position to send him back to Peking with the Chefoo Convention unratified by us.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It is perfectly true that, owing to certain defects in the structure of this Convention, it has not been hitherto possible to ratify it; and we are awaiting the Report from Sir Thomas Wade of his communications with the Chinese Government before we can proceed further in that direction. I am wholly unable to agree with the noble Lord the late Under Secretary (Lord Hammond) in thinking that we have done thereby any injury to the Chinese, or that we ought to compensate them for that injury in the manner the noble Lord suggests. He pointed out that the Chinese, by virtue of this Convention, have opened to us a certain number of ports. That stipulation, he says, has been performed; but the stipulation with respect to submitting opium to li-kin has not been performed. We ought, therefore, in honour, he says, to give back to the Chinese that which they have given to us, by withdrawing from those ports which they have opened. My impression is that if the Chinese could be asked they would be ill-satisfied with the demands of their advocate. Certain ports have been opened to British trade—not an injurious thing to the nation in which those ports are situated. I believe a tolerably active trade is being carried on, and, no doubt, it brings a considerable revenue to the Chinese Treasury. The proposal of the noble Lord—more Chinese in his views of trade than the Chinese themselves—is, that we should close up the avenues of this trade and dry up these sources of revenue, and then tell the Chinese we are compensating them for the non-settlement of the question of li-kin for opium. I think they would repudiate their advocate. This is not a question of hypothesis. By the Convention, the Chinese are only bound to open these ports on the performance of the stipulations with respect to li-kin. They have not waited for the stipulations; they have opened them at once. Do you imagine they have done it out of pure benevolence? Certainly not; for they know it is for their interest as well as ours that the trade between the two countries should be unrestricted. The difficulty which arises under the clause of the Convention is a very simple one. In the first place, the proposal with respect to li-kin on goods in general is that it should be levied on all goods going into China except within a very limited area which is called “the Concessions;” and to that limitation some foreign Governments take strong objection. Therefore, it is provided that the stipulations shall not come into operation until an understanding has been arrived at with them. They have not yet accepted these stipulations of the Convention, and, therefore, it is clearly impossible they should come into operation. That is a matter over which we have not any control. The li-kin is not the ordinary taxation of the country; it is a species of octroi levied at the boundary of every Province; it is levied very much at the discretion of the provincial Governors; they can raise it or lower it as they please; but there is always this security for the foreign trader—that, as long as the collection of the duty is left in the hands of Chinese officials, smuggling, when the duty becomes high, is not a very difficult matter, and, therefore, there is a natural check upon these provincial Governors which prevents them raising li-kin to an extravagant amount. With respect to opium, this Convention proposes what undoubtedly would be a very drastic remedy—that the collection should be placed in the same hands as that

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 12.]	Page
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—ALLEGED CRUELTY OF THE BRITISH TROOPS—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	1708
Moved, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. O'Donnell:)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
CRIMINAL LAW—CIRCULATION OF DISGUSTING LITERATURE—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Mr. Ascheton Cross	1718
CRIMINAL CODE (INDICTABLE OFFENCES) BILL—REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS—Question, Sir Henry James; Answer, The Attorney General	1719
DEBTORS ACT (1869) AMENDMENT BILL—Question, Mr. M. T. Bass; Answer, The Attorney General	1719
UNREFORMED MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — REPORT OF THE COMMISSION—Question, Mr. Whitwell; Answer, Mr. Ascheton Cross	1720
POST OFFICE — MAIL CONTRACT WITH THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM COMPANY — Question, Mr. J. Holms; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson	1720
FRANCE—DEMONETISATION OF SILVER—Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Mr. Bourke	1720
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—INSTRUCTIONS TO SIR GARNET WOLSELEY —Question, Mr. Parnell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1721
ARTIZANS' DWELLINGS ACT, 1868—PRIVATE BURYING GROUNDS—Question, Mr. Waddy; Answer, Mr. Ascheton Cross	1721
PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF BUSINESS—MORNING SITTINGS—Questions, Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Childers, Mr. Rylands; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1722
EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—Petitions presented, Mr. John Bright, Mr. Gladstone	1723

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

INDIA—EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS — THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—ADJOURNED DEBATE. [THIRD NIGHT]—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [22nd May]:—
Question again proposed :—Debate resumed	1724
After long debate, Question put, and agreed to .
ACCOUNTS considered in Committee	1795
(In the Committee.)
After further short debate, Resolved , That it appears by the Accounts laid before this House that the Ordinary Revenue of India for the year ending the 31st day of March 1878 was £51,795,866; the Revenue from Productive Public Works, including the Net Traffic Receipts from Guaranteed Companies, was £7,173,435, making the total Revenue of India for that year £58,969,301; that the Ordinary Expenditure in India and in England, including Charges for the Collection of the Revenue, for Ordinary Public Works, and for Interest on Debt exclusive of that for Productive Public Works, was £55,147,832; the Expenditure on Productive Public Works (Working Expenses and Interest), including the payments to Guaranteed Companies for Interest and Surplus Profits, was £7,364,556, making a total Charge for that year of £62,512,388; that there was an excess of Expenditure over Income in that year amounting to £3,543,087; and that the Capital Expenditure on Productive Public Works in the same year was £4,791,052.
Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.
East India Loan (£5,000,000) Bill [Bill 197]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Edward Stanhope)	1803
Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Sir George Campbell:)
After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

Ordered—First Reading—West India Loans * [167].

First Reading — Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Clonmel, &c.) * [166].

Second Reading—Public Health (Scotland) Provisional Order (Bothwell) * [162].

Committee — Summary Jurisdiction (re-comm) [138]—R.P.

Considered as amended — Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment * [16].

Third Reading — Statute Law Revision (Ireland) * [132], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

TREATY OF BERLIN—EASTERN ROUMELIA.—QUESTIONS.

MR. HANBURY said, he had given Notice that he would ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What modification has been introduced into the Treaty of Berlin in reference to paragraphs two and three of Article twenty-two of that Treaty, which, in the official English translation, stand as follows:—

“The period of the occupation of Eastern Roumelia and Bulgaria by the Imperial troops is fixed at nine months from the date of the exchange of the ratification of the present Treaty. The Imperial Russian Government undertakes that within nine months the passage of its troops across Roumania shall cease and the Principality shall be completely evacuated.”

Perhaps he might be allowed to state that these paragraphs were taken from the Copy of the Treaty of Berlin which was despatched by our Representatives at Berlin to the Principal Secretary of State at home, and the first to be laid upon the Table of the House and published in the country. The official version, however, showed that it contained a very remarkable mistranslation, and that it ought to run thus—

“The Imperial Russian Government undertakes that within the space of a further period of three months,” &c.

He did not propose, therefore, to put the first part of his Question, and only would ask, Whether, since the Treaty fixes a limit to the continued presence of Russian troops in Roumania only, any date has been agreed upon as that before which Eastern Roumelia also shall be completely evacuated in case the Russian authorities decide to ultimately withdraw their troops from that Province otherwise than through Roumania?

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he had also a Question to put, consequent upon that of the hon. Member for North Staffordshire. It was, Whether Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer can explain to the House why an incorrect translation of the 3rd paragraph of the 22nd Article of the Treaty of Berlin was laid upon the Table of this House by Her Majesty's Government on the 15th of July last, whereby the period accorded to Russia for the passage of troops across Roumania, and the complete evacuation of the Principality, was incorrectly stated to be nine months instead of twelve months; and, if he can explain to the House why, in the translation of the 4th Article of the Treaty above mentioned, the French word “avant” was translated “after” instead of “before.”

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I am glad that the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Alexander Gordon) has asked his Question just after that of my hon. Friend behind me, because my hon. Friend has given the explanation which I was going to give in answer to the hon. and gallant Member's Question, and which, in fact, was given by me last year in this House. It will be in the recollection of the House that I took the opportunity, last year, in answer to a Question put by the hon. Member for Rochester (Sir Julian Goldsmid), of saying that there were certain inaccuracies in the translation of the Treaty which I had laid upon the Table of the House, and that those inaccuracies arose in consequence of the very great hurry that took place in the translation and the anxiety of the Government not to lose a moment in placing the Treaty before the House. That is the explanation I gave last year, which the House, having all the circumstances in its recollection, was good enough to accept. I then took occasion to express my regret that those inaccuracies should have taken place; but I stated that no substantial inconvenience, except that caused temporarily to Members of the House, would result, because a correct translation would be laid upon the Table when the ratification of the Treaty took place. The hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Hanbury) has just explained that another translation was laid upon the Table after the ratification. The hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire has not been kind enough to adopt that; but has quoted from the previous translation, which, as I said before, was inaccurate. But I do not think anybody will say that the subsequent translation was inaccurate. With regard to the last Question of my hon. Friend the Member for North Staffordshire, I have to state that the evacuation of Eastern Roumelia will take place with all reasonable despatch. I think I may also say that if my hon. Friend will refer to historical precedents upon subjects of this kind, he will find that this is as complete an answer as can be given by the Government.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he was not aware that an explanation had been made last Session, or he should not have put his Question.

CRIMINAL LAW—ALLEGED CRUELTY
AT HANLEY.—QUESTION.

EARL PERCY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Hannah Martin, a farmer's wife, who is reported to have been charged before the stipendiary magistrate at Hanley, on the 7th of April last, with having, for a trifling offence, beaten her child of nine years old while naked, and afterwards rubbed turpentine and salt into the wounds; the child being in consequence of this treatment "one mass of wounds from neck to feet"; and, whether it is true that

"The magistrate, taking a lenient view of the case, cautioned the woman and inflicted a nominal fine and costs, which amounted to one guinea?"

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, this is an instance of a newspaper paragraph grossly misrepresenting the facts of a case, so far as I am able to ascertain them. I only wish that, in reporting these cases, the persons responsible would be more careful in being accurate; because I am sure that, unintentional though it may be, such a representation of the proceedings of a Court of Justice is calculated to have a very bad effect throughout the country. The magistrate who dealt with the case writes to me—

"It will be in your recollection that, a few weeks ago, I was in communication with you relative to another case which I tried at Stoke-upon-Trent, a report of which, as it appeared in some of the London papers, was a sensational one, and the invention of some local reporter.

Mr. Bourke

The same statement applies to this case. The woman charged was the aunt, not the mother, of the child. The child beaten was not naked, but was in her usual dress; and no turpentine or salt was used. In deciding the case, I was of opinion that the girl had received no more punishment than she really deserved, and I hesitated whether or not I should dismiss the summons; but as the mother was a poor woman living several miles off, and had taken out a summons, influenced by the fears of her daughter and some falsehood which had been told her, I ordered the costs to be paid, and inflicted a nominal fine of 1s."

I may add that a Question was given Notice of the other day with regard to another case. I presume the hon. Member found the statement untrue, and accordingly has not put the Question.

DOMINION OF CANADA — FORTUNE BAY, NEWFOUNDLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If there be any further papers in respect to the occurrences which took place in Fortune Bay, Newfoundland, January 1878, than that which closed with a letter from the American Ambassador, date 9th November 1878; if so, will he lay them upon the Table, or if the matter has been arranged, will he state the terms of the agreement?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, no communications had taken place between the British and American Governments since November 9 on the subject mentioned in the hon. Gentleman's Question.

ARMY—COMMISSARIAT AND TRANS-PORT DEPARTMENTS.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, with reference to the replies given by the War Department during the last three years, the promised Warrant re-organizing the Commissariat and Transport Departments is yet decided upon; when it is likely to be issued; and, whether it will meet the grievances of the officers to which consideration has so often been promised?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, the promised Warrant re-organizing the Commissariat and the Transport Departments had been decided upon; and he had reason to believe, if it had not already gone to the Treasury, it would go to them in the course of this week. As to when the Warrant was likely to be issued would depend upon the time taken by the Treasury to sanction the scheme. He was bound to say that the Warrant did not, in his opinion, meet the grievances of the officers; but the arrangements that were made in consequence of it would, he hoped, tend to remove some of the difficulties, though he should be sorry to say that it would redress every grievance.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1870—FOREIGN SHEEP.

QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is a fact that five hundred sheep brought from the Allan steamer "Nestorian" from Monte Video to Plymouth were prevented from being landed, and ultimately obliged to be slaughtered on board; whether there are not three authorized places for the landing of foreign animals at Plymouth; whether it is true that the "Nestorian" was prohibited from landing her sheep at one of these places, when it would have been necessary to employ boats or tugs, by the refusal of the Board of Trade to allow boats or tugs to be employed; whether the Board of Trade refused to allow the sheep to be landed at a second place, on the ground that it was reserved for horned cattle; and whether, and if so on what ground, the authorities of the Royal Victualling Yard refused to permit the debarkation for the sheep at the third landing-place; whether he is aware that this consignment was the first of an intended series of shipments of sheep from Monte Video to this Country; and, whether any steps have been taken to remove impediments presented in this case, and which threaten to prove fatal to a trade tending to cheapen the meat supply of Great Britain?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, as the allegations contained in the Questions of the hon. Member do not tally with the facts reported to the Privy Council, perhaps I may give the information which the hon. Member wants, by telling him exactly what occurred rather than by answering seriatim the Questions which he has put. Under the provisions of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, animals brought from Uruguay can only be landed in this country for slaughter at a foreign animals' wharf. The Nestorian, with a cargo of 500 sheep from Monte Video, called at Southampton about the end of April; but being unable to land there, as there was no foreign animals' wharf, the vessel went over to Havre, and ultimately to Plymouth. The only foreign animals' wharf in Plymouth is one established for victualling purposes in the Royal Victualling Yard. An application was then made to the Admiralty to allow the animals to be there landed for slaughter; but the Yard being entirely occupied with stores, the Admiralty were compelled to decline. The shippers then asked for permission to slaughter the animals on board and land the meat at Glasgow, and this has been done under the superintendence of the Inspector of the port. Any inconvenience which may have occurred resulted from this cargo of sheep being taken to ports where there is no foreign animals' wharf. If the local authority of any port consider that the cattle trade of that port is sufficient to justify them in incurring the expense of establishing a foreign animals' wharf, the Privy Council will always be ready to entertain any such proposal. There is no regular trade in animals between Uruguay and this country, and the Plymouth local authorities have not offered any eligible site for a foreign animals' wharf.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—LONDON SCHOOL BOARD—MR. GEORGE POTTER.—QUESTION.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Vice President of the Council, If his attention has been called to the fact that Mr. George Potter, a member for the Westminster Division of the London School Board, has committed an act of bankruptcy by entering into a statutable composition with his creditors; and, if so, whether he is not thereby disqualified from voting any longer as a member of the London School Board?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to this by the London School Board forwarding to us a statement to the effect that Mr. George Potter has entered into a composition with his creditors, and that, therefore, his seat at the Board is vacant.

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE GREEK FRONTIER.—QUESTIONS.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will inform the House whether there is on record merely the general affirmation by all the Powers of the principle of mediation in reference to pending territorial questions between Turkey and Greece which is implied in their subscription to the Berlin Treaty without reservation as to any of its articles; whether, since that subscription, the principle has been specially affirmed again by all the Signatory Powers in respect of putting in force the mediation which by Article twenty-four is contemplated for ensuring the rectification of frontier between Greece and Turkey on the basis of the line recommended by the Congress; and, furthermore, if such reaffirmation had occurred, whether he can state to the House that the acquiescence of Her Majesty's Government in the contemplated mediation has not been accompanied by any views suggestive of cession, by the Porte to Greece, of territory that does not comprise the whole country which the Plenipotentiaries at Berlin recommended in Protocol thirteen should be ceded to Greece?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am afraid that the only answer I can give to the hon. Gentleman is this—that there has been a good deal of diplomatic Correspondence upon this subject since the signature of the Treaty of Berlin, and that communications are still going on. It is impossible for me to enter into detail upon these questions; but I may say that Her Majesty's Government have expressed their readiness to join with other Powers in mediation in conformity with all the provisions of the 24th Article of the Treaty of Berlin.

MR. MONK subsequently asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the English Government has acceded to or rejected M. Waddington's proposal for a Conference of Ambassadors at Constantinople, with a view to the settlement of the Græco-Turkish Frontier Question.

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I am sorry that the answer I gave the other day was not sufficiently intelligible to the hon. Gentleman. My right hon. Friend has already answered one part of this Question; but I may say, in answer to the whole Question, that in pursuance of a proposal made by the French Government, Her Majesty's Government have consented to offer to exercise mediation under the Treaty of Berlin, and that they also agreed that that mediation shall be conducted by the Ambassadors at Constantinople.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: May I ask, Whether by the Ambassadors at Constantinople, singly or collectively?

MR. BOURKE: Perhaps my hon. Friend will give Notice of that Question.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: My hon. Friend asked whether there is to be a Conference of Ambassadors, and the hon. Gentleman said that mediation was to be exercised by the Ambassadors. I wish to know whether singly or collectively?

MR. BOURKE: If my hon. Friend will give Notice of his Question I will endeavour to answer it.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF EDMUND GALLEY.—QUESTIONS.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the table in the Library the Documents and Papers relating to the case of Edmund Galley, who, with one Oliver, was convicted of murder at Exeter in 1836, was afterwards reprieved, and is now a shepherd in New South Wales?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I may state, with reference to Galley, that he is not now undergoing punishment beyond that of being kept abroad. With regard to the main question, this case was decided by Earl Russell when he held the Office I have the honour to hold, and he had a great deal of communication with the late Mr. Justice Williams and the late Lord Denman on the subject. Papers passed not only between him and these Judges, but also between them and my other Predecessors. All these communications, invariably on the ground of public interest, have been considered as confidential, and I certainly am not inclined to depart from that rule.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked, Whether the sole surviving jurymen who heard the case had not addressed a strong appeal to the Secretary of State upon the subject?

[No reply was given to this Question.]

PRISONS ACT—PERTH PRISON.

QUESTIONS.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department,

Mr. W. Cartwright

If it be correct, as stated in the "Glasgow Herald" of the 7th instant, that the convicted criminals Potter and Stronach, of the City of Glasgow Bank, came from Perth prison to Glasgow in their ordinary dress on Tuesday the 6th instant; if it be common to treat witnesses who are criminals in this manner; if it be correct that he was applied to to allow them to appear in public in this form; and, if he granted them such a privilege, what were the circumstances which induced him to do so?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I have granted no privilege, and the prison has granted no privilege, and no application has been made either to one or the other. This has always been the custom in the General Prison at Perth to take prisoners, if possible, in their own dress, and not in the prison dress. That has not been the practice in other prisons in Scotland, but it has always been so at the Perth Prison.

MR. MACDONALD: Has it been the practice anywhere in England?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: No. The hon. Gentleman will remember that the General Prison at Perth has for a long time been in a peculiar position, and it has always been the practice there, and that practice has not hitherto been changed. It has not been the practice anywhere else that I am aware of.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL.—QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If, before those clauses or schedules in the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill which treat of billeting and carriage are reached, he will enable the House to discuss the scale of prices for billets, &c. by appointing a preliminary money committee with the recommendation of the Crown?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I have communicated with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I think before we reach Part III. of the Army Discipline Bill and the Schedule, which deals with prices, I shall be able to give the hon. and gallant Gentleman an answer to his Question, if he will be good enough to repeat it. There are certain clauses of the Bill as to billeting which we shall have to consider almost immediately; but they refer merely to the conduct of the soldiers, and I presume the Question does not refer to that.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given him private Notice. It has been publicly stated in an influential French newspaper, and, I believe, it has been published in an English newspaper also, that the French Government have proposed to our Government a prolongation of the Commercial Treaty for six months. This is a matter of intense interest and importance, and I should be glad to know, Whether the hon. Gentleman can give the House any information on the subject?

MR. BOURKE: Yes, Sir; the French Government have suggested that this Treaty should be prolonged for the period of six months, and Her Majesty's Government have acceded to that suggestion. Communications are passing between Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris and the French Government as to the precise terms in which the agreement should be made.

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON: May I ask, six months from what date?

MR. BOURKE: From the date of the expiration of the present Treaty, which, I think, will be at the end of the year.

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—EXECUTION OF PRISONERS OF WAR.

QUESTIONS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If it is true, as stated in the correspondence of the "Morning Post" from the camp of General Gough's brigade, April 5th, that after the action with the Afghans on the 2nd of April, in which the enemy are described as having behaved with extraordinary gallantry, "seven Moullahs were shot by order of a military commission the following day," on the charge of having instigated the resistance of the Afghans on that occasion; whether he can inform the House what Article of War, or custom of war, authorises the execution of the priesthood in any country on the charge of instigating their compatriots to resist invasion; and, whether, if the statement be confirmed, he will engage to have the parties brought to justice?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I have received a diary of events which includes inform the House whether there is on record merely the general affirmation by all the Powers of the principle of mediation in reference to pending territorial questions between Turkey and Greece which is implied in their subscription to the Berlin Treaty without reservation as to any of its articles; whether, since that subscription, the principle has been specially affirmed again by all the Signatory Powers in respect of putting in force the mediation which by Article twenty-four is contemplated for ensuring the rectification of frontier between Greece and Turkey on the basis of the line recommended by the Congress; and, furthermore, if such reaffirmation had occurred, whether he can state to the House that the acquiescence of Her Majesty's Government in the contemplated mediation has not been accompanied by any views suggestive of cession, by the Porte to Greece, of territory that does not comprise the whole country which the Plenipotentiaries at Berlin recommended in Protocol thirteen should be ceded to Greece?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am afraid that the only answer I can give to the hon. Gentleman is this—that there has been a good deal of diplomatic Correspondence upon this subject since the signature of the Treaty of Berlin, and that communications are still going on. It is impossible for me to enter into detail upon these questions; but I may say that Her Majesty's Government have expressed their readiness to join with other Powers in mediation in conformity with all the provisions of the 24th Article of the Treaty of Berlin.

MR. MONK subsequently asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the English Government has acceded to or rejected M. Waddington's proposal for a Conference of Ambassadors at Constantinople, with a view to the settlement of the Græco-Turkish Frontier Question.

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I am sorry that the answer I gave the other day was not sufficiently intelligible to the hon. Gentleman. My right hon. Friend has already answered one part of this Question; but I may say, in answer to the whole Question, that in pursuance of a proposal made by the French Government, Her Majesty's Government have consented to offer to exercise mediation under the Treaty of Berlin, and that they also agreed that that mediation shall be conducted by the Ambassadors at Constantinople.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: May I ask, Whether by the Ambassadors at Constantinople, singly or collectively?

MR. BOURKE: Perhaps my hon. Friend will give Notice of that Question.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: My hon. Friend asked whether there is to be a Conference of Ambassadors, and the hon. Gentleman said that mediation was to be exercised by the Ambassadors. I wish to know whether singly or collectively?

MR. BOURKE: If my hon. Friend will give Notice of his Question I will endeavour to answer it.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF EDMUND GALLEY.—QUESTIONS.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the table in the Library the Documents and Papers relating to the case of Edmund Galley, who, with one Oliver, was convicted of murder at Exeter in 1836, was afterwards reprieved, and is now a shepherd in New South Wales?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I may state, with reference to Galley, that he is not now undergoing punishment beyond that of being kept abroad. With regard to the main question, this case was decided by Earl Russell when he held the Office I have the honour to hold, and he had a great deal of communication with the late Mr. Justice Williams and the late Lord Denman on the subject. Papers passed not only between him and these Judges, but also between them and my other Predecessors. All these communications, invariably on the ground of public interest, have been considered as confidential, and I certainly am not inclined to depart from that rule.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked, Whether the sole surviving jurymen who heard the case had not addressed a strong appeal to the Secretary of State upon the subject?

[No reply was given to this Question.]

PRISONS ACT—PERTH PRISON.

QUESTIONS.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department,

Mr. W. Cartwright

If it be correct, as stated in the "Glasgow Herald" of the 7th instant, that the convicted criminals Potter and Stronach, of the City of Glasgow Bank, came from Perth prison to Glasgow in their ordinary dress on Tuesday the 6th instant; if it be common to treat witnesses who are criminals in this manner; if it be correct that he was applied to to allow them to appear in public in this form; and, if he granted them such a privilege, what were the circumstances which induced him to do so?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I have granted no privilege, and the prison has granted no privilege, and no application has been made either to one or the other. This has always been the custom in the General Prison at Perth to take prisoners, if possible, in their own dress, and not in the prison dress. That has not been the practice in other prisons in Scotland, but it has always been so at the Perth Prison.

MR. MACDONALD: Has it been the practice anywhere in England?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: No. The hon. Gentleman will remember that the General Prison at Perth has for a long time been in a peculiar position, and it has always been the practice there, and that practice has not hitherto been changed. It has not been the practice anywhere else that I am aware of.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL.—QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If, before those clauses or schedules in the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill which treat of billeting and carriage are reached, he will enable the House to discuss the scale of prices for billets, &c. by appointing a preliminary money committee with the recommendation of the Crown?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I have communicated with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I think before we reach Part III. of the Army Discipline Bill and the Schedule, which deals with prices, I shall be able to give the hon. and gallant Gentleman an answer to his Question, if he will be good enough to repeat it. There are certain clauses of the Bill as to billeting which we shall have to consider almost immediately; but they refer merely to the conduct of the soldiers, and I presume the Question does not refer to that.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given him private Notice. It has been publicly stated in an influential French newspaper, and, I believe, it has been published in an English newspaper also, that the French Government have proposed to our Government a prolongation of the Commercial Treaty for six months. This is a matter of intense interest and importance, and I should be glad to know, Whether the hon. Gentleman can give the House any information on the subject?

MR. BOURKE: Yes, Sir; the French Government have suggested that this Treaty should be prolonged for the period of six months, and Her Majesty's Government have acceded to that suggestion. Communications are passing between Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris and the French Government as to the precise terms in which the agreement should be made.

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON: May I ask, six months from what date?

MR. BOURKE: From the date of the expiration of the present Treaty, which, I think, will be at the end of the year.

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—EXECUTION OF PRISONERS OF WAR. QUESTIONS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If it is true, as stated in the correspondence of the "Morning Post" from the camp of General Gough's brigade, April 5th, that after the action with the Afghans on the 2nd of April, in which the enemy are described as having behaved with extraordinary gallantry, "seven Moullahs were shot by order of a military commission the following day," on the charge of having instigated the resistance of the Afghans on that occasion; whether he can inform the House what Article of War, or custom of war, authorises the execution of the priesthood in any country on the charge of instigating their compatriots to resist invasion; and, whether, if the statement be confirmed, he will engage to have the parties brought to justice?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I have received a diary of events which includes the date of the action of the 5th April, and that contains no intimation or suggestion that any such event as that to which the hon. Member refers had taken place. I am sure the House will see that I am, therefore, not in a position to give the hon. Member any further information upon the subject, or to express any opinion upon facts which are not before us.

MR. O'DONNELL: May I ask if the hon. Gentleman will deem it his duty to inquire into this very grave matter?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Of course, Sir, the India Office does not of its own motion inquire into every statement made by a newspaper correspondent; but as the hon. Member has called the attention of the House to this particular statement, I will cause an inquiry to be addressed to India without delay.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill was to be taken? It was on the Paper for Monday, but it had not yet been printed, and so it would be very inconvenient to go on with it so soon.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he was disappointed to find that the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill was not in the hands of hon. Members to-day. He believed it was owing to some technical error in the title or some clause that the Bill had not been distributed among hon. Members to-day. It would be in their hands to-morrow. He had put it down for Monday with the hope of bringing it on then; but if it was not convenient to bring it on then, it would be postponed to some other day.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTIONS.

In reply to the Marquess of HARTINGTON,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Civil Service Estimates would be taken on Monday.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Secretary of State, When he intended to proceed with the Law of Hypothec Bill?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: That subject is not in my Department, Sir.

Mr. E. Stanhope

MR. RYLANDS said, it would be convenient to know what would be the Business on Thursday next.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was rather difficult to say beforehand exactly what would be the course of Business. The difficulty of naming any Business for any day was that disappointment was caused if it was found necessary to make a change. What he proposed was this—The Civil Service Estimates would be the first Order on Monday. With regard to the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, it was his intention to take that second. If it was intended to raise any general important discussion on the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, probably it ought not to be taken at an advanced hour on Monday. If there was no such intention, it ought to be taken on Monday. Suppose they took the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill on Monday, Tuesday was open to private Members. On Thursday he wished to proceed with two important measures—the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill and the Public Works Loan Bill.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE LAW OF DISTRESS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. BLENNERHASSETT, in rising to call attention to the Law of Distraint for the rent of Agricultural Holdings in England, Wales, and Ireland, and to move—

"That it is desirable that the power of Distraint for the rent of Agricultural Holdings in England, Wales, and Ireland should be abolished;"

said: It generally happens that laws which are permitted to exist unchallenged in easy and prosperous times, when adverse seasons come have to submit to careful examination, and are called upon to justify their existence at the bar of public opinion. It is, unfortunately, too true that this is a time when the conditions affecting the agricultural interest in this country must necessarily be subjected to scrutiny. I do not wish to take a gloomy or exaggerated view of agricultural prospects; but signs are visible on every side that we are passing through a period of trial and difficulty of the most serious nature. Hundreds of farms lying untenanted; farmers who continue in occupation keeping their heads above water with the greatest effort, a necessity widely recognized for a return of a considerable percentage of rent; the competition of foreign producers great and ever increasing, the cereal and animal food imported costing considerably over £100,000,000, and forming nearly a third of all the agricultural produce consumed in this Kingdom; widespread anxiety amongst every class connected with the land. Surely these are indications which should lead us, in common prudence, to review carefully any portion of our legal system which there is reason to suspect may discourage the development, or hamper the growth, of that agricultural industry on which the national welfare so largely depends. A state of the law which in quiet old-world times, or in the full flush of the unexampled prosperity of recent years was not severely felt, may become a great and intolerable evil when we need the full and free control of all our energies to strive with less favourable circumstances. It is, therefore, I venture to think, not inopportune at the present time to ask the House to consider the expediency of dealing with a law intimately affecting the state of agriculture—a law which is peculiar, and exceptional in character, and, as I think I shall be able to show, unjust and mischievous in its operation. In proposing the abolition of distraint for rent of agricultural holdings in England and Ireland, I am encouraged by the fact that this House has lately affirmed, as regards another portion of the United Kingdom, the principle for which I contend. The effect of my Motion would substantially be to assimilate the law in the various portions of the United Kingdom. I have no intention of asking the House to listen to any minute account of the various theories which have been held as to the origin of the Law of Distress, or to any detailed narration of the stages by which it has arrived at its present state. Distress is one of those primitive institutions which are found in various systems of ancient law. In a primitive society, where the help of a Court of Justice was not to be obtained, taking goods by distress was the simplest and most effectual means of compelling the person against whom it was employed to make the satisfaction required of him. Sir Henry Maine points out that—

“All forms of distress, the seizure of wife, child, or cattle, even when wholly unregulated by law, were improvements on older custom. The primitive proceeding was undoubtedly the unceremonious, unannounced attack of the tribe or the man stung by injury on the tribe or the man who had inflicted it. Any expedient by which sudden plunder or slaughter was adjourned or prevented was an advantage even to barbarous society. Thus, it was a gain to mankind as a whole, when its priests and leaders began to encourage the seizure of property or family, not for the purpose of permanent appropriation, but with a view to what we should not now hesitate to call extortion.”

In England, distress is a remedy so ancient that it is probably coeval with the Common Law itself, or, rather, it may be considered one of those principles which collectively constitute that system which we denominate the Common Law. The earliest mention of it is in an enactment of Canute, when we find it already established in an advanced state of maturity. The successive stages by which this ancient right of personal redress became converted into a remedy for the exclusive benefit of a single class of creditors—namely, the owners of land, may be traced in a great number of Statutes from the time of William the Conqueror and the Great Charter to the present reign. The first adoption of distress, as a means of recovering rent and enforcing the discharge of the other feudal liabilities, was a mitigation of the ancient rigour. For a long time, under the feudal system, the slightest failure on the part of the tenant was punished by an absolute forfeiture of the feud. At a later period, on each default on the part of the tenant, instead of forfeiture, the lord entered upon the feud and held possession till such time only as he had obtained satisfaction for his damages. This method, however, was found on trial to be scarcely less oppressive than the previous one, for it generally deprived the tenant of his only means of supplying the default, and thus amounted, in effect, to the very punishment it was intended to extenuate. In process of time a still more gentle remedy was introduced by substituting the seizure of the cattle and other movables found on the land, the lord being entitled to impound and detain the things taken as pledges to compel the performance of the pledges required by the feudal contract. A distress in its ancient form may, therefore, be defined as—

“The taking without legal process of a personal chattel from the possession of the wrongdoer or defaulter into the hands of the party grieved, to be held as a pledge for the redress, performance, or satisfaction required.”

The modern relation of landlord and tenant gradually came into existence. As Blackstone describes it—

“The feudatories being under frequent incapacities of cultivating and manuring their own lands, soon found it necessary to commit part of them to inferior tenants, obliging them to such returns in service, corn, cattle, or money as might enable the chief feudatories to attend their military duties without distraction—which returns were the original of rent.”

Various provisions were adopted as a remedy against unjust and excessive distresses. Yet a learned writer describes the effect of the system in these words—

“Notwithstanding these provisions, the unbridled independence and tyranny of the barons during the civil wars which endangered the throne of the immediate successors of the Conqueror turned distress into an engine of private revenge and public violence. Unjust pretences of distress were falsely alleged, tenants and strangers alike outraged, suit and service wrongfully compelled, exorbitant reliefs demanded, illegal fines extorted, excessive distresses made, the regulations of replevin disregarded; in fine, every wrong practised for the oppression of the weak and the aggrandizement of the powerful.”

Legislation was for a long time directed towards protecting the tenant from the oppression of the lord; and by a long series of Statutes, and Magna Charta itself, it was sought to soften the severity of the remedy. The last of these mitigating Statutes was passed in the reign of Philip and Mary, enacting that a distress should not be impounded in several places so as to compel the party to sue several replevins. From the reign of Henry VIII. down to the present time, there has been a complete change in the spirit of legislation. We find a long series of Statutes, nearly every one of which has been passed with the object of improving the remedy in the hands of the landowner, the result being what has not unfairly been described as “an almost unique specimen of one-sided legislation.” I shall not attempt to go through those Statutes with any minuteness. The most important of them was that passed in the reign of William and Mary, which completely altered, in favour of the landlord, the ancient character of the remedy. This was, in the words of Lord Chief Baron Gilbert—

“To empower the lord by seizing the chattels to oblige the tenant to perform the feudal services, the chattels remaining in the lord's hands as pledges to compel the performance, and the detention being no longer lawful than while the tenant refused to do the services which were reserved by the feudal contract.”

The Statute of William and Mary gave, for the first time, the distrainer power to sell the distress for satisfaction of the rent and charges. Among other rules of the Common Law relative to the subjects of a distress, one was that things belonging to the freehold were not distrainable; and another, that nothing should be distrained which could not be restored in as good condition as that in which it was when it was taken. By the former of these rules, landlords were prevented from distraining growing crops on the tenant's lands, and by the latter from taking corn, even after it had been cut. A subsequent section of the same Statute of William and Mary enabled the landlord to distrain corn in sheaves, or cocks, or loose, or in the straw, or hay in barns, ricks, or otherwise, as well as other chattels. A Statute of George II. further empowered him to distrain growing corn, grass, hops, fruits, roots, pulse, or other product of the land, and to cut and gather them when ripe to be disposed of in satisfaction of the rent. A Statute of Anne gave the power of distress to persons entitled to rent in arrear upon lease six months after the determination of the term, and the same Statute gave the right to follow and distrain goods clandestinely or fraudulently removed—a power which was subsequently enlarged by an Act of George II. In the reign of George II. the ancient rule of the Common Law, which caused the remedy to be attended with considerable risk, that if the party distraining were guilty of any irregularity in making or conducting the distress he thereby became a trespasser ab initio, was set aside, and it was provided—"That, for any irregularity committed in making or conducting a distress for rent, the party guilty of it shall not be deemed a trespasser ab initio, but that damages shall be recovered by the person aggrieved by such act, in proportion to the injury sustained."

Two years later, another great innovation took place by an Act of the same Sovereign, extending the existing provisions for the recovery of rent by distress in cases of rent reserved upon lease to all cases of rent seck, rents of assize, and chief rents. The Statute of Limitations as to real property enacts that no person shall distrain for rent but within 20 years next after the time when the right to distrain first accrued, and provides that no arrears of rent shall be recovered by distress but within six years next after the same shall have become due, or next after an acknowledgment of the same in writing. By an Act passed in the present reign, a tenant's growing crops, taken in execution and sold, and remaining on the premises for the purpose of being reaped, are distrainable by the landlord for rent become due after the taking into execution. Woodfall, in his Text-Book on the Law of Landlord and Tenant, points out that, in consequence of this enactment, which was hastily passed for the benefit of landlords immediately after a decision to the contrary, the tenant's crops can only be sold under an execution for their value, less the rent to which they may become liable, and the costs of a distress; but the landlord may afterwards abstain from distraining, and so in effect benefit the purchaser pro tanto at the tenant's expense, after which he may sue the tenant for such rent, or distrain upon his other goods for the amount. A Statute of Anne provides that no goods shall be removed by the Sheriff under an execution from the demised premises, until one year's rent, if so much be due, is first paid to the landlord, otherwise the Sheriff will be personally liable in an action founded on the Statute. The law, in cases of bankruptcy and liquidation, is thus laid down in the Bankruptcy Act, 1869—

"The landlord, or other person to whom any rent is due from the bankrupt, may, at any time either before or after the commencement of the bankruptcy, distrain upon the goods or effects of the bankrupt for the rent due to him from the bankrupt, with this limitation, that if such distress or rent be levied after the commencement of the bankruptcy, it shall be available only for one year's rent accrued due prior to the date of the order of adjudication; but the landlord or other person to whom the rent may be due from the bankrupt may prove, under the bankruptcy, for the overplus due for which the distress may not have been available."

It might be supposed from this that in case of insolvency the landlord's priority is limited to one year's rent. Practically, this is not the case. If the distress is put in at any time before the debtor, though long insolvent, has actually been declared bankrupt, it will be in the power of the landlord, who has stood by and allowed arrears to accumulate, to sweep off everything to the full amount of six years' rent, even though nothing be left for the other creditors. There are two Acts of the present reign which it is hardly necessary to mention—namely, those which have been passed for the protection of the goods of lodgers and of railway rolling stock from distress. The simplest form of distress, and that which bears the most evident traces of the primitive institution, is the impounding of stray cattle. This kind of distress has been little affected by legislation, and still remains very much as it was at Common Law. There is no power of sale. It does not arise out of the relation of landlord and tenant, and is founded on the principle of recompense which justifies a person in retaining that which occasions injury to his property till amends be made by the owner. With this ancient remedy, however, we had nothing to do. We may likewise dismiss from consideration the various statutory executions—distresses for poor's rates, distresses under the authority of Inclosure and other Acts, distresses to recover duties or debts due to the Crown. As a learned writer observes, although such proceedings are in the old books constantly termed distresses, they are, in fact, executions, prerogative executions, by seizure and sale. My Motion is confined to the power enjoyed by the landlord to distrain for non-payment of rent, and here it applies only to one class of tenancy—namely, agricultural holdings. Various considerations have led me not to propose to deal with the power of distress for the rent of houses in towns. It is quite true that, to some extent, the same principles apply to urban and rural tenancies; but, in the practical aspect of the question, there is a great difference.

I have been guided by the course the House has taken with respect to Scotland, it having clearly been considered desirable not to deal in the same way and at the same time with urban and rural hypothec. It is obvious that the evils produced by a preferential claim for rent are of much less magnitude in the case of town dwellings, where rent is only a small portion of a tenant's expenditure, and the fact of occupation has not the same tendency to mislead, than as in the case of farms, where the rent is a large and important item, and where the mere fact of being accepted as a tenant is calculated to create a feeling of confidence in the minds of others. What I have to ask the House to consider is, therefore, the landlord's right to distrain for the rent of farms. The slight glance I have attempted to take at the history of distress has, I hope, been sufficient to show that though the remedy itself is ancient, the peculiar form it now has is of comparatively recent introduction, and is, in fact, entirely different from its original character. So far as it is ancient, it is derived from a state of society and social circumstances totally different from the conditions of modern life. So much I have felt bound to say, in venturing to move the abolition of a law which existed in the days of Canute. After all, it is a practical question which we have to decide. Is the Law of Distress, whatever its history and origin may be, suited to the circumstances of the present day? Is it good, or is it bad, for the country? Does it promote, or does it hinder, agricultural improvement? By these tests it must stand or fall, and I shall endeavour to apply them fairly to it. The first point that must strike everyone, in considering this law, is its highly exceptional character. As Mr. Howard Taylor has well put it—

"It is not only a class law, but a class exception from law, rendering the landlord, as compared with ordinary creditors, a chartered libertine."

Distress is one of the few cases in which the law permits a man to take his remedy into his own hands. It is what Blackstone calls—

"An extra-judicial or eccentric form of remedy—namely, that which is obtained by the mere act of the parties themselves."

Such remedies can only be excused by some pressing necessity requiring more speedy redress than can be had in the ordinary forms of justice. "It is against reason," says Littleton, "if wrong be done any man, that he thereof should be his own judge." The few other instances in which "the law allows a man to be his own avenger, or to administer redress to himself," are justified by an obvious necessity which it is impossible to plead in the case of a landlord seizing chattels of the tenant for non-payment of rent. They are self-defence, which is the first law of nature; the re-seizure of property, wife, or child, wrongfully taken, which might otherwise be destroyed or carried out of reach; entry on land, which another person without any right has taken possession of; the abatement or removal of nuisances, which, as matters of daily convenience, require an immediate remedy; lastly, the right of the person entitled to seize waifs, wrecks, and estrays, because the thing to be claimed is frequently of such a nature as might be out of the reach of the law before any action could be brought. Distress for rent differs from all these, not only in the absence of the pressing necessity, which is their sole justification, but also in the fact that it is a remedy for what is really a breach of contract. Even in the Scotch Law of Hypothec, the landlord seeking to sequester the tenant's property has to make application regularly for sequestration on reasons given to the Sheriff. I believe it would be impossible to find in our law another instance in which a man is allowed to take the law into his own hands in order to obtain a remedy for a breach of contract. The practical evils resulting from the arbitrary and ill-regulative nature of the proceeding by distress were clearly pointed out to the Select Committee of the House of Lords, which sat in 1869, to inquire into the Law of Hypothec. Mr. Henry James—the present hon. and learned Member for Taunton—was examined before the Committee, and, after pointing out that anyone could distrain—the landlord could either do it himself, or choose any person he thought fit for the purpose—he added—

"The result is that the class of persons executing such a process—it not being a very agreeable occupation—is formed generally of persons who are for the most part insolvent themselves, and who are not certainly sufficiently careful with respect to the due performance of their duties. They seize oftentimes a quantity of goods which is more than sufficient to satisfy the distress, and sell them to personal friends of their own at very much less than the real value. The result is that the tenant often has his whole household broken up, when a very small seizure would have sufficed to pay his rent. If he complains, he has to complain by action against the landlord for taking excessive distress. The effect is that great injustice is done to the tenant, and almost equal injustice is done to the landlord."

Mr. Blennerhassett

The present Lord Moncrieff pointed out the less severe operation of the Scotch Law of Hypothec, where, by the simple application for sequestration and taking an inventory, the security attaches, without the shock to the tenant's credit of going on to distrain, and taking possession of the goods. An Englishman boasts that his house is his castle; but it is a strange thing that the day after rent falls due, without notice, and without legal formality of any kind—a power which exists in the case of no other personal obligation whatsoever—some dirty and drunken ruffian may be called from the streets and sent to run riot upon your premises, inflicting incalculable damage, far beyond the amount of the claim against you, damage for which redress, if it be obtained at all, can only be sought by expensive and tedious legal process. It must, I think, be seen that such a power as this, however appropriate as an instrument in the hands of feudal lords to enforce the obedience of their vassals, is utterly out of harmony with the commercial principles which regulate the relations of the owners and hirers of land at the present day. I have endeavoured to show that distress is an anomaly and an anachronism, both as regards its nature and the means by which it is enforced. There are other respects in which it is an exceptional and peculiar law. It is a law which gives a preference to one class of creditors over all others. The general principle of law is that when a man is not able to pay his debts, his property shall be equally divided among his creditors. The Law of Distress creates a preferential claim, varying from one to six years' rent, according to the time when it is put in force in favour of one particular creditor. The Law of Hypothec, though limited, in the case of crops, to the rent of the year in which the crop is grown, and in the case of cattle to the current year's rent, gives a similar preferential claim—the difference is one of degree. The principle involved in this preference was one of the points investigated by the Select Committee. An attempt was made to show that the special preferential security enjoyed by the landowner resembles some other instances in which special rights over property are given to certain persons in preference to general creditors by the Commercial Law of this and other nations. As this is a matter on which great stress is laid on the part of the Committee, I am afraid I must trespass on the patience of the House with a somewhat dry and technical argument while I endeavour to get to the bottom of it. The argument in favour of hypothec is thus stated in the Report—

"Familiar instances of such a preference"—i. e. special preferential security—"are afforded by the lien that shipowners have on the cargoes of their ships for their freight, and by bottomry bonds, which give to their holders a prior claim over the other creditors of the shipowner for money lent for repairs necessary for the safety of the ship. In these cases, the law seems to have been suggested by its having been found convenient to afford special facilities for granting, and obtaining credit in the transactions to which it applies."

And further, in paragraph 10—

"It is well known that our Commercial Law allows holders of various kinds of property to pledge to particular creditors property of which they have the command, so as to give those secured a preference over other creditors in case of their bankruptcy. Much of our valuable trade could not be carried on without this facility for raising money. By the Law of Hypothec, the tenants of land or houses are, in fact, enabled virtually to pledge their crops, and the property on their premises, as a security to their landlords for their rents, just as a merchant, importing wine or sugar, may pledge the dock warrants that represent the property, in order to obtain money to carry on his business. When either farmers or merchants become bankrupt, such pledges are good against the general creditor."

In inquiring how far these instances of preferential security resemble "distress," it is necessary to bear in mind that distress and hypothec, though their practical operation may be similar, have had a different origin and are founded on totally different principles. I shall contend that the instances of preference referred to are substantially different from the right of hypothec, and do not carry us any way in disproving the exceptional character of that law. But, even if this were not the case, it would not prove that these preferences were similar to distress. The right of hypo-thee, like the hypothecation known in maritime law, is derived from the Roman Civil Law, and supplanted in Scotland the old Law of Distress. As the present Lord Moncreiff explained to the Committee, hypothec arises from a tacit contract, or contract arising by implication of law; it is a pledging to the landlord the property of the tenant while it remains in his possession by way of security for the rent. Distress, on the other hand, a relic of the old feudal power, though now used to enforce rights arising out of contract, is not founded on any implied contract or any notion of a hypothetical assignment of the tenant's goods. The right to seize strangers' goods disposes of this idea. As Mr. Taylor puts it—

“Can anything be more ridiculous than that any tenant should be imagined to create a security over his neighbours' chattels present and future for his—the assignors'—own debt, may, for his future non-existing debts, a charge shifting off or on according to the whereabouts of unscheduled, unspecified property, and without warning or consideration to the neighbour affected?”

This idea of a hypothecation, or pledging of the tenant's goods as a security for the rent, is perfectly inconsistent therefore with the nature of distress, and no substantial analogy between distress and maritime or other hypothecations can be maintained. I might safely leave the argument here; but to show the utter hopelessness of any attempt to defend either distress or hypothec, on the ground of a supposed resemblance between them and other preferential securities recognized by the law, it may be worth while to go a little further. Let us leave out sight the feudal origin of distress, and the absurdity of supposing that anyone could create a lien or security over the goods of another, not in his possession and without the knowledge of his owner, and let us look simply to the effect of distress as giving the landlord a preferential security for his rent, and inquire whether this preference is of the same character as that existing in maritime or other liens. Looked at in this way, the cases of distress and hypothec may be said to resemble one another, and the evidence given before the Committee is applicable to either the Scotch or the English Law. A lien is the right of a person in possession of goods to retain them until a debt due to him has been satisfied. It is merely a right to retain the possession of the goods, and depends on service rendered. The English law on the subject may be found in the evidence of Mr. James, at page 8 of the Blue Book, containing the Report of the proceedings of the Select Committee. Mr. James says—

“In our land no lien, in the proper sense of the word, can exist without possession. There may be hypothecation without possession, but to have a lien you must have possession. If, for instance, you sent cloth to be made into a coat, or if you sent your watch to be cleaned, the tailor or the watchmaker would have a lien upon those goods until he was paid; but I know of no case in which lien exists, without possession, actual or constructive. The first claim which the owner of a vessel has over the cargo for freight is a case in point, resting directly, like the liens of railway companies and other carriers, on services rendered and on possession.”

The witness subsequently referred to certain provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, by which the person having the lien may land goods and put them into bonded warehouses, and pointed out that this was a case of constructive possession by Statute. The essence of the contract of letting and hiring land involves the making over to the tenant, for the period of the demise, of the entire right to the use of the soil which produces the crop. No one, therefore, I think, will venture to maintain that the landlord is in possession, either actual or constructive, of the property of the tenant. Still less is he in possession of the property of a stranger, which is temporarily or accidentally on the premises. It is clear, therefore, that there is no likeness between the right of lien, as commonly known to the law, and the right of distraint. The question is now narrowed to the case of hypothecations, by which preferential security can be given over goods without a transfer of possession. The only instances of hypothecation in our law are those which have been so often pressed into service in discussions on hypothec—namely, what are called bottomry bonds and respondentia, arising out of the power intrusted to a master of a vessel, in consideration of money advanced for repairs necessary for the safety of the ship or cargo, to make the ship or cargo liable for repayment, when the voyage is safely performed. Nothing could more clearly betray the utter weakness of the case than the attempt to bolster it up by such analogy. In the first place, the lender in bottomry bonds cannot take the law into his own hands. He must, like any ordinary creditor, invoke the assistance of a Court to enforce his claims. Then the power of pledging ship or cargo rests upon absolute necessity. Without such a power, it might be impossible in a foreign port to raise the money necessary to put the ship in a safe state for the prosecution of her voyage. It is a power which the master is not entitled to exercise if he can raise money by other means on the credit of the owners. "Necessity alone," says Lord Stowell, "supports bottomry bonds; the absence of necessity is their undoing." I wish to speak with the utmost respect of the labours of the Select Committee; but I must confess that I have searched in vain through the evidence given before it for any grounds for the conclusions expressed in the paragraph of the Report which I have quoted. Some suggestions favourable to such a view may be found in the questions put to the witnesses, but the answers I fear can hardly have been deemed satisfactory. The evidence of an eminent English lawyer I have already referred to, and I do not think there was much comfort got out of that. A Scotch legal authority of the highest eminence, the Lord Advocate of the day, also gave evidence which was very much to the point, though not quite the same point as that indicated in the Report. At page 321 of the Blue Book, Lord Moncreiff is asked—

Mr. Blennerhassett

"Are there not cases in which there is a right of Hypothec over other matters as well as real estate; for instance, in what are called time charters when a person hires a vessel, the owner of the vessel having the first claim over the cargo as against all other creditors?"

The Lord Advocate replied—

"That, again, is one of the rights of lien arising out of the Merchant Law and out of the necessities of Commerce. I do not consider that there is an analogy."

At page 322, he is further pressed—

"Do you not consider the case of bottomry bonds an analogy?"

He answered—

"I do not; a bottomry bond is a wager in very difficult circumstances, under which the creditor advancing his money is to get a very large return in the event of the vessel arriving safe, and in the event of the vessel not arriving safe, he gets nothing at all. I do not think any great light is to be thrown upon the question of landlords' hypothec by these illustrations, excepting that it shows it is not inconsistent with the general principles of law, that where the risk is unusually disproportionate to the interest, there should be a special power of security."

This evidence, coming from so high an authority, does not seem to carry us very far in the direction of the Report. It requires a vivid imagination to see a resemblance between a vessel, out of repair in some strange and distant port, and unable to prosecute her voyage, with, perhaps, a perishable cargo on board, driven by sheer necessity to obtain, on any terms, the advance of money necessary for repairs, and an ordinary landowner seeking payment for his half-year's rent with all the ordinary means of legal redress at his disposal. What is a landlord's risk compared to that of a stranger who advances money on a ship which may never reach her destination? What, even, is the landlord's risk compared to that which is incurred by the ordinary creditors of the farmer, or by ordinary creditors in commercial transactions? His position, instead of being one of extraordinary risk, is one of pre-eminent advantage. He has great power and influence over the debtor. He can protect himself in a variety of ways. He selects his tenant, and has the best means of obtaining information as to his position and character. He can make any terms he thinks necessary for his safety. He may require payment in advance, or the name of some substantial person joined as co-tenant. He can demand surety, or may take a deposit in security. Above all, the loss which he can incur is extremely small when compared with that which may fall on the ordinary trader. The trader runs the risk of losing principal and interest. Land, happily, cannot take to itself wings and fly away, as money often seems to do, and the utmost the landlord, using ordinary diligence, can lose is the rent of his land for a short period—substantially, in fact, his risk is limited to what may be considered the interest on his capital. So far, therefore, from there being in the case of the landowner's claim for rent the special urgency and the high degree of risk which justify the preferency created by bottomry bonds, he is of all creditors the safest and the least in danger of loss. I must apologize to the House for having gone so minutely into this point. It really is not worth it. But I hope, by having done so, I shall have exploded a fallacy which can only have arisen from a confused way of thinking and a loose and inaccurate use of language. I have now endeavoured to show that the Law of Distraint for rent is not only exceptional as to its nature and the means by which it is enforced, but that it is also without parallel in our law, as a special preferential security in favour of one particular class of creditor over property not in his possession, and unsupported by the peculiar necessity which alone justifies such security in the few other instances in which the law allows it. It is hardly necessary to allude to bills of sale and to mortgages. A bill of sale is a conveyance of goods by a person owing money to a person from whom he borrows money by way of security. It is good neither against a landlord's claim for rent nor against creditors under a bankruptcy. A mortgage is conveyance of the land subject to a power of redemption. Neither of these has any resemblance to distraint. Distraint, being a remedy of such an exceptional character, and so contrary to the general spirit of the law, what justification can be pleaded in its defence? It is a privilege which illustrates the observation of Adam Smith, that—

"Laws frequently continue in force long after the circumstances which first gave occasion to them, and which could alone render them reasonable, are no more."

Not a few reasons, however, are given in support of the fairness and usefulness of this law. Of these, perhaps, the one apparently deserving the greatest consideration is that which we find in page 5, paragraph 11th, of the Report of the Select Committee. This paragraph is as follows :—

"It may be observed, moreover, that the landlord is necessarily in a position different from other creditors. A merchant, if he entertains any doubts as to a customer's solvency, can refuse to deal further with him, whereas a landlord, who lets his land on lease, parts with the control of it for a term of years; and as the condition usually inserted in a lease, that it shall be forfeited for non-payment of rent, cannot be enforced without legal process, a considerable time may, and frequently does, elapse before he can recover possession of the land, during which a fresh debt is accruing in the shape of rent from the tenant."

Mr. Blennerhassett

It would be obviously unjust, in dealing with the landowner's preferential claim, so as to place him, for the recovery of rent, on a level with other creditors, to neglect any peculiar circumstances in his position which would leave him at a disadvantage. That peculiar circumstances do to some extent exist must be admitted, and how they can in fairness be dealt with is a problem which confronts the advocates of the abolition of distraint. This point was directly put to Lord Moncreiff in his examination before the Select Committee. At page 306, he is asked this Question—

"The landlord's position is somewhat different, is it not, from that of a dealer in manures, or in artificial food, or anything of that kind, who might at once refuse to supply anything further to his customers?"

The answer is—

"I observe that in the evidence given before the Commission that illustration is very frequently used, and it is true to a certain extent. At the same time, a landlord has manifestly certain counterbalancing advantages which the ordinary creditor has not, and never can have."

At page 324, Lord Moncreiff says—

"I rather think that the landlord's position is a super-eminent one, and that he has a good deal more in his power than an ordinary creditor, and I do not think that even if the right of Hypothec were abolished, he would stand in a worse position than other creditors."

What Lord Moncreiff calls the "super-eminent position" of the landlord, and the high consideration attached by the law to his claim for rent, is capable of many illustrations. Perhaps none is more striking than the decision of the Courts in the well-known case of Davis against Gyde, which, so far as I am aware, has never been questioned. If a bill or note payable at a future day be given on account of an ordinary simple contract demand, for instance, for the price of goods sold and delivered, or even if it is given on account of a judgment debt, it will suspend the right to sue for the original demand until the time has arrived at which the bill or note was payable. In Davis against Gyde, it was held that it is otherwise where such an instrument is given on account of rent, for that being a debt of a superior degree, cannot be suspended by a security of an inferior class; and, therefore, if a landlord take a note of hand at three months, or a security for the rent under a bond, or agree to take interest on rent in arrear, he may nevertheless distrain the next day if he thinks proper. An undoubted peculiarity, however, in the landlord's position arises from the rule of law that rent does not become due until the end of the day on which it is made payable. Before that period has arrived the landlord must stand by, and although his land has been in the occupation of the tenant, he must allow the other creditors to sweep off everything. This is a grievance from which the power of distress does not protect him, for no distress can be made until the day after the rent has fallen due. It is obvious, however, that the remedy is, to a large extent, in the landlord's own hands. There is no objection in point of law to an agreement by which rent is made payable before the time for which it is to be paid has elapsed. In some districts, I believe, by a local custom, rent is payable as soon as the half-year begins, and this, of course, gives the landlord a right to his remedies immediately. Should this appear objectionable, it would be perfectly simple, though agricultural rents are ordinarily payable half-yearly, to reserve them at shorter intervals. Mr. Burton, a Lincolnshire solicitor, told the Select Committee that prudent solicitors often reserve rents quarterly as a protection to the landlord, without any intention of receiving them oftener than half-yearly. The faintest shadow of grievance would be removed if the law, following the principle of the Apportionment Act, by which rents, like interest on money lent, though payable at fixed periods, are considered as accruing from day to day, were to give the landlord, in case there is good ground for thinking that the tenant is verging on poverty, the rights of a creditor for the current rent, though the conventional time of payment had not arrived. Another peculiar feature of the landlord's position is the difficulty and delay he may have in getting possession when the rent is not paid, and further rent is constantly accruing. This will, no doubt, be fully dealt with by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), who has an Amendment on the Paper to the effect that the right of re-entry for the non-payment of rent should be made more simple and speedy. On general grounds I certainly look with favour on the Amendment; but I am anxious to hear by what particular means the hon. Member proposes to effect his purpose. Recent events make it necessary to subject such proposals to very close scrutiny. The action of ejectment is slow and troublesome. It may be prolonged at great hardship to the owner by an insolvent tenant's using dilatory pleas. The policy of the law recently has been to give in every case of truthful and undisputed debts a certain and easy mode of recovering them. For instance, on a bill of exchange, the defendant is prohibited from defending unless he shows that he has really a good defence and gets leave to defend. Whether rent is paid or not is a simple matter of fact, which should be easily and quietly ascertained, and when it is ascertained, the landlord should be put as speedily and inexpensively as possible into possession of his land. However, this is a branch of the subject, which, fully admitting its great importance, I am glad to leave in the able hands of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read.) I have attempted to show that by accompanying the abolition of distress with one or two minor or simple changes in the law, the landowner would be under no disability in any respect, as compared with other creditors, while he would continue to enjoy many great and peculiar advantages necessarily attached to his position. What would be the effect upon the condition of the tenant? One of the arguments most frequently urged against the abolition of Hypothec is that the landlord being deprived of his special security would insist upon an earlier payment of the rent. It is obvious that the postponement of rent is equivalent to a cash credit to the tenant for the time being. But, say the defenders of Hypothec, if this right be taken away, the system of deferred rents will be abandoned and forehand rents will be required. The merits of the Scotch controversy are not before us; but this argument does not apply to England, because what a Scotchman would call forehand renting is the almost universal practice here. Under the Scotch system of deferred renting, the first payment seldom takes place for less than 12 months, more frequently 15 or 18, and in some cases, even as much as 21 months after the tenant has entered upon a farm. In England the tenant generally speaking enters at Michaelmas, and pays his first half-year's rent at the Lady Day following, with such grace as the landlord chooses to allow him. It may be said, however, that if Distraint be abolished, the landlord will not be content with this, but will require payment in advance. No one can question the landlord's right to make any terms he may think necessary for his own protection. Should the absolute security of payment in advance be required, it would, like other special advantages, have to be discounted in the terms of the bargain. Anyone who wanted exceptional safety would have to pay for it. I have not the least fear, however, that any considerable number of owners would consider such a precaution necessary. Ordinary care in the selection of tenants, and properly-drawn covenants would give all the security that any reasonable man would think necessary. Another safeguard was pointed out by Mr. Makgill, an English witness of great agricultural experience, before the Royal Commission. He drew attention to the fact that along with the system of yearly leases there has grown up a system of tenant-right, which in some parts of the country has attained very large proportions, and which, being as it were a set-off, forms an important security to the landlord for the rent due. The tenant is entitled to certain repayments for manures, for cake, and for acts of husbandry actually performed on the land, so that the payments due to a tenant at his out-going may greatly exceed his last half-year's rent, and, in some cases, actually exceed the whole year's rent. In some parts of the country, as in Lincolnshire, the tenant-right is of still wider extent. It may be worth observing, here, that it is one of the peculiar hardships of the Law of Distraint, that no set-off or counter-claim on the part of the tenant interferes with the landlord's right of distress. Landlords, it may be argued, without distraint to rely on, will not show the same indulgence to tenants. But it may fairly be questioned whether it is proper that the law should protect landowners from risk, in granting indulgence to needy or insolvent tenants. They may do it out of kindness if they please. Business and sentiment must be kept apart. No doubt, it will be, so far as it goes, a loss to the tenant to be deprived of the extra credit with the landlord which he has under the present system. The question is whether the advantage is not one for which he pays too dearly. Preferential security to one creditor can only be given at extra risk to all other creditors. The credit which the farmer has with his landlord entails a loss of credit with every other person with whom he deals. The banker, the manure merchant, the seedsman, the implement maker, every person from whom the farmer buys, all know that, in dealing with him, they run a peculiar risk, and that, in the event of his becoming unable to meet the claims upon him, one creditor may, and often does, get 20s. in the pound, while the general body of the creditors are obliged to content themselves with an infinitesimal dividend. In a case that actually occurred, the landlord was paid in full, and the general creditors got one-halfpenny in the pound. The consequence is, that the tenant pays higher prices to cover extra risk, and obtains credit on less easy terms than if his position were not so uncertain. His general transactions, also, are unduly hampered, and he is prevented from disposing of his produce at the best times and on the most favourable terms. At a recent meeting of the Central Farmers' Club at which this question was discussed, Mr. Hodges, who is, I believe, an extensive farmer in Kent, showed by a practical illustration, what serious obstacles the present state of the law places in the way of business arrangements. In the county of Kent, he said, a great many occupiers of land were in the habit of selling their hay and other produce of that kind to persons in the Metropolis, and when the time came for removal to London, there were often great difficulties in the purchasers getting possession of the haystacks and so on for which they bargained. The consequence was, that the course of business was greatly interrupted, and often at a time when it was necessary that produce should be reduced into cash in order that engagements might be met, and men were in that way pushed, as it were, into the Bankruptcy Court. On the same occasion, Mr. Aveling, a member of a firm of agricultural implement makers at Rochester, said that last year his firm sold a set of steam-ploughing machinery of about £2,000 value to a farmer, from whom he had received excellent references. The machinery had, however, been at work only about two months, when he received a telegram on a Sunday morning to this effect—"Sorry to tell you a distress put in for rent, ploughing machinery in a neighbouring farm, get it if you can." By a piece of good luck, he was able to remove the machinery the same night, and so he lost nothing. They all knew, he added, that at the bottom of the circulars of the great waggon companies were the words, "deferred payments;" but how could anyone expect him or other manufacturers of agricultural machinery, to enter into a large contract with deferred payments in such a state of the law as that which now existed? It would be easy to multiply instances of the obstacles which liability to distress puts in the way of farmers, both in making the best terms in their dealings with the public, and in obtaining the credit of which they stand in need in order to carry on their operations successfully. It would be a great error to estimate the influence of the law by the number of cases in which a distress is actually carried out. These are comparatively rare. This was admitted to the Committee by Mr. Burton—a strong advocate for the retention of the law. He says—

Mr. Blennerhassett

"In England distresses are, comparatively speaking, very seldom resorted to compared to the extent to which the Law of Distress is always quietly operating."

In bankruptcy the assignees often pay without the landlord's distraining. The landlord's rights to his rent, by virtue of the Law of Distress, are constantly and quietly operating without actual distraining being resorted except as an exceptional thing. In like manner, the effect of the law in the tenant's credit is frequently severely felt where the possibility of a distress is never mentioned. A tenant, says Mr. Howard, formerly Member for Bedford, resorts to a banker for an advance to tide him over a crisis; of course, nothing is said by the banker or bank manager at the interview about the ugly question of the Law of Distress, and it probably never once crosses the mind of the would-be borrower. But is anyone simple enough to suppose that it is absent from the mind of the banker when he very blandly informs him that he can be accommodated with the advance, only, he adds, reliable security will be expected? The influence of distress in stimulating an unhealthy and unsound competition for land, and raising rent above its natural economic level, is extremely mischievous. No one can desire on public grounds that land should be let for less than its full value. The landowner who accepts less than a full rent may confer a favour on the individual who hires his land as he would if he made him a present, but he does no public service, and it is no part of the duty of the State to encourage him so to act. But where rent of land is determined by competition, by what is called "the higgling of the market," sound commercial principles should prevail. Protection should not be given to the owner of a certain commodity by which he may be led to neglect the ordinary precautions of business, and to grasp at a price which is not justified by the circumstances of the property he has to dispose of. The landlord's priority is a premium held out to him by the State to neglect the ordinary precaution of selecting suitable tenants with adequate capital, and it is also a direct inducement to persons without means or skill to enter into a reckless competition for the hire of a commodity which they can employ neither with profit to themselves nor advantage to the country. Nothing of greater weight could be adduced on this point than the evidence before the Royal Commission of one of the best known and most successful farmers of Scotland, Mr. William Scott of Timpendean. Mr. Scott speaks with immediate reference to Hypothec, but the principle involved is precisely the same. He says—

"I think the effect of the abolition of the Law of Hypothec would be to improve farming. There would be a much better class of tenants than many who now offer for farms and get them. I think it would lower the rents a little at first, though I have no doubt they would afterwards come up to the same amount. A number of the present successful offerers for farms have neither skill nor capital, and a man without both has no chance. I have known landlords take such men. . . . I have known tenants get farms who ought to have been bankrupt at the time they were taking them. If the law were abolished, tenants with capital would be sure, that in offering for farms, they were competing on equal terms, and not against men that had nothing to lose. At present, it is a mere speculation with men that have no capital—a sort of 'heads I win, tails you lose.'"

The effect of reckless letting of land in creating a fictitious rental is by no means limited to the land so let in the first instance. The example is contagious. If hon. Members will turn to the Report of the Royal Commission of 1864, page 122, they will find the process described by that eminent agriculturist, the late Mr. Hope of Fenton Barns—

“A landlord advertises a farm and lets it to the highest bidder (at say £4 per acre). If I am going to value any land near it, my mind is naturally biased to see if this farm I am going to value is worth £4 an acre. I say, ‘Here is one, it may not be so good, let at that sum; the farm I value must be £4 an acre too.’ While the man who took the farm that was advertised does not pay his rent; very probably getting a reduction of rent in a year or two.”

The true principle was elicited by a noble Lord, a Member of the Select Committee, in his examination of Mr. William Scott. The noble Lord, who evidently totally misapprehended the position of the advocates of the abolition of hypothec, asks Mr. Scott—

“Do you consider it to be consistent with Free Trade principles that the State should prescribe to the landlords upon what system they should manage their estates? Answer—I do not. Do you consider that it is consistent with those principles that they should be required by law to be prudent, and to choose tenants with capital instead of others? Answer—Not at all. Therefore, if under the present law the landlord is imprudent and chooses tenants without capital, that is his own affair, is it not? Answer—Not at all under the present law, because he is protected at the public expense; at the expense of other creditors.”

This is exactly how the case is. Without dreaming for a moment of any interference with the landlord's right to manage his property as he thinks fit and to let his farms to whoever he pleases, we do protest most earnestly against a law which affords him special immunity from the results of a want of care and prudence which in other transactions would be disastrous, and which encourages him in a course of proceeding which presses hardly on the competent and solvent farmer, and is highly injurious to the general interests of agriculture. When trade hardly existed, and land was held under feudal tenures, the power of distraint may not have been felt as an injury and inconvenience. But all this has passed away, and landowners now find their best interests are bound up with the commercial treatment of land. The scientific discoveries and mechanical improvements, which have increased the productive powers of the soil and swelled so enormously the rent-rolls of its owners, have made farming a pursuit quite different from the simple culture of by-gone days. Successful farming now requires the control of a large capital, and involves heavy and complicated business transactions in many quarters, and with all sorts of persons. The modern farmer is a man of business who needs the full control of all his resources, and the free use of all his energies. If you fetter and cramp his commercial freedom in the rusty bonds of antiquated privilege, he will be overmatched in the fierce strife of world-wide competition; and, with falling rent and diminished production, you will mourn, when it is too late, that decline in British agriculture which a selfish and shortsighted policy will inevitably produce. The farmer is no longer shielded by protective duties in the disposal of his produce; he has to face the competition of the world. The fresh unexhausted soils, the low rents, and the light taxes of new countries, with the wonderful improvement in the means of transport, bring dangerous competitors to his very door. The present position of the English farmer taxes to the uttermost the powers even of the strongest. In better times, it is full of anxiety. In 1869, Mr. Wilson, of Edington, wrote to the Chairman of the Select Committee a letter, pointing out in forcible language the peculiar risks attendant upon the farmers occupation—

“When a man enters into a farm he at once invests his means, usually his whole means, in a concern beset with very great risks indeed, and which yields smaller average profits than any business employing a similar amount of capital and labour. What may be called its natural risks, arising from adverse seasons, and from disease and death of live stock, are always very great, besides which there are those which it has in common with other occupations from fluctuations in markets, bad debts, and the dishonesty or carelessness of servants. In the case of a farm let on lease for a term of years, the tenant comes betwixt the landlord and all those risks, and also keeps its fixtures in repair, and insures them against fire. The landlord gets his rent term by term, whether there has been a profit or no; and if the farm proves to be rented above its value, or if disasters befall the tenant, it often enough happens that he has to leave it a ruined man, although all the rents have been paid in full. It is surely unbecoming to manifest such anxiety to have the interests of the naturally strong party, whose risks are small, fenced and secured in every possible way, while those of the weaker party, whose risks are so great, are deemed unworthy of notice.”

Mr. Blennerhassett

But there are other persons to be considered as well as landlords and tenants. If the landlord's claim on the estate of an insolvent be paid in full, the dividends applicable for the discharge of all the other claims must, of course, be diminished. I do not know that implement-makers, or dealers in manures, seeds, or feeding stuffs, have any special claim to regard; but, certainly, if service done should be remembered, they deserve the utmost consideration at the hands of landowners. Without their energy and enterprize, anything like the present standard of rent would have been impossible. They do not profess to be animated by philanthropic motives, but they seek no exceptional favours. They are men of business; but they do expect that those who reap so rich a harvest from their labours will not deny them fair commercial equality in their dealings with those with whom they conduct their transactions. Every improvement, by which the expenses of cultivation are lowered and the cost of production diminished, cheapens the price of food and is a general advantage to the community. Landowners, however, derive a special advantage from these improvements. Ultimately, indeed, the whole advantage is absorbed by them. Farmers, who use improved machinery or manures may profit by them for a time; but if the expenses of production are thereby permanently diminished, they will be able, with the same margin of profit, to pay more rent, and the competition of capital will soon oblige them to do so. Nothing in the operation of the Law of Distraint offends more strongly against one's ordinary sense of justice than the consequences which proceed from the principle that it is the place where they are found, and not the persons to whom they belong, that renders them liable to distress. It is hard that agricultural implements, tiles, manures, and other property which have not been paid for, should be distrained for the rent of the land on which they are found. It is harder, still, that cattle and sheep, sent upon a farm for temporary keep, and which are not the property of the tenant at all, but belong to some innocent third person, should be seized and sold for arrears of rent. A case, showing the monstrous abuse to which this law may lead, occurred not long ago in Kent, and attracted considerable attention. The facts were publicly stated at a meeting of the East Kent Chamber of Agriculture, held at Canterbury last October, and a strong feeling of indignation was expressed. I refer to the case of Lake and Duppa. Mr. James Lake, the aggrieved party, told his story to the meeting, and the facts, I believe, are undisputed. Mr. Lake said that he had been in the habit for many years of sending his lambs, as soon as they were weaned, on to a hill occupied by a neighbouring tenant-farmer, to eat off the aftermath. Having been very unwell lately, Mr. Wood, who managed those things for him, put out his lambs for him this year; and he had received a report from Mr. Wood which contained a complete statement of what had occurred. On the 25th September two men were sent over to bring the lambs back, when they found Mr. George Duppa, the landlord, in possession of the farm. The broker was not there then, but arrived shortly afterwards, and refused to give up the lambs, although well aware to whom they belonged. On the following Wednesday, Mr. Wood called on Mr. Hoare, Mr. Duppa's solicitor, and was referred by him to Mr. Duppa himself, who said he should sell the sheep. On Monday, the 30th September, a bill of the sale was brought to Mr. Wood, and the sale took place on the 2nd October. Mr. Lake said they would see from this that on the 24th September Mr. Duppa seized these lambs, no bill of sale came out until Monday, the 30th, and on Wednesday the lambs were sold; so that really, if Mr. Wood had not happened to be on an adjoining farm, the sheep would have been sold, and the owner, Mr. Lake, would not have known anything about it. It appeared there was four years' rent in arrears, which, with expenses, amounted to £495. The rent of the farm was £112. It was raised from £80 to £112 when Mr. Duppa bought the land, and it was four years' rent at £112 that the distress was for. The tenant's effects realized £135—a great deal more than they were worth—and his, Mr. Lake's, 160 lambs sold for £360, making £495 in all; so that Mr. Duppa had actually got £350 of his in hard cash. He thought the state of things thus revealed ought not to be allowed to exist in any civilized country. Comment on this case is unnecessary.

The facts speak for themselves. Distress has been defended on the ground that the relation between landlord and tenant is a sort of partnership, giving the landlord a claim for his rent upon what is found on the land. But what is the meaning of such language, applied to such a case as this? What partnership or quasi-partnership existed between Mr. Lake, the owner of the lambs, and Mr. Duppa, the owner of the land? How can it possibly be argued that Mr. Lake's lambs were Mr. Duppa's share of the produce of the farm? I pass on to glance very briefly on the effect of the abolition of Distraint on the position of the landowner. I may say, in passing, that I approach this question not as a farmer or as a dealer in implements, manures, or anything of the sort. My income is derived from the ownership of land, and it is because I believe the abolition of Distress would be conducive not only to the general welfare of the country, but also to the true interests of the landowners, that I bring forward this Motion. It has been urged by those in favour of the existing law, that if it were abolished, the landlord's power of raising money for the improvement of his estate would be greatly diminished, as anything which tends to impair the security of rent tends necessarily to improve the mortgagee's security for the payment of interest. This objection was stated in the draft-Report submitted to the Select Committee by the Chairman, Lord Airlie; but as it does not appear in the Report ultimately adopted, it may fairly be assumed that the Committee were unable to find evidence to support it. Let us turn for a moment to the evidence itself. Witnesses of great experience and authority were examined on the point. At page 5 of the Report, Mr. James is asked—

"Supposing the right of Distress to be abolished, and that security, if it is a security, taken away, would the lenders of money on mortgage find it necessary to require either a large margin in lending on the security of land, or to raise the rate of interest, or perhaps to do both?"

Mr. James replies—

"I do not think it would affect that in the slightest degree. I think the mortgagee does not look to the rent he could get by distress, but he looks rather to what he could realize by bringing the property into the market and selling it after foreclosing. It is only after foreclosing that the mortgagee has the power of getting his principal back by a sale. I do not think the abolition of the right of Distress would affect loans on mortgages at all."

So much for the opinion of a lawyer of great experience. Now what does a practical agriculturist say? At page 58 of the Report of the Select Committee, Mr. Scott, of Timpendean, gives this answer—

"In the case of mortgages, I don't think it would be more difficult for landlords to raise money upon land. It is not usual for landed property to be borrowed upon to its full value; and, in the next place, proprietors scarcely ever have four or five tenants failing at once. There would be as much from the good tenants as would pay the interest."

One witness, and one only, expressed a contrary opinion; but I think it must be felt that, in his anxiety to prove too much, this gentleman deprived his evidence of any weight whatsoever. At page 11 of the Blue Book this question was put to Mr. Burton—

"Of course, if the security were impaired, I suppose lenders would either require a larger margin or a higher rate of interest?"

Mr. Burton scorns this idea of nicely balanced less or more, and replies—

"No; they would not be tempted at all. We should decline to lend."

And he adds—

"No solicitor would lend money with the possibility of getting his clients into jeopardy of being disappointed of their incomes."

I do not think I go too far in saying that no weight can possibly be attached to the views of a man who could commit himself to such a reckless assertion as this. If the power of Distraint were abolished, what security for money lent would be better than a mortgage on real property, with the usual margin and power of sale in default of payment of principal or interest? The rate of interest and the facility of obtaining loans depends, of course, on the state of the Money Market, which is constantly being acted upon by a great variety of causes; but the idea of saying that if this right of Distress—of which only under the rarest circumstances a lender on landed estates ever avails himself, and which we are assured on high authority seldom or never enters into his consideration in arranging a loan—were taken away, no temptation would induce lenders to advance money on mortgage, is a statement so extravagant that it would be mere waste of time to dwell upon it. I do not know how much of the money raised on mortgage is spent on the improvement of the land—I imagine not a very large portion of it; but, however this may be, the attempt utterly broke down which was made to show that the abolition of Distraint would injuriously affect the power of raising money on landed security. It is said that if the special security afforded by distress be taken away, the value of land will be diminished, and rents will fall. So far as distress stimulates a fictitious and unhealthy competition, and landowners, relying upon it, are induced to let their farms to reckless bidders without capital or knowledge, rents, thus raised above the proper level, would temporarily fall; but, in the long run, rents artificially stimulated in this way must fall, and they are highly injurious to owners. The amount which a landlord can get must ultimately depend upon the net produce of the soil; it is only by increasing this that the substantial value of his property can be raised. If a needy or ignorant tenant promises an excessive rent, he may pay it for a time; but things will adjust themselves after a bit, and the land, neglected and exhausted, will fall even below its former value. No better illustration can be found than that which is used by Mr. Taylor in his pamphlet. He points out that the true interest of the landholding class, as a class, is something very different from the immediate pecuniary advantages of all the present recipients of rent.

Mr. Blennerhassett

“Were a railway company suddenly and arbitrarily to raise its rates, the income of some shareholders would be greatly augmented, because the alienated traffic could not simultaneously be divided. Yet to the permanent shareholder such a course were ruin, and to the company, as a company, suicide. On the other hand, reduction of rates or judicious outlay may decrease the present dividend, while developing new traffic and assuring a prosperous future.”

Owners, we are told, would decline to let their lands, and would farm them themselves. This is not probable; we see every day farms coming into the owners' hands, and the owners preferring even to let them at lower rents rather than incur the risk and trouble of keeping them themselves. If this were the effect, however, we have the high authority of Adam Smith to show that it would be far from an evil. In The Wealth of Nations he points out how important it is that the landlord should be induced to cultivate a part of his own land. His capital is generally larger than that of the tenant, and with less skill he can frequently raise a greater produce. The landlord can afford to try experiments, and is generally disposed to do so. His unsuccessful experiments occasion only a moderate loss to himself; his successful ones contribute to the improvement and better cultivation of the whole country. The fact is that the landowner's interest is strictly and inseparably connected with the interests of the community. Whatever either promotes or obstructs the one necessarily promotes or obstructs the other. If the maintenance of this law is injurious to the general interests of agriculture, then it is necessarily injurious to the interests of the landowner rightly understood. An artificial exception from the principles of law which attracts into a certain business persons destitute of the qualifications necessary to work that business properly, and which exposes persons possessed of those qualifications to an unfair and injurious rivalry, must lower the character of the business and hinder its development. Neither does it benefit the unhappy persons led into a struggle for which they are unequal. Several witnesses pointed out to the Select Committee the strong objections to a law which gives countenance and currency to the delusion that farming is a business which a man may safely engage in with the very slenderest means, if only he be steady and industrious, and have a good knowledge. Mr. John Wilson said—

“It is very saddening to think of the multitude of such men who, by attempting to farm on such terms, have speedily lost every penny of their hard-earned little stores, and of the still greater numbers who in the same way have consigned themselves to a lifetime of care, and privation, and ill-required toil.”

The Law of Distress holds out a premium to landowners to accept as tenants persons with insufficient capital. I do not say that they generally do so, but so far as the Law of Distress influences their selection this must be its effect. It would be easy to show how injurious this is to the public welfare. The interest of the community is that the greatest possible amount of produce should be raised at the least possible cost. Authorities are united in deploring the evil of insufficient capital in agriculture. Lord Derby, some years ago, expressed his belief that we might double our production as a nation were sufficient capital employed in cultivation. How foolish and mischievous, then, to maintain a law which practically discourages the application of capital to the land? What we want is thoroughness and quality of cultivation; yet we encourage farmers in that misguided desire, which is so general amongst them, to hold too much land in proportion to their capital. Mr. Wilson says—

“Let any observant person travel over the country, and in all parts of it he will find instances of farms lying alongside of each other, and with equal natural advantages, which, nevertheless, exhibit a very remarkable contrast, as regards their productiveness. When such cases are inquired into, it will usually be found that the difference is due, not to the greater skill and energy of the more successful occupiers but mainly that he is conducting his business with the advantage of sufficient capital, while his neighbour is straightened in that respect.”

The example of foreign countries may be referred to, but I do not think it will carry us any way in defence of this law. In some parts of the Continent the landlord is privileged as against other creditors, in others he is not. In Finland he has a preference only if he is a nobleman. In some countries he is privileged if the payment be in kind, but if it be in money he is only a simple creditor. Distress was adopted by the States of America as a portion of the Common Law of England, but it does not appear to have thriven there. In the answers to questions concerning the law in the United States, which appear in the Supplementary Appendix to the Report of the Select Committee on Hypothec, page 4, Mr. Carlisle, the Legal Adviser to the United Legation, says—

“In a few of the States only is the Common Law remedy of Distress preserved. The general tendency and spirit of the legislation of late years has been, not only to abolish this summary remedy, but to place landlords quite on the same footing with other creditors, leaving the parties to make their own contracts in their own way, touching security for the payment of rent.”

At page 5, Mr. Carlisle adds—

“Generally in all the States, rent is not required to be paid in advance; but many landlords, especially in the case of monthly tenants of the poorer classes—

This, of course, refers to small urban tenements—

“stipulate for payment in advance. Some security for the punctual payment of the rent is found in very summary and cheap remedies, provided by law, for ejecting the tenant for default of payment.”

My Motion applies to Ireland as well as to England. I have hitherto dealt with the question chiefly from the English point of view, and I do not know that there is much in the case of Ireland which calls for special observation. The law is more restricted there in several respects. It is limited to one year's rent. A proposal to take away the right of Distress, as far as the general operation of the law is concerned, was one of the provisions of the Irish Land Bill which Mr. Fortescue, on the part of Lord Russell's Government, laid before the House of Commons in 1866. I have here a letter from a gentleman whose name will be familiar to most Irish Members—Mr. Hussey, the most extensive land-agent in Ireland. Mr. Hussey, who deals as agent with from 5,000 to 6,000 tenants, does not consider Distress needed for the security of rent, and says that on the estates he manages it has not been used for 15 or 20 years. In fact, on well-managed Irish estates it is a power which is never put in force. There is considerable apprehension, however, that in the present depressed state of Irish agriculture, this rusty weapon of rural tyranny may be drawn forth again. So far as I am aware, the better class of resident landowners and agents do not consider the maintenance of the law necessary for their protection. On the other hand, those bodies which represent the opinion of the farmers, have expressed a decided wish for its abolition. The Central Tenant's Defence Association, at a recent meeting in Dublin, unanimously adopted a resolution calling upon the Irish Members to support this Motion. The Kerry Tenants' Defence Association, the Wexford Association, and various other bodies, have given expression to the same feeling. I have now only a few words to say with respect to the proposals of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read). The last of them I have already alluded to, and indicated the way in which I regard it. Had I been introducing a Bill instead of a Resolution, I would have endeavoured to frame a clause relieving the landlord from unnecessary difficulty or delay in re-entering upon his land in case of non-payment of rent, and I believe this could be effectually done with all due regard to the tenant's interest, and without hardship to anyone concerned. The other parts of the hon. Member's proposal are of a different nature. Regarded as independent propositions, no doubt, the limitation of Distress to one year's rent, and the proviso that the stock of a third party taken to graze should only be liable for the amount of consideration payable for the grazing would, so far as they go, be decided improvements in the law. The effect of the Amendments, however, would be to substitute these modifications of the law for the definite and comprehensive proposal that the law itself should cease to exist. A compromise, I know, possesses great attraction for many minds; but is this a case to which it is satisfactory or desirable to apply such a compromise? I cannot think so. There is a principle involved in the maintenance of this law which it will be far better to face boldly and finally. It is not easy to comprehend the position of the hon. Member for South Norfolk. At a recent meeting of the Central Farmers' Club he expressed strong opinions on this subject. He is reported as having used these words—

"My opinion is that the Law of Distress is wrong in principle. It allows a man to be his own avenger, which is, I consider, contrary to the spirit of our laws altogether. It also allows him to be an avenger of his wrongs in private."

A little further on, he says—

"I contend that this law is worse in principle than the almost doomed Law of Hypothec in Scotland."

The hon. Member's attitude, it is only fair to say, was the same then as it is now, and in that very speech before the Farmers' Club he announced his intention of moving the Amendment which now stands in his name. It is an Amendment objecting to the abolition of a law which he considers wrong in principle, and altogether contrary to the spirit of our laws. Can any good come of maintaining such a law as this? If it be so bad as the hon. Member thinks it, why not sweep it away at once, and have done with it? The hon. Member spoke and voted for the total abolition of Hypothec, and yet he strives to preserve this law, which, by his own contention, is worse in principle. What is the use of this timid and hesitating policy? How did it avail in the Scotch question? A very few years ago we passed an Act, greatly relaxing the severity of the law in that portion of the Kingdom. Then we had a Select Committee which summed up very ably the arguments against further change. But it was all in vain. Public opinion in Scotland went to the root of the matter. Public opinion had discerned a principle, and was resolved to carry that principle to its only logical conclusion. And this year we have had the second reading of a Bill to abolish the Law of Hypothec, supported by the Lord Advocate on the part of the Government and carried by a large majority. Why, then, this hesitation and delay? What can come of it but waste of public time and disturbance of public opinion? We should not be too eager to make changes in the law; but when the necessity for a change is proved, and the time for it is come, our legislation should proceed on clear and definite principles, and should be, as far as possible, a settlement of the question with which we deal. If you accept my Motion this subject will be forever set at rest; if you adopt a timid and hesitating middle course you will satisfy no one, and settle nothing. I am sorry to have been obliged to trouble the House at such length, but I cannot apologize for having done so. I could not venture, with due respect to the House, to present an incomplete case. I have no sympathy with persons who would propose to change any portion of our ancient laws without fully considering the reasons for, and carefully estimating the consequences of, their proposals. I ask the House to abolish an antiquated privilege which came into existence under social and political conditions totally different from those which now prevail amongst us—a privilege which is out of harmony with the spirit of modern institutions, and hostile to the full and free development of modern enterprise. One feature of the case I have not cared to dwell upon, though it is impossible to ignore it. The Law of Distraint is a class privilege in the strictest sense of the term. It is a privilege which has been created by the power and which is maintained for the benefit of class alone, and enjoyed by it at the expense and injury of every other class. In the long series of enactments which have shaped this law from the time of Henry VIII. to our own day, the dominant influence of the landowner is reflected. Shall we wait till the demand for the repeal of this law becomes a cry through the length and breadth of the land for the destruction of a class privilege? This should be no Party question. A few months ago, the Essex Chamber of Agriculture, as I am told, a highly Conservative body, adopted a resolution which is embodied in a Petition lately presented to this House, praying that as the Law of Distress is injurious to the best interest of the landlord, unjust to the tenant, and deceptive to the trader, it should be forthwith repealed. Public opinion is awake to its importance. Let us not permit this question to become an instrument of political agitation, or a means of severing those who ought to be united. Let us adapt our measure to the circumstances and wants of the time, and boldly and promptly, but with true prudence, efface from the Statute Book a law which is opposed to modern ideas, and unsuited to the conditions of modern industry. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Mr. B. WILLIAMS, in seconding the Resolution, said, that no one could justify the Law of Distress on any principle of jurisprudence. It enabled the landlord at his own will to enforce the payment of a debt which he thought due to him by the tenant, to be judge in his own case, and also executioner. The Law of Distress originated at a time when the tenant was bound to his lord not only as regarded his goods but his personal liberty, and it would never have continued to this day had not the landlords of this country exercised their rights with singular forbearance. That the law was unequal, and that it sometimes produced real injustice, no one who attended our Law Courts could deny. When the law was enforced the tenant was perfectly helpless. It was true there was the remedy of replevin, but it was a cumbersome, expensive, and dilatory process, and often involved the tenant in long and useless litigation. Whatever claim the tenant might have against the landlord, if any rent was due the landlord had the right to enter and distrain. The law with regard to excessive distress had been laid down entirely in favour of the landlord. Mr. Justice Bailey had said—

Mr. Blennerhassett

"The landlord is not bound to calculate very nicely the value of the property seized, but he must take care that some proportion is kept between the sum he is entitled to levy for and the sum he is entitled to take."

And Baron Parke had ruled still more tersely—

"To determine whether the distress was excessive, you must ascertain what the goods seized would fetch at a broker's sale."

The landlord, acting on that view of the law, could seize large portions of the tenant's property and confiscate them. In Wales the practice of distress was seldom resorted to, landlords preferring arbitration for a settlement of whatever differences they might have with their tenantry. The difficulties of the tenant had been increased by the Judicature Act of 1875, which enabled the landlord to reply to the tenant's action for excessive distress by allegations of breach of covenant or bad farming. Counter-claims of that kind ought to be regarded with jealousy by the Courts as the suggestions of legal ingenuity, but unfortunately they were not. A case came before him last year in the course of his professional practice, in which a distress was levied on a large farmer in the North of England, who had a valuable stock on his farm, and the property was sold in a most wasteful manner and for most inadequate prices. The tenant, acting on advice, brought an action for excessive distress, and the landlord brought a counter-claim for bad farming and breaches of covenant. The case occupied some days, and the Judge was not able to complete it because he had to go elsewhere, and at the last moment the tenant was obliged to accept £400 by way of compensation, each party to pay his own costs. The £400 was not more than enough to pay the lawyer's bill. The result was that the tenant was ruined by the wasteful sale. In cases where land in Ireland had fallen into the hands of speculators, the Law of Distress had been frequently exercised with great severity. Although he fully admitted the evil that would result to the tenant if he were allowed to enter into possession of a farm unless he had sufficient capital to cultivate it, he contended that if landlords would condescend to come down from the high eminence of privilege they occupied, and give up the right of distress, abandoned yearly tenancies, and granted long leases, the capitalists of the country, being secure of their money, would join in the development of the landed interests of the country. He might say in conclusion that he did not agree in some of the proposals put forward by the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) in his Amendment, especially that which exempted from seizure the stock of a third party left on the farm for grazing.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is desirable that the power of distraint for the rent of agricultural holdings in England, Wales, and Ireland should be abolished,"—(Mr. Blennerhassett,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. CLARE READ said, that he had lost his voice through attending a temperance meeting. Possibly that circumstance might excite some sympathy on his behalf from hon. Members opposite, although he did not look for much pity from those around him. He desired, however, to utter a few inarticulate sentences in defence of the Amendment on this subject which he had placed upon the Notice Paper, but which he could not move. By that Amendment he had proposed to omit from the Resolution the word "abolished," in order to insert the words "limited to one year's rent," and to add words providing—

"That the stock of a third party taken on a farm to graze should only be liable for the amount of consideration payable for the grazing, and that the landlord's rights to re-entry for the non-payment of rent should be more simple and speedy than at present."

He maintained that if the Law of Distress was to be maintained at all, it must be on the lines thus indicated. He had been charged with inconsistency in putting that Amendment on the Paper, although he had supported the abolition of the Law of Hypothec in Scotland; but what he had said with regard to that was that when the tenants of England demanded the abolition of the Law of Distress with the same unanimity as the people of Scotland had demanded the abolition of the Law of Hypothec, he should be quite ready to vote for it. It was a curious fact, however, that though for many years the Law of Hypothec had been regarded amongst the tenant-farmers in Scotland as a great grievance, it was not until a recent date that the Law of Distress had at any agricultural meeting been referred to as being in any way detrimental to the tenant-farmers in England. The harsh operation of the present Law of Distress had been brought more forcibly into notice of late in consequence of the bad times the farmers had been passing through. Not long ago, a landlord who had allowed his tenant to get several years into arrear with his rent waited until the sheep of a neighbouring farmer were sent on to the farm to graze, when he at once put in a distress and sold the sheep for £400. It was a remarkable proof of the good sense, the justice, and the moderation of the landlords of England, that they very rarely put that extraordinary law into operation. He might be asked why he did not advocate the total abolition of the Law of Distress. His answer was, that that law was so interwoven with our agricultural system that its total and immediate repeal would give a very great shock to all who were concerned in agriculture, and would be detrimental, especially in times of depression like the present, alike to the landlord and the tenant. If they were to abolish that law at once, they must, according to all precedents, exempt existing tenancies from the operation of the new Act; but, on the other hand, if they simply modified it as he would suggest, it might be applied at once to every holding in England. His suggestion was that the landlord's right of distress should only extend to one year's rent. Why had he done that? Because that limit was the law of the land in the case of bankruptcy; and, further, he did not suppose that a landlord would distrain on a tenant unless the latter were more or less insolvent. The rents in annual tenancies were generally due half-yearly, and payable as a rule in England some three or four months after they became due; and if the landlord wished to be generous to his tenant and allowed more than two half-years' rent to be in abeyance, he might take his share with the other creditors for anything over and above one year's rent. His next suggestion was that the stock of a third party taken on a farm to graze should only be liable for the amount of consideration payable for the grazing. That was derived from the Hypothec (Scotland) Act of 1867; it had worked remarkably well during the last 12 years, and there was no reason why it should not be equally good for England. In these times of depression the capital of the tenants had been so reduced, that many of them could not stock their land, and the only way in which the landlord could get his rent was by enabling the tenant to take to graze on his farm the stock of other people. Machinery, such as thrashing-machines and steam-ploughs, which was often let out, was liable to be seized if it happened to be on the tenant's land, whereas it really ought to be exempted. On the same principle that lodgers' goods were exempt from seizure by the landlord of a house, so he would exempt all the cattle and agricultural machinery belonging to a third party which might be found upon a farm. Then, with regard to the right of re-entry, if the landlord could not get his rent he ought to have his land, and to have it at once. He believed it often took a landlord months to eject a yearly tenant and obtain possession of his land. It was a roundabout, tedious, and expensive process, and he thought it ought to be both quick and cheap; quick if he was dealing with a fraudulent tenant, and also cheap, or the remedy would be worse than the disease. Moreover, he would not allow any distress to be made except by a bailiff or respectable officer of some Court, and not by a trumpety blackguard acting under the instructions of a pettifogging lawyer. With respect to agricultural leases, if the tenant became insolvent during the time he occupied the farm and was made a bankrupt, if the trustee could not carry on the farm, the landlord could enter immediately on the farm and could also seize all the growing crops. Cases of that kind had recently occurred; and a landlord had bagged not only the whole of his rent, but something like £800 worth of hay and turnips that were on the land. He had mentioned the matter to the Attorney General, who had promised to take it into consideration when the Bankruptcy Bill came under discussion. In conclusion, he hoped the House would favourably consider his suggestions, which he was now precluded from formally moving as Amendments.

Mr. Clare Read

Mr. J. W. BARCLAY said, he felt considerably surprised by the views of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) as embodied in the Amendments he had placed on the Paper for; although the changes he proposed would favour, to some extent, a tenant's creditors, their effect would be prejudicial to the farmers themselves. To limit distraint to one year's rent would simply be to limit the indulgence which landlords would give their tenants; and it would be a conclusive answer, doubtless, by a land agent to a tenant desiring delay for more than one year's rent, that Parliament, by the change proposed, had precluded the landlord from giving it. To give greater power of re-entry to the landlord would simply be to give him more summary means of ejecting the tenant, which seemed wholly unnecessary, so long as the landlord had the preference to a year's rent, and one year would practically give him a preference to two years' rent. The Amendment might be accepted as evidence of the disinterested character of farmers' politics, for they showed that they were ready to look after the interests of their landlords and creditors before their own. As the hon. Member for South Norfolk had remarked, this question of distress and its effects was new to English farmers; but farmers in Scotland had long ago made up their minds about the Law of Hypothec, which was the corresponding law in Scotland, and the same in principle. He would state, as briefly as possible, the objections to the law, which were much wider and deeper than it at first sight appeared. The land of England was a monopoly, in these respects at least—that the quantity to be leased was in the hands of very few, and that, however great the demand, the quantity could not be increased. The agricultural population naturally increased, and, in these circumstances, competition was maintained at a maximum, and tenants' profits at a minimum. But as if the excessive competition, inevitable in the circumstances, was not enough, it was still further intensified by the Law of Distress, which enabled landlords to accept as tenants, or, at least, as competitors for farms, men who had not sufficient capital for the farm. That was the argument put forward by landlords and land agents in defence of the law as it stood. It was not because they had any favour for the poor man; but because the man with inadequate capital offered a higher rent, or was willing to submit to more onerous conditions in the lease. These circumstances explained why tenant-farmers frequently submitted to onerous, and, in many cases, monstrously unjust and even absurd, conditions in leases. The vicious principle of the law was that the landlord was protected against the consequence of his own imprudence, and, it might be, greed. Even if the landlord accepted a doubtful tenant because he promised a higher rent, or because he submitted to highly onerous conditions—it might be with regard to ground game—this Law of Distress secured the payment of the rent. It was evident that the Amendment to restrict the distraint to one year's rent would not meet this, the principal ground of the farmers' objection to the law. The injustice of the law to creditors and others dealing with the tenant was very obvious. The landlord who risked only his interest and not his capital was paid in full, when other creditors who risked both capital and interest had to take a dividend, or perhaps even get nothing. The landlord, in his (Mr. J. W. Barclay's) opinion, had grounds for complaint against the law; and if they had not complained already, he expected they would begin to do so by-and-bye. So long as prices of agricultural produce continued to advance, as was the case for a good many years, tenants with inadequate capital might manage to get on; but when bad seasons and lower prices came, landlords would find that the high rents promised by those tenants with inadequate capital were delusive. The tenants might hold on for a year or two, but they did so at the expense of the farm, which would ultimately fall into the landlord's hands in a condition which he would find very prejudicial to its being re-let. Landlords under such experience would begin to have doubts as to the wisdom of their land-agents in increasing the rent-roll by accepting tenants with limited means, who, when reverses came, were unable to hold their position and do justice to the land. Land agents were the only people who got advantage from the law, because it was only by means of this Law of Distress that the control of large estates could be kept in lawyers' offices, by people who knew little, if anything, of farming. It was thought all right if the rent-roll were increased and the rent collected. The Law of Distress enabled them to do both. As for improved cultivation, they, as a rule, did nothing for that. It was thought that by antiquated and obsolete covenants in leases tenants could be prevented from exhausting the land; but he never saw covenants which would prevent a tenant from exhausting his farm, if he set himself to do so. Such covenants, together with the want of compensation for improvements, were the great obstacles to improved cultivation. They tied up the hands of the intelligent and skilful farmer from making the best of the land for himself and the landlord. The abolition of distress would do much to improve this state of matters; but no modification of it, as suggested by the hon. Member for South Norfolk, would be of any avail. The restriction to one year's rent would simply make the land agent more stringent with the tenant; and he, therefore, strongly supported the Motion for the total abolition of the law, giving the landlord reasonable powers of re-entry when the tenant had become insolvent and unable to discharge his obligations.

Mr. RODWELL contended that it was a popular delusion to suppose that the Law of Distress operated solely to the benefit of the landlord and the detriment of the tenant. He admitted that the law might require modification, but contended that in practice the law had not worked harshly. A recent case in Kent, where a landlord seized sheep worth £300 or £400, belonging to a third person, in distress for rent of several years, was clearly exceptional. The outcry that case had caused showed that the law was not often so employed, and he challenged any hon. Member to give an instance within his own knowledge. At present, the stock of the tenant was a running guarantee for the payment of his rent. His own belief was that the abolition of the present law would act very injuriously on the interests of the tenant, because a landlord would then be far more likely than was at present the case to take the first opportunity to secure his rights and to proceed harshly, when otherwise he would be disposed to the side of leniency. The law as it stood, properly and fairly worked, was, indeed, more for the benefit of the tenant than of the landlord, although its primary object was the protection of the landlord; and he altogether denied that it was either unjust or unequal; but a limitation from six to two years was desirable. Besides, there was the great advantage to the tenant-class from the operation of the existing law, that young men were often enabled in consequence of it to enter upon a business in which they could exercise their talents and industry; whereas, if it were repealed, the facilities for taking a farm which now existed would be denied them. The relations, he might add, between landlord and tenant were on a totally different footing from a creditor and debtor under ordinary circumstances, for unless the landlord took his rent in advance, the landlord could only get it at certain times, periodically; but a creditor could refuse to supply a man with goods, while the landlord was in a very different position. There was no injustice as regarded third parties, for every person who trusted a farmer knew what the landlord's rights were. Therefore, he contended, exceptional legislation was justified by the inherent difference in their situation. But if the Law of Distraint were to be abolished with regard to agricultural holdings, he was at a loss to see why it should not be done away with in its application to house property in towns, a proposition no one was bold enough to make. Entertaining these views, he should vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kerry.

MR. COGAN said, he hoped this question would be settled as speedily as possible. It would be better for both landlords and tenants that all angry discussions should be evaded, and that the question should be promptly settled on grounds of fairness and justice. It was with this feeling, and believing that it would be both for the interests of the landlords as well as the tenants of the country that an agreement should be arrived at, that he cordially supported the Motion of his hon. Friend. In the exhaustive speech which the House had listened to from him, he had shown from history that the present law was antiquated in its character, and only fitted for times now past, and that its present operation was unjust and by no means impartial. In his (Mr. Cogan's) opinion, the power of distraint was hard upon the tenants, and, although not extensively put in force, yet its latent power, which might at any time be used, was hurtful and injurious in many ways. He was surprised to hear the hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last say that the present law was neither unjust nor harsh. The hon. and learned Gentleman could not have heard an instance of injustice, quoted in the House to-night, or he would not have given that opinion. An instance had been given, in which a landlord allowed his tenant to go five years without payment of rent, and when a third party placed his sheep upon the tenant's farm the landlord seized them and recouped himself the five years' rent. That was a case of injustice and hardship in which an innocent third party had to suffer, by the landlord putting the unjust power of the law of distress into force. When a case like that had been stated publicly and not contradicted, it did seem strange to hear any hon. Member get up and assert that the law was just and impartial in its application. It was with great surprise that he heard the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), who had acknowledged in public speeches that this law was bad in principle, now stating that he could not agree to the abolition of the law. How would the hon. Gentleman justify that course? He hoped that he would at some future time be able to state, with increased vigour and increased courage, his opposition to the present practice, and his actions would come up to his convictions. He believed that this law was unjust, and, therefore, should be abolished; that it was injurious to the tenants; and that it was hurtful and of no use to the landlords. Not many, it was true, had recourse to it, but still it existed and could be used. In Ireland the law, by which an owner could recover either his rent or his land, was simple enough. Upon one year's rent being due a landlord had simply to bring an action of ejectment against the tenant, and he could very soon obtain possession of his land. He contended that that was quite sufficient, and that no more was required to meet the case. He hoped the House would act promptly in the matter, and thus do an act of simple justice in a graceful way, instead of delaying and having to concede it at some future time to pressure from without.

Mr. Rodwell

MR. PELL thought that if the House acted wisely and with moderation, it could not do better than accept the first proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk. If the power were limited to one year's rent, he thought the justice of the case would be met; and if the landlord chose to give another year's credit, he should not be allowed to be generous at the cost of the other creditors. After all, the landlord would have the tenant very much in his power for nearly two years. With reference to the proposal that the landlord's rights of re-entry for the non-payment of rent should be made more speedy of execution than at present, he said there was no doubt very great hardship might be done by the right of speedy re-entry. At present, however, the law was very unsatisfactory. He could not go with his hon. Friend on the point as to the seizure of cattle on grazing land. No doubt, the question was one of considerable importance in the Midland counties, and there was land there where the landlords would have nothing whatever excepting live stock; but a person, before putting cattle on land to graze, might easily ascertain whether there was any back rent on the land. If a man put a large amount of property on the land, he ought to do it at his own risk. He did not know why the right of distress should be confined to agricultural holdings. One year's rent was, he thought, sufficient to distrain for; and, therefore, he was inclined to support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR, in supporting the Motion to abolish the English Law of Distress, referred to the evils to agricultural improvement and extension occasioned by the Law of Hypothec in Scotland, and to the wide gulf which existed there from that law between landlords and tenants; and which law, being injurious to the interests of the country, ought not to be allowed to remain on the Statute Book, merely for the interests of one class of the people. It was obvious that the abundance of cheap grain which we now got from all parts of the world would in future prevent the agriculturists of England, Ireland, and Scotland from obtaining those remunerative prices which they obtained in past years. These prices were, no doubt, enhanced to the public because the Law of Distress and of Hypothec gave rights and special privileges to landlords, which interfered with the tenant in obtaining cheap capital to work the farms. Unless we could cheapen produce in this country, or find a new article which farmers could produce, and which would pay them better than grain had done for years past, it would be impossible to remove the agricultural distress which was now felt. With this prospect, it would be impossible to pay the rents which landlords had hitherto received from farmers, and the soil would be less cultivated than hitherto. The agriculture of Scotland was undoubtedly highly advanced; mainly, as Mr. Caird has so well and so clearly stated in his recent work, through the intelligence and money of farmers; but another notable thing about Scotch agriculture was the want of capital on the part of tenant-farmers to extend these improvements which the present competition with foreign produce so urgently called for. The right of the landlord to distrain the goods of farmers had been the main cause why the latter had not been able to obtain better money or credit accommodation for their agricultural operations, and had prevented people from coming forward with loans to the farmers to enable them to cultivate the land they occupied, because in a distress for rent the property of him who had assisted the farmer might be seized by the landlord. Owing to these recent pecuniary necessities from bad harvests and low prices, the tenant-farmers of Scotland had, he said, been prevented by this deficiency of capital from increasing their stocks, or keeping cattle till an age when their quality and value would have been greatly enhanced. He pointed out the necessity for freeing the farmers from the shackles which now impeded their action in contending against the world in the production of grain and meat. Our high-priced lands, often inferior to those abroad, could only be kept in cultivation by increasing the productive power of the country. This could only be effected by the application of more capital, thereby encouraging agriculture. He argued that if landlords would give up their preferential claim on their tenants' goods, they would enable the latter to obtain more means whereby to till their farms better, and to pay everybody, even the landlords' high rents, which certainly could not be paid if the present impediments were to be allowed to exist.

MR. BRUEN thought it unfortunate that the House would not have an opportunity of deciding on the merits of the two propositions before it, one of which recommended the repeal of the Law of Distress, while the other indicated certain changes that might be made with advantage. He joined with those who thought that the law might be improved by placing the power to execute a distraint in the hands of a responsible officer, but denied that the ordinary practice of the law was unjust or oppressive. Only one case was cited in which the law had been used harshly; but there were many other laws in force which, if pressed to their extreme limits, would inflict great hardship. It was a maxim of lawyers that laws were not passed to meet extreme cases; nor, on the other hand, were laws repealed on the assumption that extreme cases of hardship might occur under them. It must be shown that they were of frequent occurrence in order to warrant a repeal of the law. As things were, the law was not generally denounced as unjust and oppressive; and his right hon. Friend the Member for Kildare (Mr. Cogan) might be called as a witness in favour of that view, for the right hon. Member had told the House that, in his experience, the Law of Distress was rarely put in operation in Ireland. For his own part, he saw no injustice in preferential claims such as the law often recognized, if it did not actually create them. But, apart from abstract questions, the real point involved was the actual operation of the law. Was it prejudicial or advantageous to the tenant? He believed that the right of distress was often exercised by the landlord in the interests of the tenant, and with the result of enabling him to keep in his hands the capital by which he worked his farm. At any rate, that was now and then the case in Ireland, where the existing law appeared to him to be, on the whole, beneficial. He could not, therefore, support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kerry.

MR. SYNAN supported the Amendment, which he regarded as timely. It had been said that the case cited by the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Blennerhassett) was an exceptional case, and was not, therefore, to be relied upon as an argument in favour of the abolition of the Law of Distress; but the fact that this exceptional case was inherent in the law itself was as conclusive as if a hundred cases had been cited, because the landlord, if so inclined, had the power to do that which was admittedly unjust. The strongest argument in favour of the abolition of the law was the fact that it was scarcely ever put in operation. But its retention had been advocated in the interests of the small tenants. It could only be used in their favour by depriving the creditors of their just claims. The landlord had no risk beyond losing the interest on his money, which was the rent paid for his land, and the law as it existed was unjust both in principle and practice, and was opposed to the conscientious convictions of every honest man; while the only ground on which it was at all tolerated was that it was not used. If it had been used, he ventured to say that it would never have been allowed to exist so long as it had. At the present time great distress prevailed in the agricultural districts. That distress might go on for a long time; and if, in consequence of that distress, harsh landlords used the power in an unjust manner, he ventured to say that the abolition of the law would be only a question of time. Well, if it was doing no good, and its abolition was only a question of time, why was not the present opportune time taken and the law at once abolished, for the purpose of promoting the interests of the tenants, and enabling them to get more credit and to produce more from the farms of the country? What was that absurd law founded upon? It was founded upon the old feudal principle. ["No, no!"] There were two laws upon the subject—one was the Law of Hypothec and the other the Law of Distraint. The Law of Hypothec in Scotland was a relic of the Roman Law introduced into that country. The Law of Distress was a feudal law founded upon the feudal system, and the right of the lord to compel his vassal to do his duty. The Law of Distraint was merely the power to seize a man's goods and chattels, and keep them in pledge until he discharged his feudal services to his lord. He asked why the old Law of Distress, which was founded on a different state of the times, and a different state of society, and upon a social system which had totally disappeared—why should it be allowed to exist when it was generally admitted that it was not used? The relations between landlord and tenant were now of the nature of a contract; and why should there be super-added to it the old, unused system of the Law of Distraint? It had been adopted, no doubt, by the Statutes, and made more sweeping; but the law was still the same in principle, and under it a man could allow rent to go on for six years, and then come down on the tenant. In such a case, a tenant could not be said to be a free agent with such a terror held over him, and the laws of the country could give him no protection. The law was not used; it was only held over the tenants in terror. Let them abolish it, and they would give greater security to the tenant. It would make him a free man, and put him on a level with the landlord and with men in all other trades. Its abolition would be as beneficial in England as the change of Land Laws had been in Ireland—instead of injuring the landlord, it would serve him, and instead of diminishing the security for his rent, it would increase that security. The first action of the abolition of the law would be to prevent that small competition which had somewhat risen the price of land, and it might, in that way, reduce the rent; but, ultimately, like the change in the Irish Land Laws, it would increase the security of the tenant and strengthen the position of the landlords.

General Sir George Balfour

MR. GREGORY thought the hon. Member who had just sat down had shown a most lamentable ignorance of the relations between landlord and tenant in England, as regarded the subject of discussion. The Law of Distraint was one of the most ancient and established laws of the country, and also one which was most generally acknowledged and understood; and when it was proposed to repeal a law which stood in that condition, he thought the onus of showing some ground for that repeal rested on those who proposed it. The only judicial investigation that had taken place on the subject had reference to the Law of Hypothec in Scotland, which was investigated by a Committee of the House of Lords, and the evidence there showed that the holders of large farms wanted the law abolished in order to prevent competition for farms; and that those who dealt with farmers wished the law abolished in order to save themselves from losses, which they themselves admitted were less than were common in ordinary trade. He did not, however, think the House would be disposed to prevent competition on the part of small with large farmers, or to save traders from trifling losses; in fact, the opposition to the law was a selfish one in the one class, and an unfounded one in the other. He believed that, generally speaking, no landlord thought of the Law of Distress when he let a farm; what he considered was the solvency of the tenant and the adequacy of the rent. The Law of Hypothec in Scotland had been referred to as equivalent to that of distress in England; but there was this advantage in the Law of Hypothec—that, to a certain extent, it was a judicial process requiring that an application should be made to the Court before it was put in force. He did not say that the Law of Distress did not require some modification. He thought six years was too long a period for the power of recovery by distress to extend. One year, however, as proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), would be too short; and he thought it should be at least two years. There were some crops, such as hops, or fruit of a precarious character, and for which the tenant needed indulgence; but that indulgence could not be given if the power of distress were limited to one year. His hon. Friend also proposed to exempt the stock of a third party that might be grazing on the property. But a man might never have any stock of his own, and be always grazing his neighbour's. It would, however, only be fair that the landlord should exhaust the property of a tenant before he had recourse to that of third parties. The power of distress should be primarily exercised on the property of the tenant, and recourse should not be had to the property of third parties until that of the tenant was exhausted. He could not agree to give landlords greater powers of ejectment than they possessed at present, and which enabled them to apply to any County Court for assistance; and, besides, it was a hard thing to turn a man suddenly out of his farm. He well remembered a remarkable speech on this subject by his hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Leeman), and the illustration which he gave of the benefits conferred by the present law upon small tenants in his county, and was afraid, if the Law of Distress were abolished, that the small tenants of that as well as other counties would be greatly prejudiced; therefore, he should vote against the Motion.

MR. COLE contended that, as they could not distrain upon a sub-tenant of a house for more than he owed to the original tenant of a house or building in respect to the portion which he (the sub-tenant) occupied, so it ought to be in the case of land, and if a man put sheep or cattle upon his neighbour's farm for a few weeks to be agisted, they ought not to be distrained on for more than the liability incurred on account of their keep.

MR. MARTEN said, that serious inconvenience would result from the adoption of the Resolution, because it would introduce a broad distinction between agricultural holdings and property of other descriptions, which were now equally subject to the same law. Upon the whole, the law of landlord and tenant had worked satisfactorily during a long course of centuries, being modified by legislation to meet the changing requirements of society, based on the necessity of affording due security to the landlord; and the history of the law seemed to furnish arguments for its continuance rather than its abolition. The right of distress, so far as regarded the property of the tenant, was in harmony with the general law of this country respecting liens. It was important to remember how the law varied in the three Kingdoms. It was stated that in Scotland the right of lien could not exist independently of possession; but it was different in England. True, in Common Law, possession must accompany a lien; but there might be an equitable lien unaccompanied by possession, and parties might contract that this equitable lien should exist in respect of goods from time to time on the premises, as well as in respect of goods on the premises at the date of the contract. And if the Law of Distress were abolished in England, there would be a power under the existing law to enter into a contract which would affect the tenant's disposition of property in the future as fully as if the law were preserved. Distraint was not peculiar to agriculture. Almost every well-drawn deed of security in England contained a power of distress as a necessary incident to a right which was separate for the time being from possession of the property concerned. A banker or capitalist who advanced money in a commercial concern guarded himself in such a way that he could at any moment seize and remove the plant or stock-in-trade, for the time being, of his debtor for the satisfaction of the debt. It was, therefore, erroneous to suppose that the Law of Distress was practically unknown except in agriculture. At the present moment, the law gave under a bill of sale as complete a power as there was under a distress over the tenant's property. There was no doubt that, as far as the property of third persons was concerned, the law was much in want of amendment. The decisions had been somewhat capricious on this point. If a horse were sent to be shod, the landlord could not distrain it if he put in a distress against the blacksmith for rent; but if a horse were put at livery, it could be distrained. So, if a coach were sent to be repaired, it could not be distrained; but if it were put out at livery it could. There were other cases of a similar curious description. The law operated capriciously and unjustly; and he thought they might fairly amend it on the principle of the Lodgers' Goods Protection Act, passed in the year 1871, and the Railway Rolling Stock Protection Act, 1872. But although he was in favour of imposing further limits upon the right of distress upon the property of third parties, he was equally in favour of maintaining the freedom of contract. He could not, therefore, accept the proposal to limit the right of distress as against the goods of a tenant to one year only. He (Mr. Marten) did not see why a right of distress should not exist for six years. If the landlords were forced by the Law of Limitations to demand payment of the rents, and to compel the debtor to pay within a more limited period, a great many debtors who now succeeded during bad times in weathering the storm would be reduced to great straits, and many of them would founder in the course of their difficulties. Indeed, he felt bound to enter a strong protest against the views of the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Blennerhassett) on this point. The hon. Member seemed to hold that the right of the landlord to even one year's rent in preference to other creditors was something monstrous, as if no such personage as a "secured" creditor ever existed. Nothing really could be more unfair than to take away the right of a man to do as he pleased with his own and to mortgage his property and give preferential security at his own discretion, provided he acted bona fide. It appeared to him that the Resolution would introduce great confusion into the Law of Distress, and would, in all probability, injure the whole system of agricultural holdings.

Mr. Gregory

MR. O'DONNELL said, he thought he could fairly congratulate the English and Scotch Representatives who had engaged in this debate upon the success which it was already evident had attended their co-operation. It was quite evident that the first object of attack, the Law of Distress, was doomed, and that no long time would elapse before that law would have gone over to its ancestors. It was with the greatest possible pleasure that he listened to the learned and judicious speech of the hon. Member for Kerry in laying the subject before the House, and he trusted it would not be long before the English tenant-farmers had Representatives of their own in the House as capable as the hon. Member of defending their interests with fairness, sympathy, and ability. He did not intend to enter into an examination of the self-contradiction on which the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) appeared to plume himself. That hon. Gentleman admitted that the law was a bad law, worse than the Scotch Law of Hypothec; but he still endeavoured to continue it. He had not heard a single argument, either inside or outside the House, on behalf of the Law of Distress from the point of view of the tenants, except one, which was not calculated to command a great deal of assent. It had been said that a tenant who was heavily in debt to his tradesmen might, by collusion with the agent of an estate, be enabled to cheat those tradesmen; but that, by the operation of the Law of Distress, this might be defeated. But he was sure that the tenant-class, as a body, would much prefer to be allowed to run the risk of meeting their lawful obligations in a lawful way rather than be protected in this unwholesome fashion. As for the argument on behalf of the landlords, it seemed to him simply to amount to this—that those gentlemen being in a position of exceptional advantage, for that reason asked for exceptional protection. He did not know that that argument had in it a great amount of validity. The whole of the Law of Distress was merely a relic of feudal times, and, except as a tradition of the past, it could not be defended. It was time to remind the landlords of the country that the dangers of feudalism were gone for good and all; the landowners no longer provided for the defence of barony or county; an array of landlords and their tenants no longer defended their shores against foreign invasion; the landlords no longer exercised the functions which they did six centuries ago; and the reason for investing them with exceptional powers had long since departed. They lived in an age of organized policy; they lived in an age of general liability on the part of the taxpayers; they lived in an age of a national Army; they lived in an age of regular public administrations; and all the old feudal necessity having gone, the feudal privileges had no longer any necessity for existence. He believed that the abolition of the Law of Distress would tend to the advantage of the landowners as well as to the advantage of the tenants; that it would improve the credit of the tenantry; and that it would open a way into their ranks to a more substantial class of men. It would render landlords secure of their rents by a better and worthier means than the present; and, except as an indication of the obstinate and inbred weakness of human nature to cling to whatever was as long as possible, he could not see any reason for the retention of this law. He trusted that the abolition of the Law of Distress would be followed by the abolition of many other exceptional privileges which ought to have no place in the present day, which were injurious to the tenants, and which were likewise injurious to the landlords. He hoped that, amongst other improvements, the landlords would no longer be enabled to confiscate the improvements of the tenantry. During the discussion of this subject those who usually sat on the front Opposition Benches had not been conspicuous by their presence; but if the Liberal Party ever expected to reach or maintain power without dealing thoroughly and comprehensively with the Land Question, not only in Ireland but in England and Scotland, they were labouring under a singular misapprehension. That Party must learn to apply its magnificent ideas of sympathy in regard to nations a little nearer home. With reference to hon. Gentlemen opposite, he had no doubt that strong public opinion in the English counties might have an educating effect upon them. It was a matter of history that the Members of the Conservative Party were susceptible of education; and that Party was so closely connected with county interests, as to make it absolutely indispensable for them to consider this question with seriousness and thoroughness.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT was unable to concur in the statement made by the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion to the effect that, but for the Law of Distraint, the produce of the country might have been increased threefold. He had always been under the impression that, until quite lately, we could grow more per acre than any other country in the world. No doubt, improvements might be introduced; but he denied that we could, under any system, grow three times more than we did at present. He felt grateful to his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) for having stated publicly that the landlords of this country had not abused the privilege of distress. His hon. Friend mentioned, indeed, the notable Kent case; but could any hon. Member refer to similar cases which had occurred within his own knowledge? During his own long experience of farming he had never known in his own county or neighbourhood a case in which the terrible provisions said to exist in the Law of Distress had been exercised against a tenant. If the existing law were abolished, a severe shock would be given to the whole agricultural interest. That law was as advantageous to the tenant, if not more so, than it was to the landlord; and it was on this ground that he objected to the Motion of the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Blennerhassett). He would not say that the Law of Distress ought not to be amended; but he thought that the House ought not to accept a crude, abstract Resolution for abolishing that law, nor should it absolutely adopt the principles which had been laid down by the hon. Member for South Norfolk. It would, in his opinion, be unwise for them to follow such a course, by which they could not do justice either to the tenant or the landlord. The Government alone could deal satisfactorily with a question of that kind; and he therefore hoped they would be prepared to state that, looking to the extreme depression which agriculture was labouring under, and yet without doing anything in a hurry or under the influence of panic, they would consider the Law of Distress, and if they saw their way to improve it would bring in some measure which would, he was sure, be accepted by the House, and would also give to the great agricultural interest the satisfaction which it was entitled to demand.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND thought it was a fortunate circumstance that they had had in that debate a singular union between the Members for the sister country and those who were interested in agriculture in England. The course of the discussion had shown that the present law for securing to the landlord his rent was in a very unsatisfactory state. He believed that the sudden or hasty dealing with that question would not be entirely for the benefit of that class of agriculturists who were supposed to be most deeply interested in getting rid of the Law of Distress. He agreed with the last speaker that the time was drawing near when that question ought to be dealt with by the responsible Government, and that it could not be wisely treated by the simple affirmation of an abstract Resolution. The Motion now before them was not the Resolution of the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Blennerhassett), but whether the Speaker should leave the Chair, or whether they should go into the consideration of the hon. Member for Kerry's Resolution with a view to see whether they should amend it as the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) proposed. For himself, he did not feel bound to give a directly affirmative or negative vote on the proposal of the hon. Member for Kerry; but he thought that the debate had seriously shaken the whole position of the claim of the landlord, on his own mere motion and without the support of any judicial process, to go upon the farm and take the property of the tenant in satisfaction of his rent. There were a great number of farmers in England who had risen from very humble means, and who had not the large capital which they were told would be brought to the cultivation of the land if the present law were altered. The position of those men required to be most considerably regarded. In his part of the country there were tenants who commenced by getting into debt to their landlord for a half-year's rent, and that continued during the whole of their tenancy. What would be the effect of the proposed alteration of the law in such cases? He was told by one gentleman that his county would rise in arms at once in a state of indignation if the Law of Distress were suddenly abolished, because there would be an immediate demand of a half-year's rent all round. Landlords had long been aware that agriculture required time. The legislation of the present Government had laid down broadly the principle that agriculture required that the farmer should be able to look forward to leases of two, three, and in many cases seven, or, in some instances, even 20 years. It was the policy of Parliament—whatever course might be taken by landlords and tenants in making contracts to the contrary—to encourage compensation to farmers, if they had only two or three years' undisturbed possession of their holdings. It was desirable to keep up a feeling in the mind of the practical agriculturist that he should not be disturbed if he was a man of capital. A great deal of nonsense had been talked about increasing the produce of the soil of this country. He believed that no saying had done more mischief than the ill-advised saying of Lord Derby that it would be easy to double the produce of England. There was, in his opinion, a very moderate limit beyond which they could not on an average of years increase the gross produce of the English soil. He wished that Lord Derby, who was regarded as a model of caution and common sense, would let the world really know what he now thought on that matter. When that noble Earl made the remark to which he was now referring he was probably thinking of growing potatoes in Lancashire, or lettuces and cabbages near the great towns of the North, and not to the general agriculture of the country. What Parliament could do was to legislate in such a manner that those who were already producing all they could would continue to do so. Admitting that it was desirable that men of capital should be secured in their holdings, what was the landlord to do when his tenant turned out to be a man of straw? What the landlords of England wanted was not the power of squeezing the last farthing from the tenant, but that they, if the tenant could not pay his rent, should have facilities for recovering their land, so that they might be able to let it to a man of capital. He did not know that the Law of Distress operated injuriously to the farmers if they were solvent and wanted to borrow money. He was told it was no uncommon thing for the farmer to take his rent-book to the banker to show that he had discharged all his obligations to his landlord. In many quarters there was a hesitation in trusting farmers who did not stand clear with their landlords. Speaking for himself, and for some few with whom he had conversed, he believed the landlords would do wisely to move forward in this matter, and not to cling any longer to this right of priority of payment for their land, but to ask for measures that would enable them to recover their lands from insolvent tenants, and put them into the hands of men of capital. He did not believe that the landlords would be affected injuriously by relaxation in this matter; on the contrary, he thought they would gain. It was not desirable to retain the law in its present state; but the question was one which ought to be dealt with by the Government of the country, whose duty it would be to provide in any alteration that might be made the necessary safeguards for the protection of the landlords' rights. But if the Resolution of the hon. Member for Kerry were to become a substantive Motion, he would like to introduce words into it with a view to make the change gradual—that the law should apply to future, but not to existing, tenancies. He thought, however, it would be inexpedient to act hastily in the matter.

Mr. O'Donnell

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, that whatever difference of opinion there might be as to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Kerry, there could be none as to its meaning, which was that, without further consideration, the Law of Distress should be abolished. One thing was very clear—that though there might be many theoretical objections to the law, as a matter of fact, its administration at the present day was not attended with practical grievance, and no case of actual hardship had been cited in the course of the debate. That was a very important consideration to remember, when they were asked to sanction such a proposal as that of the hon. Member for Kerry.

Although the hon. Member for Kerry gave an interesting historical narrative of the gradual growth of the law, yet, when he came to deal with the actual facts, he asked the House to deal with it as a new law without antecedents. The House was really discussing one of the oldest institutions in the country—an institution which, as had been well stated by the hon. Member for South Norfolk, and the hon. Gentleman who spoke after him, was more intimately connected with the relations of landlord and tenant than any other institution which could be named. Hon. Gentlemen had showed that this law, notwithstanding theoretical objections, worked to a large extent in the interest of the tenant; and if it were now, without consideration, abolished, many classes of tenants might be affected injuriously. For it was obvious that if this law were taken away, the landlord must be given another remedy which would be simpler and shorter. There was said to be an analogy between this law and the Law of Hypothec. Well, then, if it were abolished, there should be an analogy also in the remedy. A shorter and simpler action of ejectment should be given to the landlord. What would be the effect of the abolition of this ancient usage on poor tenants without capital and without friends? The landlord, in the interest of his family, might be compelled to say to them—"A theoretical Gentleman having made a speech in the House of Commons for the abolition of the Law of Distress, I can deal now only with tenants having large capital, which will enable me to dispense with the Law of Distress." Therefore, in the interests of the tenants themselves, it was not expedient to summarily get rid of this old and not harshly-working institution. He could understand the motive for the Resolution, if it could be shown that this power of the landlord had been abused, or if it were a new law, susceptible of abuse in its use; but as one of the institutions of the country, as long almost as the country had a history, he could not admit there had been any case made out for its immediate and total abolition. He was informed that this law was not used to any large extent in England, and in Ireland they all knew it was very sparingly employed. It was not a popular remedy, and its practical operation was to enable the landlord, in many cases, to deal with a class of tenants which he would not otherwise feel at liberty to choose. It should be remembered that if landlords violated the law they were subject to an action, and if they made a legal distress, but an excessive one, they were equally subject to an action. In the words of one of the oldest Statutes of the country, a landlord who so distrained was "to be grievously amerced," and that before a British jury. In cases, therefore, of real practical grievance, the wronged tenant could obtain redress, the remedies to which he might resort being distinctly and clearly laid down. It was a slight mistake to assume that the Law of Distress and the Law of Hypothec were identical. There were, in truth, several marked distinctions between them. It was not proposed to bring the provisions of the Bill relating to hypothec, which had been presented to the House, into operation until the year 1880; but the Resolution of his hon. Friend the Member for Kerry asked the House to abolish the Law of Distress at once. He was sorry the Lord Advocate was not present; but he (the Attorney General for Ireland) understood that the Bill to abolish hypothec had in it a limitation as to the size of the holdings, but the present proposition was applicable to every agricultural holding in the Empire.

MR. RAMSAY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman was mistaken. There was no limitation in the Bill applicable to tenant farmers.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, that unquestionably the Scotch Bill, as it stood, only applied to holdings of a certain size; but he had the greatest hesitation in attempting to give a meaning to the clearest words in a Scotch Bill. At any rate, the landlord in Scotland got a lien over the property of the tenant before the rent was actually due. [Mr. RAMSAY: That is not the case.] Then he would withdraw the expression. He assumed that to be the case from the recent speech of the Lord Advocate; but he confessed he knew but little about it, and he had not an interpreter beside him, and might be wrong. The Amendment which had been placed upon the Paper dealt with the question in a very different manner from that in which the Resolution dealt with it. The hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Blennerhassett) seemed to have approached the question from a theoretical point of view. He seemed to have studied the subject with the help of several philosophical works, whereas the hon. Member who had placed the Amendment upon the Paper approached the whole matter from a purely practical point of view. The hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) had adduced some very powerful reasons, which would probably convince a large proportion of the Members of the House that the term of six years in connection with the exercise of the right of distress might be shortened with advantage. Doubtless, whenever the law should come to be considered in a practical way, that suggestion would receive very considerable attention. The principle that the goods of innocent third parties should be protected where rent for which they were not personally liable was claimed was one which would always meet with very great sympathy from Members of the House. That principle, however, should not be accepted hurriedly; for, if adopted, the immunity which would be conceded to third parties might enable a fraudulent tenant to oust the rights of a landlord by means of a colourable false ownership. The proposition, therefore, was one which must be approached with a considerable amount of caution. He was very much struck with the fact that the Motion for the abolition of the Law of Distress had been introduced by an Irish Member; for though Ireland had been more affected by Land Bills during the last seven years than any other part of the country, no assault had, up to the present time, been made upon the Law of Distress in that part of the British Isles. The Bill put forward by his lamented Friend (Mr. Butt) did not interfere in any way with that law. There was also a Land Bill before the House, stating what changes were considered necessary in the Land Law in Ireland; but no reference was made in it to the Law of Distress. There was not the slightest proof that the Law of Distress was regarded as a grievance in Ireland, or in any other part of the United Kingdom; and, under these circumstances, he ventured to think that the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Kerry ought not to be entertained.

MR. COURTNEY demurred to the representations which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had given of the issue before the House. Hon. Members were not asked to declare that the Law of Distress should be abolished immediately and unreservedly. No doubt, the Resolution was couched in general terms; but if his hon. Friend had to frame a Bill he would, as they could gather from his speech, embody in it a good deal of what the right hon. and learned Gentleman had just alluded to as essential. Practically, there were two propositions before the House—that of the hon. Member for Kerry and that of the hon. Member for South Norfolk. The technical question, however, was that the Speaker leave the Chair, and if hon. Members desired to express an opinion as between the two propositions named—and it seemed to him they were bound to do so—they must, in the first instance, negative the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair, in order that the proposition of the hon. Member for Kerry might become the substantive Motion. They could then amend the proposition, and, practically, adopt that of the hon. Member for South Norfolk instead of it. All, therefore, who were favourable to either proposition should vote against the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair. [SIR WALTER B. BARTHELOT: No, No!] The hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex said “No!” and he had great experience; but he (Mr. Courtney) referred to what had recently happened when the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Briggs) called attention to the Indian cotton duties. Those who were in favour of the Motion of that hon. Member, and those who were in favour of the Amendment to it suggested by the hon. Member for South-East Lancashire (Mr. Hardcastle), joined in voting against the Motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair. He was himself in favour of the abolition of the Law of Distress altogether. With regard to the limit of time to be placed on the power of distraint, it seemed to him that some hon. Members had failed to see what was the fact—that a Law of Distress for one year practically gave security for two years. If it was not exercised at the end of the first year, it remained, so to speak, hanging over the head of the tenant until the second year had all but expired. It had been argued that this was a very ancient law which ought not to be abolished unless it was shown to be productive of serious evils. It was said that the onus probandi lay with those who desired the abolition of the law. He thought, however, it must be admitted at once that this law had in itself something exceptional. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Marten) had stated that if this exceptional law were abolished, the power could be got back again by means of registered bills of sale. In reference to this point, he had, some years ago, put a question to Judge Longfield, who replied—

“First, there is a great deal of difference between a power given by contract and a power given by law; and, secondly, if you had unlimited multiplication of bills of sale the evil would become so intolerable that the Legislature would interfere and stop it.”

Why must a landlord have more security than any other creditor? To this question no real answer had been given in the course of the present discussion. Many hon. Members had, indeed, expressed their opinion that a landlord ought to have more security than other creditors; but they had failed to explain the reason why. There was a great want of reciprocity in this matter of security. It appeared to be felt necessary that landlords should have security against their tenants; but why was it not equally necessary that tenants should have security against their landlords? The tenant risked more capital upon a farm than the landlord did. The landlord risked his rent; but the tenant put upon the farm considerably more capital than was represented by the rent. It was said that the existing law was a great boon to an indigent farmer, who could be trusted further than he would otherwise be in consequence of the greater security that was given to the landlord. If the tenant were living just on the verge of solvency, that proposition meant that the landlord was willing to be kind to his tenant provided he ran no risk. He did not see that that was any great advantage to the tenant; and it certainly was a disadvantage to everybody trading with him. The hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) said that rents were not higher through the Law of Distress; but the hon. Member went on to say that a landowner kept men as tenants who, but for that law, would not be kept. By that means the number of competitors for farms was increased, and when the demand for farms was greater than the supply the prices must go up. It was important that men should have sufficient capital to cultivate the farms they occupied. By the application of more capital to the cultivation of the land its produce could, in the opinion of men like Mr. James Caird, be increased 25 per cent, and an hon. Member had said he had found by his own experience that that could be done. This showed that though the immediate effect of an abolition of distress would be a fall of rents, they would rise again in the future without any abatement of the farmers' profit. In the interests alike of the country, of the farmers, and of the landlords, the Law of Distress was condemned, and, in his opinion, it might be advantageously abolished.

MR. STAVELEY HILL observed, that not one word had been said as to this Law of Distress acting in any way prejudicially with reference to the tenant. He believed it would be for the interest of the tenant that the present Law of Distress should be continued. The landlord and the tenant entered into a contract on an equal footing. The creditors of the tenant were aware of the nature of that contract; and, in his opinion, that fact placed the tenant in a better position than he would otherwise occupy to obtain such credit as he might require.

MR. RAMSAY, in supporting the Motion, said, he was curious to know how hon. Gentlemen who had voted for the total and immediate repeal of the Law of Hypothec in Scotland had come to a very different conclusion with regard to the Law of Distraint in England. The Attorney General for Ireland had sought to draw some distinctions between the Law of Distress in England and the Law of Hypothec in Scotland; but the only distinction between the law of the two countries was that the Law of Hypothec in Scotland was, in its present form, less severe than the Law of Distraint in England. Yet Her Majesty's Ministers were giving their unconditional support to the abolition of the Law of Hypothec, on the ground that it was not necessary for the protection of the interests of the landlord, and that it would be beneficial to the tenant-farmers of Scotland. It would be well for the tenant-farmers of England to note that the Members of the Government could vote for a law which did not affect themselves, but took a very different view of the matter in relation to the landlords of Scotland. He could conceive of nothing more inconsistent on the part of Ministers.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it is not my intention to prolong the interesting discussion we have had upon the general question of the Law of Distress; but I wish, before we go to a Division, to say one or two words upon the view which Her Majesty's Government take of the question before us. And I find it the more necessary to do that because, in one or two of the later speeches which have been delivered, there has been a tendency to suggest false analogies. I entirely dissent from what has been said as to the analogy between this case and the vote which was given some time ago upon the Bill relating to the Law of Hypothec in Scotland. I have frequently heard the question of the Law of Hypothec in Scotland discussed in this House; but I do not think that I have heard the Law of Distress called in question in the same way, and certainly not under the circumstances, in which the Law of Hypothec has been discussed in the form of Bills which have been presented, and with the discussion which has taken place in Scotland upon the subject. But I have observed that if any suggestion emanated from any English gentleman when the question of Hypothec was under discussion that an alteration of the Law of Hypothec would involve an alteration of the Law of Distress in England, we have been met with lectures and a torrent of eloquence to prove that we know nothing of that law at all if we supposed that there was any analogy whatever between it and the Law of Distress in England. But what I would say with regard to the Law of Hypothec is, that it is a matter which has been much discussed in Scotland by all classes. It was made the subject of various Bills introduced by hon. Members sitting in different parts of the House, and representing different interests; and ultimately a Bill was passed on the subject, not entirely by Her Majesty's Government, as some have assumed, because some Members of Her Majesty's Government abstained from voting on the Bill, and others voted against it. But, at all events, the Bill was passed after full discussion, and with reference to the circumstances and wishes of the people of Scotland. Now, however, we are not asked to consider a Bill at all, but a broad and startling proposition made in a very able speech of considerable learning, which does great credit to the industry of the hon. Member who brought forward the subject (Mr. Blennerhassett). But, after all, it has been introduced by a Gentleman who represents an Irish constituency, and who speaks much more from an Irish than an English point of view. He makes this broad proposition, and asks us at once to affirm that the Law of Distress ought to be abolished. He is met by a counter-proposition from my hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), who speaks upon a question of this sort with the very highest authority. And what does my hon. Friend say in these very pithy and pertinent remarks with which he favoured us in the beginning of the evening? He said—"He approached this subject as one which required consideration, and one which was very intimately connected with the welfare of agriculture. It was one of high importance, and he thought the time had come when they ought to have legislation and amendment." But he went on to say—"He could not recommend the sweeping measure proposed by the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Blennerhassett). He must bear in mind that this system of distress was one closely interwoven with the agricultural system of the country, and they should consider carefully the mode in which they were to deal with it." I entirely agree, and the Government entirely agree, with the view taken by my hon. Friend. We regard this as a subject that requires consideration; we consider that there are points of the Law of Distress which demand revision. But we say that the question is one upon which we cannot at the first blush proceed to legislate, because it touches so many interests and demands very careful deliberation. We have no difficulty in saying that we do recognize in the views put forward by the hon. Member matter which requires and should have early consideration. I do not enter into the question as to whether distress is to be limited to one year, to a year and a-half, or to two years, or any particular time, or whether it should be somewhat restrained, and should be qualified with reference to the distress upon the goods of third persons. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) said—"You are bound to do what I ask you to do." He challenged the Government to say whether or not they approved of the proposition of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), because, if they did, they were bound to negative the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair; and he urged that we were bound to proceed at once to consider this question and pass some Resolution upon the subject—if not the Resolution of the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Blennerhassett), then that of the hon. Member for South Norfolk—and he called upon us to do that because he said he relies upon the analogy of the vote arrived at the other day on the subject of the Indian cotton duties. But that, again, is a false analogy. The House was then expressing an opinion on an act of the Government of India, and saying whether it was satisfied with regard to that act; various opinions were put before us, and votes were taken, and the matter ended in the House expressing an opinion with regard to the act in question—[Mr. COURTNEY: And the future policy.]—and the future policy in a very general form. Here, however, we are called upon to adopt a Resolution pledging ourselves to legislation before we have properly considered the principles on which it should be founded. Now, nothing can be more mischievous, or lead to greater inconvenience in Parliamentary action, than the adoption of abstract principles before it has been well considered what our legislation ought to be. The discussion of a subject in the form in which it is presented on Friday evening is one of the greatest possible utility. Nothing can be better than the opportunity which is then given us of freely discussing and considering questions of this sort, which to many of us appear in different aspects, and present new features. But if we were bound, whenever an abstract question is presented to us, to follow it up by legislation, I say we should in many cases act foolishly, and we are not prepared to do that on the present occasion. Sir, the Government will vote for your leaving the Chair not as giving an opinion contrary to those expressed by the hon. Member for South Norfolk, which we receive with great respect, and intend fully and candidly to consider. I have to thank the hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Thomas Acland) for the very useful observations which he made in the course of his speech, and to express a hope that we may be allowed to take the only proper step under the circumstances, and to vote that you, Sir, do now leave the Chair.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 202; Noes 92: Majority 110.—(Div. List, No. 84.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION (re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 138.]

(Mr Secretary Cross, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Sir Matthew Ridley.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 8th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

Court of Summary Jurisdiction.

Clause 4 (Mitigation of punishment by court) agreed to.

Clause 5 (Scale of imprisonment for non-payment of money).

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT thought that an alteration was necessary with reference to the terms of imprisonment provided for by the clause in connection with money payments; the two last terms of two and three months were, in his opinion, insufficient for the sums mentioned in the clause, and he considered that a considerably longer term should be inserted if the amount exceeded £20. They had hitherto dealt with smaller sums; but in the case of large ones, he thought more power should be given to the magistrates.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the object of the clause was to show the maximum term of imprisonment to be administered in each case. But the words, "such period as in the opinion of the Court will satisfy the justice of the case," were intended to show that the Justices themselves exercised a discretionary power. If the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would look at the Small Penalties Act, he would see that the last scale was "not exceeding £20 or three months." Of course, there might be a difference of opinion as to what the scale ought to be, and the Bill in no way took away the discretion of the magistrates; on the contrary, its object was to leave their hands much more unfettered than they were at present, in the belief that their powers would be wisely exercised.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Sum recoverable by summary order to be recoverable as a civil debt) agreed to.

Clause 7 (Payment by instalments of or security taken for payment of money).

SIR HENRY JAMES moved to insert, after Sub-section 3, the words—

“Impose such imprisonment if default be made in payment of the sum or instalment at the time fixed, as the person liable to pay the same may be liable to if default be made in payment of a fine of a like amount imposed under this Act or otherwise.”

He was informed that the practice had been in the case of time being given to issue a fresh summons calling upon the person to pay, a proceeding that was quite unnecessary, and which, moreover, caused expense. He had also been informed that power of imprisonment existed in the Act, although he had not been able to find it.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had exactly stated what had passed between them. He (Mr. Assheton Cross) had shown the Amendment to the draftsman of the Bill, and was assured that ample care had been taken that the magistrate should have the power which his hon. and learned Friend desired for him. Before Report, he trusted to be able to satisfy him that such was the case.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (Including of costs in small fines).

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT inquired why the fine of 5s. under this clause did not carry costs?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that every magistrate to whom he was speaking must have felt the desire to impose a small penalty, while, at the same time, he knew that even if he imposed a penalty of 1s. or 2s. the costs might amount to perhaps 10s., and that, therefore, he was really inflicting a greater fine than was necessary. The fine of 5s., without costs, was intended to apply to all trivial cases of the kind referred to; the magistrate, however, if he really wanted to inflict costs could, of course, do so. He wished it to be distinctly understood that it was not obligatory upon the magistrates that the fine should be imposed without costs. In that way, he trusted it would be seen that the discretion of the magistrates had been absolutely preserved.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 (Enforcing of recognizances by court of summary jurisdiction).

SIR HENRY JAMES moved, in page 4, line 14, after the word “retainer,” to insert “or not to do or commit some act or thing.”

Amendment agreed to.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had a verbal Amendment to make at the end of Clause 9. It was entirely a draftsman's Amendment, and was as follows:—In Clause 9, line 25, to leave out the words “in like manner as sums are paid,” in order to insert “by such person by whom such sums are payable.”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10 (Summary trial of children, unless objected to by parent or guardian).

MR. P. A. TAYLOR moved, in page 5, to leave out Sub-section D, as follows:—

“When the child is a male, the court may, either in addition to or instead of any other punishment, adjudge the child to be, as soon as practicable, privately whipped, with not more than six strokes of a birch rod, by a constable, in the presence of an inspector or other officer of police; and also in the presence, if he desires to be present, of the parent or guardian of the child.”

He hoped the House would hesitate before it endorsed this punishment of flogging for a child—he had almost said a baby—for it was to apply to children of seven. In these days of general scepticism it appeared that they believed in nothing so strongly as in flogging—they flogged in their Army and Navy, they flogged their criminals, and now they were going to establish or to legalize flogging for infants. The only argument that he had ever heard offered in favour of this was that it was better to flog children than to imprison them. That was very much like recommending a small dose of arsenic as being less poisonous than prussic acid. He could scarcely bring himself to believe that England, with all its wealth, with all its learning, and with all its means of enlightenment, was really obliged to have recourse to the barbarous practice of flogging children, simply because it did not know what better to do with them. This Bill would do far greater evil in England than the mere flogging by officials that would take place in prison. No doubt, magistrates would very often have their hearts softened by the piteous little wretches with whom they had to deal, and would hesitate to sentence them to these punishments. But the effect that this Act would have throughout England would be very different. People throughout the country, finding flogging inflicted by the State, would go home and inflict additional chastisement on their unfortunate children. Only recently a Question was asked in that House about a child of nine years of age who had been beaten, and then had salt rubbed into its wounds. The story was not true, perhaps. The right hon. Gentleman said it was not true, or that it had been greatly exaggerated, and that the magistrates had said more beating had not been given than a child of nine deserved! Than a child of nine deserved! If a clause like this became law, brutish, ignorant persons would take the infliction of flogging by it as an example to be followed. He believed that House prided itself upon being a Christian Assembly; but he must say that clause, if it should pass, would, so far from carrying out the words of One revered by millions of people, only in effect say—"Suffer little children to come unto us, that we may flog them."

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 10, to leave out from the word "shillings," to the word "child," in line 17, inclusive.—(Mr. P. A. Taylor.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. HOPWOOD thought it right that he should make the observations he intended at that time, in order to enable the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to follow him. He most cordially supported the Amendment. He had had the honour to serve on the Select Committee on this Bill, and this was one thing, and, he might say, the only thing, in which he stood alone on that Committee; and it was the only thing in which one Member had failed to make an impression upon the others, or to induce them in many material respect to alter their views. His dislike to flogging remained deeply-rooted, and he intended to give his utmost opposition to it. His reasons for supporting that Amendment were these. If they were to have flogging, how were they to proportion it? One child under 12 might be exceedingly hardy, and would not mind it; another might be very delicate, and it would be a most cruel punishment. There would also be this difficulty—that the flogging would be done by the hands of a constable, and they had already had various public scandals with regard to flogging by the hands of a constable. He did think that if all they could do to a little child was first to ascertain if it were fit to bear it, and then to submit it to the punishment of six strokes with a birch rod, it would be better to have no punishment at all. Hon. Members on the other side did not appear to sympathize with this view. They were very superior to those on that side, and looked down upon them from a lofty eminence as on foolish persons opposing a humane substitute for the prison. Some people seemed to think that six strokes with a birch rod were a better alternative than imprisonment. He did not think so, nor did he admit that imprisonment was the alternative. Would it not be much better to send a child home to its parent or guardian, and trust to the correction it would receive from them, rather than to sentence it to six strokes with the birch rod from the hands of a constable? It seemed to him to be much better to secure the correction of the child by the alternative of a fine, which would fall upon the parent or guardian, and make him more attentive to the child in the future, or, at all events, preserve it from indulging in those acts which would bring it within the Criminal Law.

Mr. P. A. Taylor

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the Committee would leave the clause as it stood in the Bill. In the first place, many parents took no heed of their children, and allowed them to run wild about the streets; and a good many parents, if they were fined for the acts of their children, would inflict a much more severe penalty upon them than was provided by this clause. Looking at the whole scope of this clause from the beginning to the end, its object was to keep a child from becoming a criminal, and he did hope that the Committee would pass the clause. If the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) would look at the Bill again, he would find that no child could come under the exceedingly mild correction sanctioned by the clause unless he was seven years of age. He must also add that they had a very large Committee when the clause was under discussion, and that they all agreed to it except the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood).

MR. JACOB BRIGHT thought that if the treatment proposed was desirable for some children it ought to be applied to all. He did not see why female children should be exempted, for what was good for a male child must also be good for a female.

COLONEL MAKINS observed, that that was the first time he had heard a champion of women's rights get up and claim for them a right to be flogged.

MR. HOPWOOD thought the Committee had just been favoured with an exhibition which he felt inclined to comment on, but on reflection he would let it pass.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 98; Noes 22: Majority 76. — (Div. List, No. 85.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 (Summary trial with consent of young persons, juvenile offenders).

MR. GREGORY moved, in page 6, line 4, after "do" to insert—

"Having regard to the character and antecedents of the person charged, the nature of the case, and all the circumstances of the case."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, that an Amendment to this clause also stood in his name. This clause was another variety of the preceding, with the substitution of 12 strokes with the birch for six. With the wish to relieve Great Britain from the degradation of being the only civilized country in Europe which inflicted such punishments as these, he begged to propose as an Amendment in page 6, line 10, after the word "months" to leave out everything to the end of line 17.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 10, to leave out from the word "months," to the word "police," in line 17, inclusive.—(Mr. P. A. Taylor.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS trusted the Committee would keep the words.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, the clause provided for the punishment of children who, in the opinion of the Court, were not 14. Surely there ought to be some better mode of ascertaining the age than by merely looking.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) observed, that these words were quite familiar. They enabled the Court to ascertain the age of the child by any means it pleased.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 100; Noes 19: Majority 81. — (Div. List, No. 86.)

SIR HENRY JAMES suggested that further words should be inserted at the end of the 1st sub-section of the clause similar to the provision at the end of Sub-section D, Clause 10, for the presence at the whipping of the parent or guardian of the child.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS observed, that the hon. and learned Member would find at the end of the Bill that by "child" was always intended a child under 12. This clause only referred to "young persons," and the introduction of the words suggested would only lead to confusion.

SIR HENRY JAMES asked if there would be any objection to the insertion of the proviso with the alteration of "young person" for child?

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 12 (Summary conviction with consent of adult).

MR. GREGORY moved, in page 6, line 36, after the word "do," to insert—

"Having regard to the character and antecedents of the person charged, the nature of the case, and all the circumstances of the case."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 13 (Summary trial on plea of guilty of adult) agreed to.

Clause 14 (Restriction on summary dealing with adult charged with indictable offence) agreed to.

Clause 15 (Restriction on punishment of child for summary offence) agreed to.

Clause 16 (Power of court to discharge accused without punishment).

MR. COLE thought that it was unwise to insert the word "damages" in the clause. If a person were not to be convicted it was well for the Court to have power to make him pay such costs as were thought desirable; but if there was a power given to the magistrate to make him pay damages for any offence, he might be condemned to pay a much larger sum than any fine which the Act imposed. He thought, therefore, that it was a serious thing to leave open the question of damages, for a person who might unintentionally have caused damages which might amount to a large sum might, in this way, be compelled to pay them, instead of leaving the party claiming the damages to his civil right. He, therefore, moved to omit the word "damages" in page 8, line 34.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, that it seemed to him desirable in certain cases for the magistrates to have power to award damages when the case had been proved but they did not think that it merited punishment. But he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend that they ought not to have the power to award unlimited damages, and he thought it would be well to strike out the words "such damages" wherever they occurred, and allow the magistrates not to proceed to conviction, but to dismiss the information and award costs.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT thought that when small damage to the amount of a shilling, or something of that kind was committed, it ought to be a part of the punishment that the offender should be fined to pay for the damage he had done. A window might be broken, for instance, and there ought to be a power on conviction of making the person doing it pay damages.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that, of course, if a man were convicted, the magistrates could impose the payment of damages upon him. This clause was to meet the case of a man who had not been convicted, and, without his being convicted, there was a power to make him pay unlimited damages. If a man were convicted, the amount of damages that he could be made to pay was limited; whereas, if he were not convicted, he could be made to pay unlimited damages. It was to strike out the latter provision that his hon. and learned Friend had moved.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS observed, that he was entirely with his hon. and gallant Friend behind him (Sir Walter B. Bartelot) as to the desirability of magistrates having the power to order payment of damages for small offences. But if there were any serious damages, the magistrates had not the power to award them.

MR. PAGET wished to say that this subject had been well considered by the Committee, and that the words were deliberately inserted in favour of persons charged with small offences. If the words were struck out, there would be no power to make a person, against whom the magistrates wished to dismiss the charge, pay damages. The words were really in favour of the person charged with an offence, for without them he could not be made to pay damages without convicting him. The object of the sub-section was that a person could be made to pay damages as compensation, if the magistrates thought it desirable, without proceeding to conviction.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS inquired if his hon. and learned Friend would be content if "damages not exceeding forty shillings" were substituted for the present provision?

MR. COLE expressed himself satisfied with the proposed Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment, in line 24, page 8 after the word "and," to insert "such," agreed to.

SIR HENRY JAMES was unwilling to detain the Committee, and would therefore state very briefly his objections to this clause. The clause gave power to a Judge of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction—to the magistrates after proof of the commission of an act which the law said should be an offence, to say that no punishment should be inflicted. The clause had been inserted with the view that there should be an opportunity for the magistrates, if they thought that an offence, though technically it had been committed, yet did not deserve punishment, to allow the offender to go without conviction. That involved a very grave principle, for it placed those concerned in the administration of the law in a position to do a very great injustice. Judges and magistrates might have prejudices of a particular kind, and a magistrate might say—"I quite admit that the law has been broken; but, because I think the law wrong, I will not enforce it." A Judge might say—"There ought to be no law against poaching;" and such a man would be placed by this clause in a position to control the Legislature, by not carrying the law into effect. Probably, to Courts of Summary Jurisdiction this objection would not so much apply, for there would not be opportunities for a Justice supposing himself capable of preventing serious offences being dealt with. But his object in seeking to call attention to the clause was that he feared that if it passed the principle of it would be extended to the Criminal Code Bill, and to Bills of a similar character. He was, therefore, anxious to make a protest against its being said that through the acceptance of the clause in the present Bill the House had accepted the principle of giving Judges the power of at once dismissing prisoners if they thought the law unjust. Some of his hon. Friends, for whose opinions he had the greatest respect, were, he knew, in favour of such a provision. He, however, took the opportunity of stating his disagreement with the clause, and protesting against its principle being applied in more important matters.

Mr. Gregory

MR. WHITWELL said, that this clause enabled a Justice to pass by a rich man, and allow him to go away unconvicted by paying some expenses which were nothing to him. There was a tendency, in many instances, to extenuate in favour of persons well off; he did not mean that it was always so—much to the contrary—but still they did see it, and this clause opened a door to such practices, which would be very undesirable.

MR. COLE would strongly support this clause. There were many cases in which a breach of the peace had been technically committed, but in which a man had been so provoked or outraged by the misconduct of another that he might be well excused morally, although in point of law his offence could not be justified. And there were many other cases on which a magistrate would not wish to submit a man to the indignity of a conviction, but while, at the same time, the man had really broken the law. Under these circumstances, he was most strongly in favour of the clause. With regard to the argument that there was one law for the rich and another for the poor, that was not his experience. A man who was rich, or in a superior condition in life, generally fared worse before a magistrate than his poorer brethren.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. GIBSON) observed, that the clause gave the magistrates a certain discretion. It was placed in the discretion of the magistrates, if they considered that the ends of justice were met and thought fit to exercise the power, to refrain from convicting a person who had unquestionably committed a breach of the peace. That seemed to him to be a very reasonable provision.

MR. COURTNEY said, that this was not the only case in which a discretion was given to the magistrates. The Court might discharge a prisoner conditionally on his giving security, with or without sureties, to come up for sentence if called upon to do so. That was one case. But now it was proposed to give a magistrate the power to say that a charge was proved, but that the offender was not to be convicted. It seemed to him that that was a new and totally unheard of discretion.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that anyone conversant with the practice of the magistrates' Courts would know that it very often must happen that although a magistrate thought a case legally proved, yet he did not wish to do anything. This clause was inserted to legalize what had been done before in an informal manner. He might further say that any magistrate discharging a prisoner because he disagreed with the law would be guilty of corruption in his office.

MR. CHARLEY remarked, that a power similar to that given by this clause was contained in the Criminal Justice Act.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 17 (Trial by jury in case of offences triable summarily) agreed to.

Clause 18 (Imprisonment in cases of cumulative sentences not to exceed six months) agreed to.

Clause 19 (Appeal from summary conviction to general or quarter sessions) agreed to.

Clause 20 (Sitting of court of summary jurisdiction as a petty sessional court, and in occasional court-house) agreed to.

Clause 21 (Special provisions as to warrants of commitment for nonpayment of sums of money, and as to warrants of distress) agreed to.

Supplemental Provisions.

Clause 22 (Register of court of summary jurisdiction) agreed to.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT moved to report Progress, as they were now coming to an entirely different part of the Bill.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had no objection to the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

WEST INDIA LOANS BILL.

Resolution [May 8] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 167.]

BANKING AND JOINT STOCK COMPANIES

(NO. 2) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law with respect to the liability of members of Banking and other Joint Stock Companies.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Dr. CAMERON, Sir ANDREW LUSK, Mr. HORWOOD, and Mr. EAEP.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 168.]

House adjourned at half after One o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 12th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Statute Law Revision (Ireland) (80).
Second Reading—Racecourses (Metropolis) (45); Public Health (Scotland) Provisional Order (Castle Douglas) * (68).
Third Reading—Land Drainage Provisional Order (Bispham, &c.) * (65), and passed.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE LATEST TELEGRAMS.

OBSERVATION.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, perhaps it may be convenient that I should read the following telegram which has been received at the Colonial Office to-day:—

“Telegram from Mr. Hampden Willis, Secretary to the High Commissioner, Cape Town, to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated St. Vincent, 12th, 10.40 a.m., received Colonial Office, 12th, 1.50 p.m.:—April 27.—High Commissioner, at Pretoria, telegraphs that Boers' Camp broke up on the 18th inst., and all have dispersed quietly to their homes. The conference between High Commissioner and Boers' Committee at Erasmus Farm took place April 12th, lasted five hours and a half, and passed off in perfectly friendly manner.”

RACECOURSES (METROPOLIS) BILL.

(The Viscount Enfield.)

(NO. 45.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the measure was promoted as a protection to local residents and in the interests of the Turf. The measure had been before the public for the last three years, and during its passage through the House of Commons had received the support of Her Majesty's Government, and more especially of those who were connected with the Home Office, and who were, therefore, most responsible for good order within the Metropolitan area. The late Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), and Sir Matthew White Ridley, the present Under Secretary, spoke and voted in favour of the second reading when the Bill was in the House of Commons; and on March 6, 1879, the Secretary of State (Mr. Cross) himself in Committee said—

“He only spoke in the interest of public order, when he said that had not people seen that these races were conducted in an improper manner the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) would not have brought forward the Bill. But the races in question had not been conducted with proper decency.”

He could have wished that the charge of the Bill had been intrusted to some Member of their Lordships' House who was also a member of the Jockey Club, as an earnest of their desire for reforming and purifying the great national pastime of horse-racing; and, certainly, the abuse with which the Bill dealt was one which required immediate remedy. But although the Bill might be justly described as miserably inadequate to securing these purposes, still it did something in the way of affording protection to the peaceable and orderly inhabitants of the suburban districts, whose retirement was now continually infested by the disreputable mobs who attended the gate-money meetings. After the passing of this Bill, horse races within 10 miles of London, unless licensed, would be unlawful. He did not think the area was wide enough; and he would be prepared to support any noble Lord who might propose, in Committee, to extend it to 12 or 14 miles. He had been told that the Bill interfered with the rational amusement of a great multitude of excellent and well-conducted people. So far from that being the case, the Bill enabled the Justices at the Michaelmas Quarter Sessions to grant licences at their discretion on the application of any person, being the owner or occupier of any open or inclosed land, desirous of obtaining a licence for horse-racing therein. The application was to be made and disposed of in the same manner as applications for licences for places for dancing and music. The magistrates would hear the application and the evidence in its favour, and any opposition that might be offered; and if the applicant were of good character, the place suitable, and the arrangements were such as would secure that the proceedings would be conducted in an orderly manner, and the inhabitants of the neighbourhood favourable, they would grant the licence; or they might withhold it if not satisfied. Those of their Lordships who were members of the Jockey Club were well aware of the nature and character of gate-meetings; but for the benefit of those who were not, he would give a brief description of them. A sporting publican who rented a few acres of grass got up these races, built a stand, erected booths, and charged a toll on those who came upon the ground. A mob of low betting-men, welters, sharpers, roughs, and pickpockets were attracted; and the unhappy animals which were engaged in these contests were of such a character and condition that probably no cab or van proprietor would give £25 for the winner of the so-called “Great Swindleham and Milkham Handicap.” With such well-established and interesting meetings as Epsom and Ascot within an easy distance of town, where the best horses and the most interesting contests were witnessed, such mushroom gatherings as Kingsbury, West Drayton, Croydon, Eltham, Bromley, Streatham, Enfield, and others, were not needed in the interests of true sport. He confessed he had heard with feelings of great regret that “the Turf Parliament” were hostile to the measure, and were not disposed to give the Bill a second reading. He wished to speak with all respect of the Jockey Club as a court of honour; but in these days private individuals and corporate bodies with irresponsible power were amenable to the public for their actions, and if their actions did not come up to the public requirements they must expect hostile criticism. He feared that that was the case with the Jockey Club at this moment. What had that Turf Parliament done for the sport of racing during the last 10 years? On this subject he would call a distinguished witness into court, one who was now no more, but whose name was yet honoured in the land—the late Earl of Derby. Ten years ago, Lord Derby addressed his celebrated letter to Sir Joseph Hawley, and in it was this remarkable passage—

“St. James's Square, May 28, 1869.—I cannot conceal my opinion that your resolutions deal with only one of the vices which, as it seems to me, are yearly lowering the character of the Turf. I know that some persons consider the multiplication of races and of starters a sign of its success. I look on them as the very opposite, and I should hail with satisfaction the disappearance from the Calendar of one-half of the present meetings. I take it that the deterioration of the Turf in public estimation, of which there is no doubt, is mainly owing to the fact that the majority of horses are now in the possession of men who run for profit and not for sport, who care nothing for the animal horse, who cannot afford to wait for a return of their money, but who, in the language of the Manchester school, prefer 'a nimble ninepence to a slow shilling,' and in whose hands a wretched animal, especially if not quite so wretched as he is thought, is as valuable as one of a high class, if not more so. I am satisfied that unless the Jockey Club apply themselves vigorously to check the acknowledged abuses of the Turf, not only will there be an increasing secession of men of character and station, and an increasing accession of those who have neither, but they themselves will lose ground in public estimation, and public opinion will ere long demand and enforce a sweeping suppression of abuses by external authority."

And what were the evils on which Lord Derby particularly animadverted? First, early two-year-old racing; second, multiplication of inferior race meetings throughout the country; third, encouragement given to short races, half-mile scrambles, which were no test of the real merits of a horse. He (Viscount Enfield) would now add two other evils with which the Jockey Club had not grappled—the sanctioning play or pay betting for handicaps—one of the most fruitful sources of fraud and robbery, and last, but not least, the prevalent fashion of allowing horses to run under assumed names for their owners or co-proprietors. This last had done more to deteriorate the character of the Turf during the last few years than anything else. During the 10 years since Lord Derby wrote his letter, one solitary measure of reform was passed by the Jockey Club—and that was, he believed, rescinded again within 18 months. He alluded to Colonel Forester's excellent proposal not to allow two-year-olds to run before the 1st of May. The Jockey Club, no doubt, expected that the gentlemen who accepted the office of steward at these meetings would see that they were conducted with decorum. But reliance on these stewards was nugatory—he should like to see the gentleman who valued either his character or his watch who would attend such meetings. Assumed names were a fertile source of fraud, as the public did not know who were the real proprietors of the horses which ran. In former days the owners of racehorses had names which, in public estimation,

Viscount Enfield

were synonymous with honourable conduct and straightforward sportsmanship—such names as Bedford, Grafton, Glasgow, Rutland, Portland, Verulam, Jersey, Eglinton, Peel. These were names that gave credit to the Turf. But now, unfortunately, The Racing Calendar contained names of the most irresponsible and grotesque kind—Mr. Flutter, Mr. Micawber, Mr. Ruff, Mr. Good, Mr. Mask, Mr. Somersetshire, Mr. Squills, and many others. They might represent either a distinguished capitalist in the City, or a so-called financing agent, or a retired valet—an opulent gin-distiller possibly, or a station-master on one of their lines of railway—possibly even some young Conservative Member of Parliament, or an aspiring "detrimental," of whom a modern poet of society had given them a very graphic description—

"His partner's delight and the chaperon's fear,
He's voted a trump among men;
His father allows him two hundred a-year,
And he'll bet you a thousand to ten."

The public complained that the Jockey Club endorsed these names, if not with actual approbation, yet with toleration, for they received a fee of 25 guineas for every such name which was registered; and if his noble Friend the senior Steward of the Jockey Club felt any qualms of conscience, he might rub his hands, while he thought of this tax, and say with the old Roman financier, "Non olet." In contrast to our Turf senators, what had the French Jockey Club done? In future no horses would be allowed to compete at any of the meetings held under the Jockey Club in France that had run at a meeting organized as a private speculation, and where a special tax was levied on the list-keepers or ready-money betters. He would sum up his remarks by asking their Lordships to read the Bill a second time. He did so as a magistrate and ratepayer in the Metropolitan county. He urged its acceptance in the interests of good order, and as some slight security for the protection of the householders, who were injuriously affected by the annual recurrence many times over of these Saturnalia; but he did so especially in the interests of the old national pastime of horse-racing. Though he seldom now attended races, and scarcely ever betted, no member of the Jockey Club took a livelier interest in the national pastime than himself—in the various old-established meetings, the “form” shown by horses, and the manner in which the various crosses of breeding told—and no one would more rejoice than he should were the Jockey Club to bestir themselves in earnest in endeavouring to sweep away the hideous abuses which now existed, and by drastic measures of reform render to racing once again the honourable appellation it formerly deservedly enjoyed of being “the sport of Kings.”

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2.”
—(The Viscount Enfield.)

LORD ST. LEONARDS, who was nearly inaudible, said, that he regarded the proposed legislation as an unjustifiable attempt to interfere with the amusements of the humbler class, while it left those of the richer and more leisurely classes untouched. Why should they attempt to suppress such meetings as Kingsbury and Croydon, and leave out Kempton and Sandown? He would move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out (“now”) and add at the end of the Motion (“this day six months.”)—(The Lord St. Leonards.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: I shall give my cordial support to the Motion of the noble Lord who has moved the rejection of the Bill. My noble Relative who introduced the measure (Viscount Enfield) dislikes those small meetings which take place in the neighbourhood of London. I can assure him that none in this House or the country can have a greater dislike to them than I have. I take a great interest in the national pastime of racing. I think these small meetings have done an infinity of harm, and I hope to see them put a stop to, and anything I can do either in or out of this House to carry out that view will certainly be done. My noble Relative stated that the Bill which he asked your Lordships to read a second time was miserably inadequate to the object for which it was intended, and that was the only thing he told us about the Bill. We have not, from the beginning to the end of his speech—anything to let us know whether the Bill consists of one clause or 50, or what any of these clauses are intended to enact. My noble Friend was bound to tell us how he intended to do away with what he calls this injury to the ratepayers of the Metropolis. Not only did he not tell us how the Bill would effect its purpose, but he avowed his anxiety to extend its provisions. My noble Friend appears to have run away into a sort of lecture to the Jockey Club, and commented severely on the countenance they had given to persons who ran horses under assumed names. But when he spoke of the assumed names under which horses were entered, he forgets that anyone can ascertain who these assumed names represent. I quite agree, however, with my noble Friend that the use of assumed and grotesque names is not right, and that such names are objectionable. My noble Friend contrasts the names of former days with the names connected with the Turf now; but I cannot agree with him that all the racing of the present day is done under assumed names. I will read him a few modern names, and I doubt if he will have a single word to say against them. What does he say to these names—the Duke of Westminster, the Earl of Stamford, the Earl of Rosebery, the Earl of Rosslyn, the Earl of Wilton, the Duke of Hamilton, Lord Sefton, Lord Falmouth, Lord Vivian, the Earl of Cork, Lord Fitzwilliam, and last, but not least in the list, the Marquess of Hartington, to whom, I think, my noble Relative will give credit for high principle? The assumed names are registered, and they can easily be ascertained; and on the ground of running in assumed names my noble Relative has not made out his case. My noble Relative has given no reasons for the second reading of the Bill; I will endeavour to show why the Bill should not be read a second time. In the first place, I think it is an unnecessary Bill, because the Stewards of the Jockey Club and the magistrates have the power to put an end to these meetings, and they do put a stop to them. Another reason is that the Bill is too despotic and tyrannical in its character. Why should the scope of this Bill stop within 10 miles of the Metropolis? My noble Relative is prepared to extend the area to 12 or 14 miles. But why stop at 12 or 14 miles? It is said that these meetings are a nuisance to the inhabitants of the Metropolis. But

London is not the only large city in the country. What are you going to do with Birmingham, Liverpool, and Manchester? You cannot keep to 10, 12, or 14 miles; if this Bill passes it must be made to apply to the whole country, and if so, you are asking for one of the most tyrannical measures that ever went out of this House. To show what are the powers of the Jockey Club in respect of such meetings, I will quote one of the rules under the head "Management of Meetings and Powers of Stewards"—

"Every meeting must be advertised in The Racing Calendar. The advertisements must state that the meeting is to be subject to the rules of racing, and must state, as soon as practicable, the days on which the meeting is to begin and end, and the names of two or more persons as stewards, and of the judge, starter, and clerk of the scales. No meeting shall be advertised in The Racing Calendar unless the money added be not less than 300 sovereigns per day."

If any meeting takes place without being advertised in The Racing Calendar, the horses which run at it cannot run at any other meeting throughout the country, and the jockeys are not allowed to ride at any course under the rules of the Jockey Club; and this has practically the effect of putting an end to meetings of an objectionable character. In the Memorial presented to my noble Friend the Prime Minister by the Stewards of the Jockey Club, and which is dated Newmarket, May 2, 1879, there is this statement—

"At meetings of the Jockey Club, held on the 16th and 30th of April, the Racecourses Licensing Bill was brought under consideration, and it was unanimously decided that the Stewards should be requested to place Her Majesty's Government in possession of the facts of the case as regards the powers claimed by the Jockey Club in respect of the licensing of race meetings and the manner in which they have exercised them. In accordance with this direction, the Stewards of the Jockey Club beg to represent to Her Majesty's Ministers that, as far as they are able to gather from brief reports of debates in the House of Commons, where this question seems to have been subjected to a very limited amount of discussion, it would appear that the Bill has been mainly advocated upon the alleged ground that the Jockey Club does not possess the power to deal with meetings held within the contemplated area; and, further, that if it did possess that power, it has hitherto neglected to take the requisite action. We would bring before the consideration of Her Majesty's Government that, in 1876, at a special meeting of the Jockey Club, it was resolved to revise the rules of racing, and that a fresh code of rules came into operation in January, 1877.

By these rules the Stewards of the Jockey Club have the full power of preventing any meeting taking place by refusing to advertise it in their official Calendar ('Rules of Racing,' Part 2, Rule 4); and as regards the alleged inaction of the Jockey Club, it should be noted that during the past year the notice of its Stewards having been called to certain irregularities which had occurred at one of the race-meetings held within the radius mentioned in the Bill, instructions were given to Messrs. Weatherby, the publishers of the official Calendar, by the said Stewards, which would have prevented the said meeting being held unless satisfactory guarantees were given for its proper conduct. No application was made to Messrs. Weatherby, and no race-meeting was held on that course last year. The Stewards of the Jockey Club further called the attention of the stewards of race meetings to the necessity of acting with authority in their capacity by the following notice, which appeared in The Calendar, No. 25, of last year:—"The Stewards of the Jockey Club beg to call the attention of gentlemen undertaking the office of stewards of race meetings to the responsibility which they incur for the proper management of such meetings, and express their hope that gentlemen will not accept the office unless they intend to be present, or are fully satisfied as to the arrangements for the conduct of the meeting." And lastly, the Stewards of the Jockey Club require a guarantee from all promoters of race meetings that adequate arrangements be made for the maintenance of order during the meeting. Since the action of the Stewards in these matters, the Metropolitan meetings have diminished from eight advertised in 1877 to two which have been hitherto advertised for this year. They humbly submit, therefore, that the Jockey Club, through their Stewards, have not been idle in the exercise of their authority, not only with regard to racing matters, but also as to the maintenance of order; and, further, that the said Stewards are ever prepared to entertain and act upon any suggestion with which the Secretary of State for the Home Department might favour them."

That the Jockey Club have power to stop these races is manifest by their having done so in the cases of West Drayton, Kingsbury, and Streatham. These are cases in which the Jockey Club have acted; and I have no doubt their rules will be more stringently carried out; in fact, so strictly have those rules been carried out, that the number of Metropolitan meetings has been diminished from eight, advertised in 1877, to two this year. As to West Drayton—where the stand was burnt down—that meeting has been put a stop to by the Jockey Club, an inconvenient practice of neglecting to pay over the stakes having arisen, and the Club insisting that before the meeting is advertised in The Calendar the money must be paid. That meeting has not taken place since; neither has the Streat-ham, for the reason that they have been unable to advertise in The Calendar, in all probability through being unable to guarantee the 300 sovs. a-day added money. The Kingsbury meeting has also come to an end, seemingly because they could not obtain stewards of character and responsibility. Under these circumstances, nothing calls for legislative interference. Moreover, the magistrates have power to refuse licences to the sporting publicans on whose property these meetings generally take place. My noble Friend has spoken of gate-meetings in terms of reprobation. Did he apply his condemnation to all gate-meetings, without exception?

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Not to Goodwood.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: If I am not under a delusion, I have seen my noble Friend at the Goodwood meetings.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: You never invited me there.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: If the noble Viscount had been at Goodwood, he would never have made the remarks. Gate-meetings are not all to be held up to public reprobation. Does the noble Viscount consider Sandown one of those gate-meetings? Does he consider that Sandown is not a respectable meeting, and that it is not attended by respectable people? Does not the noble Viscount know that persons of the very highest society, male and female, attend this meeting; and is it to be supposed they would do so, if they were characterized by any proceedings which call for magisterial interference? On the other hand, the magistrates have power to suppress objectionable gate-meetings by refusing the necessary licences for them. My noble Friend has quoted a letter written by the late Lord Derby to Sir Joseph Hawley; but I do not see how the authority of Lord Derby can be dragged into this question, seeing that that letter has reference to handicapping and running young horses, and has nothing whatever to do with gate-meetings. The noble Viscount has carefully refrained from explaining the provisions of the Bill. I will now do so. As I have already stated, and as my noble Friend has also stated, if the principle of this Bill were conceded, that you are to give magistrates the power of putting down these races because they are a nuisance to the ratepayers, I do not see how you can confine the Bill to within 10 miles of London. Why are persons living outside that limit not to have the same protection as those living inside that limit? If you once pass this Bill, and say that magistrates are to decide whether the meetings are to take place or not, it must be extended further. What does the Bill propose? The 1st clause declares what is horse-racing; it says that any race in which any horse runs in competition with any other horse, or against time, for any prize, bet, or wager, and at which more than 20 persons are present, is a horse race. The 2nd clause declares any horse race unlawful which shall take place within a radius of 10 miles from Charing Cross, unless in a place duly licensed, as provided by the Act; and the 5th clause imposes a penalty of £10, or imprisonment for two months, on any person who shall take part in any horse race in any open or inclosed land or place for which a licence has not been obtained. The 6th clause declares that owners and occupiers of ground where unlicensed horse races take place shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and on conviction shall be punishable by a fine not less than £5 nor exceeding £25, or by imprisonment for not less than one month nor more than three. Now, if you pass this Bill, and extend it to the whole country, what will be the effect of it? I ask your Lordships to imagine the case of a number of gentlemen staying in a country house for the purpose of hunting; there may be a dispute over the dinner-table that one horse is not so fast as another horse; and if, on the following day, those gentlemen run their two horses in the park for a bet of a sovereign, and there are more than 20 persons present—which, in all probability, there would be, looking on—why, they would be liable to fine and imprisonment. The gentlemen who had adjourned from the dinner-table to the park would become liable to a penalty of £10 or two months' imprisonment each; and their host, the owner of the park, would render himself liable to a penalty of £25 or three months' imprisonment. I think it likely that if this Bill pass no occurrences of that nature will hereafter take place in any gentleman's park. Then, as to licences—the licence, when obtained, is to run for 12 months from Lady Day. So that any person requiring a licence must make his application at the Michaelmas Sessions preceding, or go without for 18 months. I am as much opposed to these small meetings as is my noble Relative himself. I am equally anxious to uphold the national pastime which has flourished in this country for so long a period; but I think I have fully shown that this Bill is unnecessary and would be tyrannical; and, for these reasons, I think myself fully justified in supporting the Amendment.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that when, last week, his noble Friend (Viscount Enfield) asked him to support this Bill, he told him he was very sorry he could not do so, and that, on the contrary, he should oppose it. The opinion which he entertained when he made that statement to his noble Friend was based on three points—first, the geographical limit to which the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) had alluded; next, that the Bill seemed to be an invasion on the position of the Jockey Club; and, thirdly, that it would be opposed by the Government, who, in matters connected with the police of the Metropolis, had superior means of information to that which private persons could have. But since then he had had some conversation with persons of more knowledge on the subject than himself, and he had attentively listened to the speeches delivered that evening; and the result was that he felt constrained to support the Bill, notwithstanding the appeal of the noble Duke. With regard to the geographical limit, the noble Duke urged that it was impossible to apply to the Metropolitan district regulations which were not to be extended to other parts of the country. Was not that rather a new doctrine? Were there not powers vested in the Metropolitan magistrates and in the Metropolitan Police which were entirely distinct from those exercised in other great towns in the country? With regard to the Jockey Club, nobody was more anxious to support the authority of that body than he was. He thought that in one instance in their Lordships' House he had somewhat conspicuously supported the Jockey Club. His noble Friend the Chairman of Committees proposed a Bill regulating the weights to be used for racing; and he (Earl Granville) opposed it in the strongest manner he could on the ground that horse-racing was a national pastime and had taken great hold on the people of this country; that it was necessarily important, therefore, to have some controlling power over racing, and that it would be very difficult indeed to substitute a better one than the Jockey Club as it then stood. The Jockey Club now was not quite in the position in which it was then. He pointed out to the House that at that time the Jockey Club included not only landowners, Generals, and Admirals, but also two Privy Councillors and seven members who had been Cabinet Ministers, of whom two had twice been Prime Ministers. Now, at present, he was afraid the Jockey Club could not claim as a member either the present or the late Prime Minister. The noble Duke had read a list of some of the most prominent members of the Jockey Club, and they were unquestionably persons in whom one would have the greatest confidence both for judgment and for knowledge of this particular subject. When he read the list, beginning with the Duke of Westminster and ending with the Marquess of Hartington, and including other distinguished patrons of the racecourse—among them his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Wilton)—it occurred to him (Earl Granville) at once that he had never heard or seen in any newspaper of any one of those distinguished persons being present or running horses at Metropolitan gate-meetings. He thought that in anything with regard to racing there was no more competent body than the Jockey Club; but in this matter there were other considerations. He was told that at one of the suburban meetings a Newmarket official absolutely refused to go on with his duties any longer because he remarked that the jockeys delayed starting their horses until they got a fleet messenger informing them who was to win. Such questions as these there could be no doubt that the Jockey Club was the most competent authority to deal with. But when there arose the question of nuisance and of peace and order in the Metropolis, it appeared to him that the Jockey Club was not so good a body to control these places as the general body of magistrates. The noble Duke had given his opinion upon the Jockey Club Memorial. As he understood the matter,

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon

the proposal in the Jockey Club was that they should petition against the Bill; but there was a great difference of opinion, and the result was a compromise—namely, the Memorial was content with setting out the facts, and leaving the Government to deal with the question. With regard to the Government, it was said they were opposing the Bill, and that there had been “a whip” for the purpose. The noble Duke had given as a reason that the Bill was tyrannical and unnecessary, and that if it passed it would have to be extended to the rest of the country. But in what respect had the measure been changed since the time when it was supported in the House of Commons, not merely by an individual Member of the Government, but by the Home Secretary and his two Under Secretaries, who spoke in the strongest terms in favour of and voted for the Bill? Those Members of the Government might be supposed to be in possession of good information on such a subject; and when he found them supporting the measure as one calculated to effect the object for which it was promoted, he thought he was justified in giving it his support in their Lordships’ House.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: My Lords, I am not concerned to deal very closely with the speech of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) who leads this side of the House, because it dealt chiefly with some mysterious agencies that had operated on his own mind that I did not precisely understand, and it dealt also with the more mysterious policy of Her Majesty’s Government with regard to this Bill, which I still less can comprehend. I have observed this singularity in this debate—that only one speech has dealt with the measure now before the House, and that was not the speech of the noble Viscount who brought it in. He was good enough to express his views on a vast variety of subjects, with a good deal of wit and humour that commended itself to the House, and which everyone must wish to compliment; but I must be allowed, incidentally, to state that this is not a Bill for dealing with assumed names or post-betting, or the delinquencies of the Jockey Club; and as the noble Viscount’s speech dealt almost entirely with these topics, I failed to gather any special enlightenment. Agreeing fully, as I do, with his views about post-betting and assumed names, I am not disposed to say that the Jockey Club or owners of racehorses yield in any respect to the owners of former days, and I confess I have investigated that subject from the records of the past. I claim to speak on this Bill with some little knowledge. I approach it from various points of view—as a member of the Jockey Club, as an owner of racehorses, as one who goes to races—which the noble Viscount does not—and as a suburban resident; and I think that from all these four points of view the Bill may be regarded as one that does not deserve the support of your Lordships’ House. There are two views, of course, as regards any Bill dealing with racing—there is the racing point of view, and in this case there is the point of view that regards the amenities of Metropolitan recreations. As regards racing, I do not suppose any human being pretends that the improvement of the breed of horses, which is supposed to be the object of racing, is furthered in any respect by the gate-meetings with which you are dealing; and, in a racing point of view, this Bill may be regarded as one which cannot affect racing as a national pastime. But, in the second place, when I come to the regulations that are to protect Metropolitan inhabitants against these “incursions of barbarians” of whom the noble Viscount speaks, he ought to remember—and that is the ground on which I feel myself compelled to vote against this Bill—that there are already three efficient methods of dealing with the matter. There is, first, the Jockey Club. I quite agree that the Stewards of the Jockey Club have been inert in this matter. There I fully admit the argument of the noble Viscount; and except they take more care for the future of these matters, as they are pledged to do, some other means must be resorted to. In the second place, the magistrates can refuse a licence, and that has been found operative; and, in the third place, the Commissioners of Police can refuse the protection of the police. If the noble Viscount thinks this Bill will furnish any more effectual means than these three of putting down these meetings, I do not think he has shown them to us. The fact is that the matter which your Lordships have to consider is one apart from racing. I do not think lovers of racing would have cause of regret if all these gate-money meetings ceased to exist; but I am not unnaturally jealous of the amusements of a free people being tampered with by small measures of this description. You do not know where you are to limit them. The noble Viscount who moved the second reading says no unlicensed racecourse should be allowed within 15 or 16 miles. When you get to 16 miles, you touch the historic race of this country—the Derby. That would place it in the power of the local magistrates of Epsom to put down that race at any moment they may see fit. That would be the effect if the Bill were so amended. I came to this House somewhat wavering as to the expediency of opposing this measure. I confidently anticipated hearing strong arguments in its favour; but every argument which I have heard tends directly against the Bill, and I must record my vote with the noble Lord who moved the Amendment.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) had urged as an argument against this Bill that it was impracticable to fix a limit within which it was to operate, and said that if such a measure was passed at all it must be applicable to the whole country. But he (the Earl of Morley) asked whether it had not in countless cases been found perfectly easy to define the exact space to which an Act of Parliament should apply? And why, therefore, should any special difficulty be experienced in the present case? This was not a question of racing or improving the breed of horses—it was really a question in the cause of law and order. The race-meetings to which it referred caused the dregs of the Metropolis to invade quiet neighbourhoods, and were, therefore, productive of great inconvenience to the inhabitants of those neighbourhoods. The Bill did not propose to prohibit these meetings absolutely; what it provided was that when a meeting of this kind was desired it should be necessary to satisfy Boards of Quarter Session that they would be respectably and quietly managed. He trusted that the Bill would be passed, and that the abominable meetings which were held in some quarters at the present time would be put an end to.

LORD RIBBLESDALE said, he would venture to say that these gate-meetings were attended by a large number of the very persons who were stated in the Bill to object to them. The noble Viscount who had introduced the Bill stated that magistrates at Quarter Sessions, before granting a licence for a race meeting, would have to satisfy themselves that the horses that would be engaged were of the highest class. He thought it would be adding very much to the onerous labours of magistrates to require them to perform such a duty as that. He knew that meetings such as these in the suburbs of London were very objectionable, and he should, therefore, vote for the second reading.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE thought that the subject-matter of the Bill would be better left to the consideration and care of the Jockey Club.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON explained that the Stewards of the Jockey Club were willing to act upon any suggestion that might be made by the Home Secretary on this subject. The matter had been discussed at a meeting of the Jockey Club, but no division was taken.

LORD ABERDARE asked whether, supposing these meetings were held in defiance of the Jockey Club and the rules laid down in reference to the class of horses run and the conduct of the jockeys who rode them, what power would the Club have over the meetings?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: The magistrates have power to refuse to license meetings irregularly conducted, and the Jockey Club would refuse to allow any advertisement of these races in The Racing Calendar. The Jockey Club have the power of preventing horses from being run and jockeys from riding at all race-meetings held under their rules; and the refusal to insert the advertisement of irregular meetings in The Racing Calendar would, consequently, have the practical effect of putting a stop to such meetings altogether.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE observed, that there were hurdle and other races which did not come under the jurisdiction of the Jockey Club, but which also needed to be controlled.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that the Grand National Hunt Committee would act in such cases in accordance with the course adopted by the Jockey Club.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY said, it was clear, from the discussion which had taken place, and from the speech of the noble Duke opposite, that the Jockey Club had the power, if they had the will, to apply a remedy for the abuses complained of. He came down to the House intending to vote for the second reading of the Bill; but after the statements made as to the proposed action of the Jockey Club, he did not think that the Bill was necessary. He believed that his noble Friend near him (the Earl of Rosebery) had won a race at Kingsbury.

The Earl of Rosebery.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, that was quite a mistake.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY said, the noble Earl was himself in America at the time; but he believed that he won a race at Kingsbury with a horse named Halifaz.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, his noble Friend was misinformed.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY said, the real point at issue was whether the meetings proposed to be dealt with under the Bill could be controlled by the Stewards of the Jockey Club, and he could not doubt they would be.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON observed, that the noble Duke opposite had said the Jockey Club were anxious to carry out what the Home Secretary desired in the matter. What the Home Secretary desired was that the Bill should pass.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, that after the tone of the debate and the amount of support offered to the Bill, he preferred not accepting any vague promises on behalf of the racing authorities, but should go to a Division, and any Amendments might then be considered in Committee.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 84; Not-Contents 57: Majority 27.

CONTENTS.

Canterbury, L. Archp.	Airlie, E.
Cairns, E. (J. Chancellor.)	Amherst, E.
York, L. Archp.	Annesley, E.
	Beauchamp, E.
	Belmore, E.
Bedford, D.	Brownlow, E.
Grafton, D.	Camperdown, E.
Somerset, D.	Carnarvon, E.
Westminster, D.	Cowper, E.
	De La Warr, E.
Ailesbury, M.	Fitzwilliam, E.
Lansdowne, M.	Granville, E.
Ripon, M.

Harrowby, E.	Colchester, L.
Jersey, E.	Cottesloe, L.
Kimberley, E.	Elgin, L. (E. Elgin and Kincardine.)
Lucan, E.	Foxford, L. (E. Lime-riek.)
Manvers, E.	Greville, L.
Minto, E.	Harlech, L.
Morley, E. [Teller.]	Hatherton, L.
Northbrook, E.	Houghton, L.
Spencer, E.	Howard de Walden, L.
Sydney, E.	Keane, L.
Verulam, E.	Kenry, L. (E. Dun-raven and Mount-Earl.)
Waldegrave, E.	Lovel and Holland, L. (E. Egmont.)
Cardwell, V.	Monck, L. (V. Monck.)
Gordon, V. (E. Aberdeen.)	Monson, L.
Hardinge, V.	Mostyn, L.
Powerscourt, V.	Northwick, L.
London, L. Bp.	Poltimore, L.
	Ponsonby, L. (E. Bess-borough.)
Aberdare, L.	Robartes, L.
Auckland, L.	Sefton, L. (E. Sefton.)
Balfour of Burleigh, L.	Sherborne, L.
Belper, L.	Silchester, L. (E. Long-ford.)
Blachford, L.	Sondes, L.
Boyle, L. (E. Cork and Orrery.)	Stanley of Alderley, L.
Brodrick, L. (V. Middleton.)	Strafford, L. (V. Enfield.) [Teller.]
Brougham and Vaux, L.	Sudeley, L.
Calthorpe, L.	Talbot de Malahide, L.
Carysfort, L. (E. Carysfort.)	Thurlow, L.
Charlemont, L. (E. Charlemont.)	Tollemache, L.
Clifton, L. (E. Darnley.)	Truro, L.
Clinton, L.	Winmarleigh, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Northumberland, D.	Bagot, L.
Richmond, D.	Breadalbane, L. (E. Breadalbane.)
Rutland, D.	Clanbrassill, L. (E. Roden.)
Beaconsfield, E.	Colville of Culross, L.
Bradford, E.	Conyers, L.
Cadogan, E.	De Freyne, L.
Dundonald, E.	Delamere, L.
Ellesmere, E.	Digby, L.
Graham, E. (D. Mont-rose.)	Dorchester, L.
Haddington, E.	Dunmore, L. (E. Dunmore.) [Teller.]
Mount Edgcumbe, E.	Ellenborough, L.
Nelson, E.	Forester, L.
Ravensworth, E.	Gerard, L.
Romney, E.	Gormanston, L. (V. Gormanston.)
Rosse, E.	Grey de Radcliffe, L. (V. Grey de Wilton.)
Rosslyn, E.	Inchiquin, L.
Saint Germans, E.	Kenlis, L. (M. Head-fort.)
Selkirk, E.	Meldrum, L. (M. Huntly.)
Stanhope, E.	Norton, L.
Strathmore and King-horn, E.	Penrhyn, L.
Wilton, E.	Ribblesdale, L.
Zetland, E.	Romilly, L.
Hawarden, V.	Rosebery, L. (E. Rose-bery.)
Melville, V.
Strathallan, V.
Alington, L.
Ashford, L. (V. Bury.)

Saint Leonards, L.	Stewart of Garlies, L.
[Teller.]	(E. Galloway.)
Saltoun, L.	Stratheden and Camp-
Sandhurst, L.	bell, L.
Skelmersdale, L.	Windsor, L.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

ARMY—BRIGADE DEPOT CENTRES.

ADDRESS FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY moved—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for a Return showing for what number of troops the barracks at each 'Brigade Depot Centre' throughout the United Kingdom are at present constructed or in course of construction."

The noble Earl said, he understood in 1871 or 1872, that when the brigade depot centres was adopted the barracks in connection with them were to hold something like 600 men.

VISCOUNT BURY said, his noble Friend was mistaken in supposing that the brigade depot centre barracks were ever intended to accommodate 600 men. The original intention was that the barracks at each centre should hold 100 men, and that in case more accommodation was required, owing to the brigade being extended to war strength, or other emergency, huts or tents should be provided. As constructed, however, the barracks could, on the average, accommodate 237 men and 15 officers, and 25 married men's quarters. This, he begged their Lordships to note, was not the measure of the barrack accommodation of the country generally; he referred only to the barracks built for the purposes of the brigade depot centres.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BILL.

(The Earl De La Warr.)

(NO. 7.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR appealed to the noble Earl (Earl de la Warr) who had charge of this Bill, to postpone the debate till the end of next month, in view of the fact that the Government had a Bill on the same subject, on which they desired at the earliest possible moment consistent with the due progress of other Business to take the opinion of the House.

EARL DE LA WARR said, he had no hesitation in acceding to the request of the noble and learned Earl.

Adjourned debate on Motion for Second Reading put off to Tuesday the 24th of June next.

METROPOLIS—GRAVEL IN THE PARKS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND asked whether it was intended this year, as formerly, to lay down gravel between the Marble Arch and Hyde Park Corner, the end of Rotten Row and Queen's Gate, and in Regent's Park? He made this request as much in the interest of pedestrians as equestrians, as the gravel did not splash as much as the macadam; and it was already laid down between Buckingham Palace and the top of Constitution Hill. If it splashed in the one case it would in the other. He should like to prefer a further request for some place to shelter from a storm; but with a Free Trade Budget and an energetic and Protectionist foreign policy, he dared not ask for even a small sum for such a purpose. He would leave the matter over until another year, when circumstances might be more favourable.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that he was unable to accede to the request of his noble Friend. Rotten Row was a place entirely set apart for riding, and was specially laid down for the purpose of being ridden upon. But as regarded the space between the Marble Arch and Hyde Park Corner the case was quite different, and for the sake of pedestrians he was obliged to refuse his noble Friend's request. Equestrians had ample space in Rotten Row for riding. It was, however, the intention of the First Commissioner of Works to put down some gravel in Regent's Park.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND said, he was glad to hear that something would be done for putting down gravel in the Regent's Park, and he hoped the same favour would be granted to the road from Rotten Row to the Queen's Gate.

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 12th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee —CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, Class II., Votes
1 to 17.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Inclosure Provisional Order (Matterdale Common)* [171]; Inclosure Provisional Order (Redmoor and Golberdon Commons)* [172];
Inclosure Provisional Order (Maltby Lands)*
[173]; Inclosure Provisional Order (East Stainmore Common)* [174].

First Reading—Metropolis (Little Coram Street,
Bloomsbury, Wells Street, Poplar, and Great Peter Street, Westminster,) Improvement Provisional Orders Confirmation* [175].

Second Reading—West India Loans* [167]; Courts of Justice Building Act (1865) Amendment [156]; Valuation of Lands and Asses-ments (Scotland)* [144]; Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment* [134].

Committee—Report—Summary Jurisdiction (re-comm.) [138-169]; Criminal Code (Indictable Offences)* [170].

Third Reading—Valuation of Lands (Scotland)
Amendment* [16], and passed.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

MR. E. JENKINS gave Notice, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), to-morrow, to move—

"That, in order to prevent the growing abuse, under the advice of Ministers, of the privilege and influence of the Crown, it is necessary that the Royal Prerogative should be more strictly limited and defined."

QUESTIONS.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—TELE-GRAPH CLERKS.—QUESTION.

MR. M. BROOKS asked the Postmaster General, Whether, referring to the memorial from the telegraph clerks in the Dublin Post Office, it is intended to raise their pay to an equality with that given to the clerks in the principal English cities discharging similar duties; and, if so, when the reform may be expected to come into operation?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, I beg to inform the hon. Gentleman that the question is now under the consideration of the Government.

CONSTABULARY (IRELAND)—CASE OF SUB-CONSTABLE JOYCE.—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether sub-constable Joyce, and several other constables of the County Sligo Constabulary, have verbally complained to the county inspector, as regards fines, removals, or other punishments, as being of a harsh and unjust character; and, whether such constables and sub-constables have, notwithstanding such verbal complaints, signed a statement through fear of consequences, that they had no complaints to make; and why the county inspector did not himself, or his clerks, put such complaints in writing, and forward them to the Inspector General of Constabulary?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, as I explained upon a recent occasion, there is a prescribed form in which complaints should be made by members of the Constabulary Force, and I find that sub-constable Joyce made no official complaint.
It appears that the County Inspector very properly took an opportunity of urging upon him verbally the desirability of abstaining from the course of conduct which had led to the imposition of a recent fine, but that no complaint was made in the official form against that fine; and it was not the duty of the County Inspector to forward reports of conversations. I see that the hon.
and gallant Gentleman attributes to members of the Force that they have signed incorrect statements through fear of consequences. I believe that there is no foundation whatever for that allegation; and as the conduct of the County Inspector is called in question, I have made inquiries, from which I find that in three years, during which time he has had upwards of 200 men under his command, the total fines imposed by him have only averaged £2 6s. 8d. per annum.

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—GENERAL
ROBERTS' DESPATCH.—QUESTION.

GENERAL SHUTE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether General Roberts' Supplementary Despatch, published in part only by the Indian Government in the "Gazette of India," dated Calcutta, March 8th, referring to the important services rendered by the 1st Brigade at the successful direct attack and capture of the Peiwar Kotal, will appear in its entirety in the "London Gazette?"

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I am afraid I can only say that the whole of this supplementary despatch received in this country shall appear in The Gazette immediately.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR— SURGEON MAJOR REYNOLDS.

QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether under the new regulations, the recent promotion of Surgeon Major Reynolds, of the 2-24th, for his distinguished services at Rorke's Drift, would not in the ordinary course of events have taken place in a few months; and, under these circumstances, if he will consider whether some further recognition might not fairly be made of that officer's gallant conduct, and of the prominent part he took in the defence on that memorable occasion?

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY: Sir, in the absence of the Secretary of State for War, I may say, in reply to the hon. Gentleman's Question, that very great service has undoubtedly been done by Surgeon Major Reynolds in South Africa, and he was specially promoted 14 months before he could have been in the ordinary course of things, and by that he had passed over the heads of 64 officers.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR— THE 60TH RIFLES—COURT MARTIAL.

QUESTION.

MR. FRENCH asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House all the Papers relating to the trial by court martial of a sergeant of the 60th Rifles for retiring a picket on the alarm of the enemy without the order of his officer, in which he was sentenced to five years' penal servitude and reduction to the ranks?

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY: Sir, the only Papers relating to the trial which have been received are those embodied in Lord Chelmsford's despatch of April 10, which has been published in The London Gazette. No further Papers are expected.

General Shute

MEDICAL REFORM.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, considering the complicated circumstances in which the important question of medical reform is now placed, and in order to avoid further unnecessary delay, he will now agree to its reference to a Select Committee as soon as possible, so that some progress may be made towards dealing with it?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, I stated some time back the course that the Government intended to pursue—namely, to embody in a Bill those educational reforms which had met, after protracted discussion, with the approval of the vast majority of the Medical Profession, and to refer to a Select Committee the disputed question of the constitution of the Medical Council, undertaking that the Government Bill should not be proceeded with until the Report of the Committee had been received. This course, in our opinion, was the most convenient and the most likely to save time; but I have been unable to carry it out, as the appointment of the Committee is blocked by an Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, which he will not withdraw. We are, therefore, in this position—that we must either accede to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman to refer all the questions contained in all the Medical Bills to a Select Committee, or postpone indefinitely—for the same difficulty would arise next Session—the prospect of medical reform. As this is a contingency much feared by medical reformers, we are ready to adopt the inconvenient procedure forced on us rather than sacrifice our Bill; and if, therefore, those hon. Gentlemen who have Amendments to the Medical Bills will withdraw them, so as to allow them to be read a second time, I will move that they be referred in their entirety to a Select Committee.

SPAIN—LABOUR IN CUBA.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any information as to the terms of a Treaty or Convention concluded between the Spanish Government and the King of Annam for the supply of Annamite labourers to Cuba; and, if not, whether he will endeavour to ascertain how far those terms are calculated to secure the labourers in question from the oppressions which indentured labourers from other countries have endured and are enduring in Cuba?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that an Annamite Mission visited Madrid last year; but in the Report received at the time from our Chargé d'Affaires no mention was made of any Convention between the Spanish Government and the King of Annam for the supply of Annamite labourers to Cuba. Due inquiry would, however, be made into the subject now that it had been brought to the notice of the Government.

INDIA FAMINE COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, about the India Famine Commission, as to what parts of India that Commission has visited, what results brought out, where the Commissioners are at present, what they are doing, and when may their Report be expected; and, finally, what has as yet been the cost of this inquiry?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, this Commission has visited or received evidence from the greater part of India. The result has been the collection of a great mass of very valuable information, which will require considerable time to sift and arrange. That work has been intrusted to Mr. Justice Cunningham and Mr. Elliott. Mr. Caird has come back to England, General Strachey has resumed his position as a member of the Council of the Secretary of State, and the other members are in India. The Commission is now considering its Report; but I fear some time must elapse before it is completed.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — BIRMINGHAM BOARD SCHOOLS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. HARDCASTLE asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether his attention has been drawn to the report in the "Times" of May 5th, of a meeting of the Birmingham School Board, at which a resolution was carried "that systematic moral instruction should be given in all the Birmingham Board Schools," and the chairman proposed that special times should be set apart for moral instruction, the character of which he indicated in these words—

"That the children should be taught that there were moral laws, and that those laws should be enforced, and that if in the course of the instruction the name of God was mentioned he saw no harm in it;"

whether the setting apart special times for teaching this vague morality would come within the power given by the Act to set apart special times for religious teaching; and, whether, under the Conscience Clause, the children of parents who objected to the kind of instruction likely to be deduced from such materials by teachers prohibited from alluding to religion in any way, would be allowed to withdraw during the time set apart for this systematic moral teaching?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the only information which we have concerning the proposed arrangement is derived from the public Press; and from that it appears that a discussion did take place at the Birmingham School Board, and that, in the opinion of the majority of the Board, the moral condition of the children in the Board Schools was not altogether satisfactory. There was very considerable divergence of opinion as to the remedy to be adopted. As regards the second part of the Question, I am afraid that until we are in possession of the code of moral ethics which it is proposed to teach, it would not be possible for me to give an answer, especially as the only information we have is the opinion of the chairman that the elder children should be put through a slight course of Acts of Parliament. In regard to the last part of the Question, the Education Act of 1870 did not contemplate the contingency of any School Board substituting moral for the religious instruction generally received; and I am sure my hon. Friend will not ask me to give an opinion on any complication which may ensue from the adoption of such a proposal until it comes before us in due form.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Will the noble Lord allow me to ask him, Whether he is not mistaken in saying that anything has appeared in the public Press or elsewhere which would justify the statement that the majority of the Birmingham School Board are dissatisfied with the present moral condition of the children under their charge?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I have hero the report of the discussion at a meeting of the Birmingham School Board. The motion which was brought forward by the chairman, which was ultimately carried, was met by an amendment that such moral instruction was not necessary. That amendment was lost by four votes to nine. The next amendment was that instruction should be given based on the Bible, and it was lost by five votes to seven. The original motion, which was to the effect that moral instruction might be given, was carried, there being 11 votes for and nine against.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The noble Lord has not answered the Question that I ventured to put to him—namely, what authority he has for the statement that the majority of the Birmingham School Board are of opinion that the moral condition of the children under their charge is at the present time unsatisfactory?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The statement which I made, and the only information I possessed, was derived from the public Press, from which it appeared that, in the opinion of the majority of the Board, the moral condition of the children in their schools was not altogether satisfactory. If the moral condition of the children in the Birmingham schools be thoroughly satisfactory, I cannot understand why the chairman made the motion which he did.

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE BALKAN GARRISONS.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is true that the Governments of Turkey and Russia have come to an agreement by which the former gives up the right of placing garrisons in the Balkans and of occupying with troops any places in Eastern Roumelia? He also wished to ask, Whether the Government can confirm the intelligence which was published in the "Standard" of to-day? The correspondent of the "Standard" says—

"General Obrutscheff, the adjutant general of the Czar, stepped up to the altar, and, surrounded by the leading ecclesiastics, addressed the crowd who filled the nave and aisles. He had come to them, he said, as the representative of the powerful Monarch who had liberated them from the yoke of the infidels, and would defend their independence against the whole world. The Czar wished, through him, to acquaint the Bulgarians with the fact that in deference to a letter addressed by him to the Turkish Sultan, the latter had abandoned the idea of sending any troops into East Roumelia. Henceforth, East Roumelia will be a free country, exempt from the oppression that might be exercised by the Turkish troops in the Balkans, at Ichtiman, or at Bourgas. To neither of these places would an Ottoman soldier approach again under the arrangements arrived at."

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I am sorry to say that I have not seen The Standard, nor have I heard anything about the Notice which the right hon. Gentleman read to the House. In regard to the Question on the Paper, I have only to tell the right hon. Gentleman that we know of no such agreement as is described in his Question.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1870—CATTLE FROM THE UNITED STATES.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Vice President of the Council, If he is aware that Professor W. W. Williams, of the Edinburgh Veterinary College, had written a letter to Dr. Laidlaw, veterinary pathologist of Albany, New York, denying in the most emphatic terms that pleuro-pneumonia has existed in any cattle hitherto imported from the United States; whether his attention has been called to a letter of Professor Williams, dated 29th of March, in which the following passage occurs:—

"Since first arrival of 'Ontario' with cattle, others have arrived at Liverpool, and I have examined the lungs said by Privy Council inspectors to have pleuro-pneumonia, and satisfied all who have seen them that no pleuro-pneumonia has arrived here from America; indeed, everybody is surprised that such a gross mistake should have been made. The last lot—seven in number—examined by me had bronchitis, with collapse of the lung; but not a trace of pleurisy nor of pneumonia, yet they were declared by the authorities in London to have typical pleuro-pneumonia. I have the specimens most carefully preserved, and am ready to show them to the whole world if necessary;"

and, what steps he proposes to take to satisfy himself of the correctness of these statements?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, a statement of Professor Williams was forwarded to the Privy Council Office by the Canadian Government last month, and upon receiving it the Privy Council requested Professor Brown, the head of the Veterinary Department, to investigate the subject. I will read the Memorandum which he has drawn up, and which was sent in reply to the Canadian Government—

Mr. Chamberlain

"On January 26 the steam ship Ontario arrived at Liverpool, having on board 195 cattle and two carcasses; 87 head of cattle had been thrown overboard, making the total number shipped 284. On examining one of the carcasses, the Inspector at Liverpool found evidence of pleuro-pneumonia, and forwarded portions of the lung to the Veterinary Department. This specimen was found to represent the characteristic indications of the contagious pleuro-pneumonia of cattle so well known in this country. By direction of the Lord President, I immediately instructed Mr. Duguid, one of the Inspectors of this Department, to proceed to Liverpool and report as to the condition of the animals which had been detained there. Mr. Duguid remained at Liverpool and superintended the slaughter of the cattle, and in the course of the post-mortem examination he detected 13 cases of pleuro-pneumonia in various stages. Since the landing of the cattle from the Ontario in January, cases of the disease have been detected among cattle from the United States by the Inspector at Liverpool in three other cargoes, and in one cargo by the Inspector at the Foreign Cattle Market, Deptford. Portions of the lungs taken from the diseased cattle were forwarded by the Inspectors to the Veterinary Department; and I took the opportunity of submitting some of the specimens to the inspection of several experts who have made pleuro-pneumonia of cattle a subject of special inquiry, and they were unanimous in their expression of opinion that the morbid changes were indicative of contagious pleuro-pneumonia. I may add that the alterations which are apparent in the lung structure in contagious pleuro-pneumonia, even in the earliest stages, are so different from those which occur in any other affection of the lungs of the ox, that no competent pathologist would experience any difficulty in arriving at a correct conclusion as to the nature of the disease."

I may add that since the date of this Report six cargoes of cattle from America have been landed at Liverpool and Deptford in which contagious pleuro-pneumonia has been found to exist.

INDIA—THE INDIAN BUDGET.

QUESTIONS.

MR. FAWCETT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will inform the House on what Motion the Indian Budget will be brought forward; and, whether he will arrange that it shall be brought forward in such a way as will allow of the opinion of the House being taken on the financial position of India?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that he had consulted with his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India as to the most convenient course to be adopted, and, having reference to the Notice of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), he thought the best course would be to proceed with the Committee on the Indian Loans Bill. The House would be in Committee when the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman as to the amount of the loans would be moved. On going into Committee, his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India would make a statement of the financial position of India; and he presumed that the question to be then submitted would be of such a character as to give ample opportunity for discussing the financial position of the country. There would also be other opportunities for raising other points in connection with the subject.

MR. FAWCETT: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask your opinion upon a very important question of Parliamentary procedure which affects the Privileges of this House. As I understand, the Under Secretary of State for India will make the Budget Statement—the entire financial statement of India—on the Motion which is already in Committee for raising a loan of £10,000,000—that Motion being in Committee, it will be absolutely impossible to raise any question except for reducing by the Amendment the loan, or rejecting the proposal altogether—I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, Whether it is not unusual, when the Budget is brought forward, that the House should not be afforded an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon the general financial condition of India? I understand that under the arrangement proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that opportunity would not be given.

MR. SPEAKER: The more usual course, no doubt, is for the Indian Budget to be proposed either in Committee or on the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair. At the same time, I cannot say that the course proposed to be taken by the Government is out of Order, although it is unusual.

MR. FAWCETT: After the opinion expressed by you, Sir, and feeling that the course proposed by the Government would take away from the House its proper opportunity of discussion, I beg to give Notice that if the Government persist in their resolution to make the Budget Statement, not on the Motion that you do leave the Chair, but on the proposition on going into Committee, I shall resist it by moving, as soon as we get into Committee, that Progress be reported.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—RAILWAYS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BEAUMONT asked the Secretary of State for War, If he is aware that portable narrow gauge Railways can be laid down at the rate of several miles per day, in such a country as many parts of South Africa, and that an offer from a responsible firm has been made to undertake such work; and if, in view of the extreme importance of a ready means of transport to the success of the War in Zululand, he will give his attention to the subject?

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY, in reply, said, a suggestion had been made that portable narrow-gauge railways in South Africa might be laid down at the rate of three miles a-day; but the information in the hands of the Secretary of State did not lead him to the same conclusion.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—SHIPPING OFFICE FEES.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he will cause to be placed upon the Table of the House without delay, an account of the Income and Expenditure for Shipping Office Fees received for the examination of masters and mates, and for engaging and discharging ships' crews, for the year ending 31st December 1878?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, a partial Return, such as the hon. Member suggests, would, I think, be misleading. I propose, therefore, to lay upon the Table as soon as possible an approximate Return of the Income and Expenditure of the Mercantile Marine Fund for the last financial year, which will, I hope, give the hon. Gentleman all the information he desires.

NAVY—H.M.S. "IRON DUKE." QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it be correct that the ironclad ship "Iron Duke" is on shore at Shanghai; if so, if he will be good enough to inform the House what damage the vessel has sustained, and, if got off, if she can be docked at Hong Kong or elsewhere in Chinese waters?

Mr. Fawcett

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the Admiralty has not received any information, either from the Admiral commanding in China or the Captain of the Iron Duke; but information reached the Admiralty on Thursday from Lloyd's, which was to the effect that the Iron Duke was on shore, and I have this afternoon received a telegram through the Committee of Lloyd's—and I owe them thanks for their courtesy—informing me that the Iron Duke is not now on shore, but that she has been got off with assistance; and, so far as we know, there is no reason to suppose that she has sustained any damage. The Iron Duke was docked at Hong Kong on the 29th of March, and I think it was mentioned in the newspapers at the time. But she could be docked both at Hong Kong and Japan. If I receive any further information, I will take care to mention it as soon as possible to the House.

PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN.

ALTERATION OF MOTION.

MR. DILLWYN: I find, Sir, that an interpretation has been placed upon the Resolution of which I have given Notice for to-morrow other than that which it was my intention to put upon it. It has been understood to imply a censure upon the Crown. Nothing is further from my intention; and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) has given a Notice which meets my view perfectly, without being liable to any such interpretation, I beg to intimate that I shall either alter my Resolution in accordance with the Notice of the hon. Member, or accept his Resolution to-morrow evening.

Subsequently, Mr. DILLWYN gave Notice as follows:—

"Constitutional Usage (Functions of the Sovereign).—That, to prevent the growing abuse by Her Majesty's Ministers of the prerogative and influence of the Crown, and consequent augmentation of the power of the Government in enabling them, under cover of the supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign, to withdraw from the cognizance and control of this House matters relating to policy and expenditure properly within the scope of its powers and privileges, it is necessary that the mode and limits of the action of the prerogative should be more strictly observed."

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR— THE LATEST TELEGRAM.

OBSERVATION.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I have received information from South Africa which it may be of interest to the House to hear, as it conveys later intelligence from the Transvaal than any which has yet been published. It is dated Cape Town, April 27—

"High Commissioner at Pretoria telegraphs that Boers' camp broke up on the 18th inst. and all have dispersed quietly to their homes. The Conference between High Commissioner and Boers' Committee at Erasmus Farm took place April 12, lasted five hours and a-half, and passed off in a perfectly friendly manner."

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND). QUESTION.

MR. W. HOLMS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, having regard to the fact that the rate of payment for children in industrial schools in Scotland is only four shillings and six pence per week, whereas it is five shillings per week for children in such schools in England and Ireland, and moreover the Secretary to the Treasury having last year given an assurance to the House "that he would consider the question, with a view, if possible, of getting rid of the grievance complained of," he is now prepared to put Scotland, as regards this grant, on an equality with England and Ireland?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that this matter had been under consideration, but thought the most convenient time to discuss the question was when the Vote came on in the Estimates.

THE NATIONAL FINANCES AND TREATIES—CONTROL OF PARLIAMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE gave Notice that either on the Motion for the second reading, or on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair, that the House may resolve itself into Committee on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, he would move the following Resolution:—

"This House will not recognize or accept as binding any Treaty or other engagements entered into by Her Majesty's Ministers which might forestall or limit the control of this House over the financial resources and taxation of this Country, until full information as to such contemplated engagements has been laid upon the Table of this House, and this House shall have had the opportunity of expressing an opinion thereon."

He wished to meet the convenience of the Government in bringing forward the Motion; and he wished, therefore, to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether he proposed to proceed with the second reading of the Bill that evening?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he had hoped to move the second reading that evening; but as his hon. Friend was going to raise so important a question in connection with it, it might be convenient that there should be some little further delay. As his hon. Friend, however, had expressed his willingness to move his Amendment on the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair, the second reading might be taken that evening, and the Committee fixed for some convenient day.

PARLIAMENT — THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.—QUESTION.

MR. MAC IVER said, he wished to put a Question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to the Business of the House. Wednesday, the 28th instant, was the Derby Day, and the following Sunday would be Whit Sunday. The time at which the House would adjourn for the Whitsuntide Recess was, therefore, matter of importance to those hon. Members who had Notices on the Paper for the eve of the Derby Day. He himself happened to have the first Notice on the Paper for Tuesday, the 27th. It was an important Motion relating to the agriculture and manufactures of the country, and he thought many hon. Gentlemen besides himself would be anxious to know whether the Government would permit his Motion to be discussed; and, if so, whether it would be at the ordinary hour, or at any other time?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have considered, in conjunction with my Colleagues, which would be the most convenient day for the House to rise for the Whitsuntide Holidays, and we are of opinion that, as there was but a short Holiday at Easter, it would, perhaps, be convenient to the House to adjourn from Tuesday, the 27th instant, to the Monday week following. The House would not, of course, rise on the Tuesday until after the conclusion of the last Business for which it met. I intend to propose that we should take a Morning Sitting on that day. That would not involve the necessity for the House rising at the end of the Morning Sitting. The House may sit again in the evening at 9 o'clock, and as the question which the hon. Member intends to raise has attracted a good deal of interest, I think it would then have a fair chance of being discussed.

Mr. MAC IVER said, that, after the intimation which had just been made, it was not his intention of bringing on his Motion on Tuesday evening, the 27th instant; but he might bring it forward in opposition to the proposal for a Morning Sitting, or in some other way.

THE METROPOLITAN BRIDGES.

QUESTION.

SIR JAMES LAWRENCE asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, When the remaining toll bridges over the Thames will be thrown open free to the public?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG, in reply, said, there was no authority for the statement which had appeared in the public prints that five additional bridges would be thrown open on the 17th instant. The second section of five bridges would, however, be opened within three weeks. He could not at present fix the precise day. There were beyond that number three bridges which would remain to be thrown open.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

[Progress.]

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

(1.) £23,343, to complete the sum for the Patent Office, &c.

(2.) £20,744, to complete the sum for the Paymaster General's Office.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

(3.) £8,332, to complete the sum for the Public Works Loan Commission and West India Islands Relief Commission.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN inquired when the Report of the Public Works Loan Commission was likely to be printed and distributed to hon. Members? It was of extreme importance that this Report should be in their hands before they proceeded to the discussion of the Public Works Loan Act, inasmuch as it would contain certain information which had not been included in any previous Report. The House ought to be in possession of information as to the total amount of losses which had been incurred, and on what classes of loans these losses appeared. He hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would give him some assurance that the information he desired would be furnished to the House.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON had no doubt the information would be very useful, and he thought he would be able to present it to the House before they discussed the Public Works Loan Act. He would not like, however, to pledge himself on that point.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £17,420, to complete the sum for the Record Office.

(5.) £38,801, to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, England.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked whether any arrangement had been made in view of taking the Census in 1881? He might remind the Committee and the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this question was put in the Session before last; that it was very necessary to make timely arrangements for having uniformity in the three divisions as to the information to be obtained; that the arrangements for putting forward the vast store of information should be agreed as common for the three divisions; and that the publication of the Reports and tables should be made promptly. If possible, the Irish tables should not be spread over so many years as for the last Census. There was also needed an Act of Parliament to authorize the Census being taken, and to give legality to the demands for information. Probably, it would be advisable to form a Select Committee of a few Members to make the requisite inquiries.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied that he had done nothing in regard to the matter yet; but he would bear it in mind.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding $377,088, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for Stationery, Printing, and Paper, Binding, and Printed Books for the several Departments of Government in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and some Dependencies, and for the two Houses of Parliament, and for the Salaries and Expenses of the Establishment of the Stationery Office, and the cost of Stationery Office Publications, and of the Gazette Offices; and for sundry Miscellaneous Services, including a Grant in Aid of the publication of Parliamentary Debates."

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, it would be in the recollection of the Committee that, in the discussion on the Supplementary Estimates, the Secretary to the Treasury was asked to make some arrangement by which some of the more important documents printed by the House should be circulated to the free libraries of the country under representative management. It was understood that the hon. Gentleman would communicate with Mr. Speaker to ascertain whether the documents of the House could be so distributed. He desired to ask what progress had been made in the matter?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he well remembered the promise he had made, and he had since been in consultation with Mr. Speaker on this particular point. The whole question of the future printing of the Parliamentary Papers was now being considered. Sufficient progress, however, had not been made to enable him to say that arrangements had been made with regard to the distribution of these documents. He assured the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) that the subject had not escaped his attention; and he hoped before very long to be in a position to make some definite statement.

MR. BRISTOWE asked if any part of the investigation had been directed to the cost of the various publications? It was one thing to go into the question of printing, and another to go into the cost. He could not help thinking that this was a matter of some consequence.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the cost formed one of the special items of consideration.

MR. BRISTOWE did not mean the cost of production, but the cost of the publications to the public outside—to the purchaser.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON understood what the hon. Gentleman meant; but, at the same time, he did not hold out any hope that it would be possible to reduce the price to any great extent. At the present, the price represented only the cost of the work.

MR. BRISTOWE hoped something would be done in this matter, because it was merely the cost of the printing and the paper that ought to be charged.

MR. MONK asked for an explanation why the Estimate for the coming year in respect to printing was £15,000 above that last year? Last year the amount was £121,000, and this year it was £136,000. That was a very large increase, and, without some explanation, the Committee ought not to be asked for so large an extra sum.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON observed, that if the hon. Member would refer to the Estimates, he would find that the real increase in the Vote amounted to £11,200. Of the sum mentioned, £3,800 was only an apparent increase; £2,000 was for the new forms required in the biennial re-assessment of the Income Tax, and the remainder represented an actual increase of work for several of the Departments.

MAJOR NOLAN said, there was an amount included in the Vote for the Queen's University, and which might be called a long-standing sore between the Irish Members and the Financial Department of the Government. He would not go into the merits of the question; but it was obvious that, if the protest against this institution was to have any value, the Vote could not pass unchallenged. The Government were said to be anxious to give Ireland equality in University education; but when he saw that the Queen's College, which was an institution opposed to the general spirit of the greatest part of the Irish nation, was the only institution of the kind getting its stationery at the expense of the nation, he could not but object. He should be glad if the Vote could be put off until Irish Members could receive Notice of it; but if the Government insisted upon taking it, he must put the House to the trouble of a Division; and he should, therefore, move to reduce the Vote by the sum of £150.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £376,918, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for Stationery, Printing, and Paper, Binding, and Printed Books for the several Departments of Government in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and some Dependencies, and for the two Houses of Parliament, and for the Salaries and Expenses of the Establishment of the Stationery Office, and the cost of Stationery Office Publications, and of the Gazette Offices; and for sundry Miscellaneous Services, including a Grant in Aid of the publication of Parliamentary Debates."—(Major Nolan.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON explained that it was true that in the total amount for stationery there was included a sum sufficient for the Queen's University; but should the House decide that the Queen's University should not be retained on the Estimates, the fact of the House having passed this Vote would in no way affect that decision. The sum put down was not the sum it was proposed to spend during the present year; but it was the sum put down for stationery in 1877-8, and the only object in putting it down was to show, for the information of the Committee, how the total amount was distributed among the Departments. Should the House decide against the Queen's College, and this money not be spent, then it would find its way back to the Exchequer as a surplus on the Stationery Vote. By passing the Vote as it stood, they would not be committing themselves on the subject of University education.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY confessed that last year, when the subject was discussed, he did not understand the explanation given, and he did not understand it now. £332,441 was required for stationery, and he was told how the sum was to be applied among the different Departments. Were not the Committee voting the surplus for this year? Was it expenditure already incurred?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, what he wished to convey was that this Vote for stationery was a general

Vote, and no part of it was appropriated to any one purpose. There was no charge in the Vote now before the Committee for the Queen's Colleges; but the amount granted out of a Vote in the previous year to the Queen's Colleges was stated. As the House once expressed a desire to know the way in which the business of the Stationery Office was managed, a list of amounts, showing how the Vote had been appropriated, was put in for the first time last year. The list given in the Vote now before the Committee did not show how this money would be appropriated, but how the money which was voted in 1866-7 was appropriated, and out of that sum £129 went for the Queen's Colleges. That simply showed the Committee what was then done. In 1881-2 there would be a similar list, showing how the money now to be voted had been appropriated, and not before.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, as he understood it, the Crown required £332,441 for stationery for the present year, and it gave in the Vote information as to how a similar sum was expended in a previous year; but, at any rate, if the £332,441 was wanted, and was neither too much nor too little, ipso facto if they refused the Vote, the Department must go without it.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON wished to make the matter plain. Nothing could possibly be given to the Queen's Colleges until the Committee had sanctioned it in the Estimates. After the Vote had passed which sanctioned an appropriation from it to the Queen's Colleges, but without naming any particular sum, it would not necessarily follow that anything would be given to the Queen's Colleges, unless it was shown they required it. The figures now before the Committee ought not to appear in the Estimates at all, except to show how the Stationery Office did its work. It did not in the least imply that £120 would be wanted this year, nor did it imply that the Department would be able to give that amount, because the sum total for all purposes was all that came before the Committee. There very often was an excess on the Vote, and sometimes a deficiency; and if there was a deficiency, they would have to make a Supplementary Estimate.

MR. RYLANDS understood that it was not necessarily intended to dispose of the amount of the Vote in precisely the same channels as before, and in the same way. It might happen that the Queen's Colleges might not apply for anything this year, or for less, whilst double the usual amount might be wanted in some other direction; but, on the whole, in a rough way, in order to satisfy the Committee, the Government took what they had expended in the different Departments before, to show that a similar amount would be required again. He noticed that £11,500 was put down for printing for borough and county prisons; and having regard to the recent taking over of the prisons, he wished to know on what that Estimate was based?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he believed it was a fair and ample Estimate; but, with the short experience they had had of the new system, he could not speak with certainty as to its accuracy.

MR. J. COWEN wished to call attention to a point of some importance, affecting the officials of this Department, and that was the very great change which had recently taken place in the character of the paper on which their publications were printed. Formerly, the paper was chiefly composed of rags, and showed greater tenacity; but during the last few years, the paper had been made of various fibrous materials, such as wood-fibre, straw, and Esparto grass. In some cases, the paper was composed of two-thirds fibre, and one-third rags, and the consequence was that, in a few years, it became spotted, the ink gathered into places, and a good deal of the printing became unreadable. Any publication that had to be preserved must be printed on good paper. It would be well if the authorities were aware of that fact, and if the quality of the official paper were of a little better description. It had been recently found that a large mass of papers in the Government Offices at Washington had become totally useless from the poor quality of the material, and the Government had had to go to great expense in re-printing some of them. He did not know that the world would be much the worse if many of our official papers were not preserved; but he commended the subject to the attention of the Stationery Office.

MAJOR NOLAN gave credit to the Treasury for putting forward the very best Estimate they could obtain; but there was another point of greater importance than the accuracy of the Estimate. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had told the Committee that none of the money could be expended on Queen's Colleges, until they had decided that there should be Queen's Colleges at all in Ireland. Now, if he had a hope of beating the Government on that question, he should think it would be better to wait; but, at present, he had no such hope. Then came the question whether the Irish Members, who were admittedly in the minority, should wait for one big Vote, and then have done with it, or whether it would not be better for them to divide every time they had a fair opportunity. Now, the present seemed to him to be an excellent opportunity of showing their dislike, not to the Queen's Colleges, but to the system which made them the only Collegiate institutions open to the people of Ireland, and did not give them the chance of having Colleges such as they wished. He was sorry so few Irishmen were present; but he thought it would, perhaps, be better to divide.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY advised the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Nolan) not to go to a Division, as the Queen's Colleges would get the Vote, notwithstanding any such action he might take.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he had made a note of the suggestion of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) with regard to the quality of the paper. He believed that under the new contract the paper was supplied at a fixed rate, which was rather above the market price; and, therefore, he hoped it would be of such a quality as to meet the objection of his hon. Friend. He could assure the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) that should the House sanction any other College in Ireland, the Stationery Department would supply their needs out of the Vote. Whatever Department the House sanctioned would come out of this Vote; but the House had to sanction beforehand that the Queen's Colleges should be continued, before those Colleges would get anything from the Stationery Office.

MR. RAMSAY believed the Committee now thoroughly understood the meaning of the hon. Gentleman's remarks, and did not see how the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) would profit by a Division. He (Mr. Ramsay) objected to the manner in which the details of the Vote were given. The details of the past year were available; but the House did not possess the details for the year 1879-80.

MR. HIBBERT asked whether the amount of the Vote might not be reduced by the printing of the Department being performed in prisons, under the Government control? When the gaol at Gloucester was under the control of the county—before its transfer to the Government—the whole of the official printing for the county was very successfully performed by the prisoners in that establishment, and he saw no reason why that should not be done for all the prisons throughout the country.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN thought it was not an inopportune moment to call attention to an item in the Vote with reference to the Foreign Office. During the last year or two Papers of great interest and importance had been furnished by the Foreign Office to the Press, and to other persons, before they reached the hands of hon. Members of the House, who certainly might expect to receive the earliest information from the Government. There might be a reason to give an explanation; but he thought some explanation was required why hon. Members were not furnished with the documents at the time they were entitled to them—namely, at the earliest possible opportunity.

MR. SULLIVAN supposed the hon. Baronet the Member for King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien) did not refer to the surreptitious obtaining of public documents; but he must say he did not agree with the hon. Baronet in his estimate of the relations which ought to exist, and did exist, between the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the public Press. He appealed to the Committee to say that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State, in affording reasonable facilities to the Press, had conducted those relations with great tact and judgment, and with public usefulness. The documents to which reference was made were not published previously to their delivery to Members, but simultaneously; and if the hon. Baronet could show that that was not so, and that Members were put in an inferior position, he should feel the justice of the complaint. But, under present circumstances, if a public document were put into his hands in the morning, and he found that The Times and Telegraph, The Standard and Daily News, had it as well, he did not feel that he suffered any injury. As one formerly connected with journalism, he said the relations between the Foreign Office and the Press were useful for public information; and he hoped as long as the present Under Secretary of State was connected with that Department, he would continue to recognize those relations as being of great public service.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he did not at first move to reduce this Vote, because he merely wanted to have some information. What he complained of was, that during the Eastern Question he did not receive Papers until three or four days after he read of them in the morning papers. That was a state of things which he did not think should continue; and, therefore, in order to elicit some information from the Government, he proposed to reduce the Vote by the sum of £5,000.

THE CHAIRMAN observed, that the Amendment now before the House must first be disposed of.

MR. SHAW thought he and his hon. Friends would not make a very creditable exhibition if they went to a Division, because there were so few of them present. He was never opposed to asserting a principle, even in the Division Lobby; but he thought there were reasons on the present occasion why such a step was unnecessary. The Leader of the House had acted very fairly towards his hon. Friend (the O'Connor Don), who had to introduce a Bill of great importance—the University Bill—and had promised to give him facilities for introducing that measure, if he could not otherwise bring it forward; and he himself was not without hope that the Government, when they heard those propositions, would themselves adopt the measure, and pass it through the House. Under such circumstances, he thought his hon. and gallant Friend (Major Nolan) would be acting wisely in not pressing this matter to a Division.

MAJOR NOLAN remarked, that he did not expect to get much support in the Lobby that night; but he thought it would pave the way to a better division on the Report at a later time. But as his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) had stated some very excellent reasons for allowing the Vote to pass on the present occasion, he would withdraw his opposition, although his own desire would be simply and quietly to divide on every occasion that this Vote was proposed.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £372,088, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for Stationery, Printing, and Paper, Binding, and Printed Books for the several Departments of Government in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and some Dependencies, and for the two Houses of Parliament, and for the Salaries and Expenses of the Establishment of the Stationery Office, and the cost of Stationery Office Publications, and of the Gazette Offices; and for sundry Miscellaneous Services, including a Grant in Aid of the publication of Parliamentary Debates."

—(Sir Patrick O'Brien.)

MR. BOURKE regretted that he was not in the House when the hon. Baronet first spoke; but he gathered, from what he had been told, that the hon. Baronet complained that Papers from the Foreign Office were given to members of the Press before they were distributed to Members of the House. He could only reply that he knew of no case where such a thing had occurred. On the contrary, he took the greatest care that no Papers of any kind should be communicated from the Foreign Office to the Press before they had been communicated to Parliament. As the Committee must be well aware, there had been many occasions when the Press had been extremely anxious to obtain copies of Parliamentary documents; but he had invariably refused to publish them, or to give them in any way to the Press, not merely until the Papers had been communicated, but until they had been communicated to Members. Supposing the case, for instance, of a Paper printed that night, which would be in the hands of Members to-morrow morning, he had not even then communicated it to the Press, until he had made absolutely certain there was no doubt it would be in the hands of Members the next morning.

That was the rule, and he thought if the hon. Baronet would make further inquiries he would find that that rule was adhered to.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN replied, that his complaint had not been fully understood. Speaking for other hon. Members besides himself, he might say that that to which they objected was the fact that they did not receive Papers connected with the Eastern Question till two days after they had appeared in the morning papers. He did not say this was the fault of the Foreign Office; but he did think that they were to blame for the fact that other persons, not Members of either House of Parliament, received these Papers, and knew what they contained, before they were known to the Members of either House. For that reason, he ventured to intervene; and though he did not wish to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division, he could not at all admit the accuracy of the statement of the hon. Gentleman as to the practice of his Office.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON found great delay in communicating the despatches published in The Gazette. There were some from the Cape published in March, which had not yet been sent to hon. Members, and, as a consequence, those of them who wished to follow the progress of the war, for instance, in South Africa, had great difficulty in doing so. He would, therefore, make the suggestion to the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, as he had already suggested to the Secretary of State for War, that the Supplement to The London Gazette, which was always published as a separate paper, should be laid on the Table of the House pro forma on the evening of publication, and then the Supplement could be circulated from the Vote Office. By that means, every Member would have an official copy of these important and interesting despatches in his possession, could follow the steps of the war, and could be ready at any time to take up the topic, instead of receiving these Papers once a month in a Blue Book, when they could be of no possible use. These Gazettes would cost nothing, excepting the paper, for the type was already set up, and the shape of The Gazette made them quite suitable for delivery to Members.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON promised to consider the question, although the matter did not arise within, and was not connected with, his Department.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR earnestly hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would continue to provide for The Army and Navy Lists being published under authority, and that these Lists would be kept better filled with information about the Naval and Military Services. He approved very highly of the excellent table in connection with the cost of stationery and printing done for the various branches of the Civil and Military Services. It was the best mode they had of keeping the expenditure of the Departments under control; and though it was clumsily prepared, and did not arrange the items under the heads in which they appeared in the Estimates, still it did enable hon. Members to compare the sums spent with the sums voted, and he hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would continue to give the matter his attention. So far from discontinuing the list, the Secretary to the Treasury would do good service by endeavouring to make it approach more nearly to perfection by separating the cost of stationery from that of printing, and by an improved arrangement of the figures to connect the amounts with those in the audited accounts. He hoped in future the table would be published in the Appropriation Account, and they would then be able to compare the items in detail with the totals now shown in lump sums. He also asked why The Army List did not appear among the allowances hitherto given for compilation?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he could not explain the matter at that moment; but he would do so on the Report. With regard to the table, he was not very much encouraged to give it by the reception he had met with in that respect hitherto; but he certainly did not intend to discontinue it.

MR. WHITWELL pointed out that although there was a Supplemental Vote in the spring, and although the changes at the Post Office had relieved that Department to some extent, yet there was again an increase in the charges of £4,000. He was quite sure his hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) would pay particular attention to this subject, and the Department would certainly prove a great friend to the Treasury. He thoroughly approved of the present management of the prisons; but he should like to know whether the Stationery Department had charge of the printing in the prisons, or whether that expenditure was now conducted by and included in the cost of that Department? Another matter to which he wished to call attention was the management of The London Gazette. It appeared at the present time to be yielding a considerable profit to the Treasury; but he believed it would be extremely advantageous if the price of that publication were considerably reduced and the circulation largely increased. One portion of the paper which conducted largely to the profit was the advertisements; and, of course, the more extensively the paper was circulated the greater would be the income for advertisements, and the greater the profit, like all other undertakings of a similar kind, from the sale. In addition, as suggested by his hon. and gallant Friend, they would have the benefit that the public announcements in The Gazette would be more widely circulated and more easily got at by those who were interested in them.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON promised that attention should be given to these suggestions; but, at the same time, begged to point out that there was at the present time a very considerable profit from the advertisements in The Gazette, amounting last year to £31,214, which was certainly a considerable sum.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY hoped something would also be done to reduce the price of the advertisements in The Gazette, which, at the present time, was a very serious tax on the mercantile community, who were obliged to put certain advertisements in the paper.

SIR ANDREW LUSK thought a more reasonable price ought certainly to be asked for these advertisements. He found under letter J. that printing, binding, &c. had fallen off by £15,000. He wished to know the reason for that? Paper, also, cost £92,000. Was that bought by contract, or was it ordered from some person as a matter of course? He hoped they did not pay very much for the paper in the Library, for it was not very grand, and the pens were very bad, and the ink was something abominable. It stuck, and would not write.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON replied, that the paper was bought by contract.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked if the contract extended over several years?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, these details did not belong to his particular Department, and he could not give the actual details of that particular contract; but there was a saving under the contract, as made by the Stationery Office, and, comparing the work done in previous years and the prices then paid with the present Estimate, there was a saving of several thousands of pounds.

SIR ANDREW LUSK repeated his question as to the decrease in the Vote under the letter J.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON supposed that it arose from the fact that there had been less printing required in this year, as compared with last, for the prices paid for the work were the same, although the contract was now under consideration.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(7.) £19,386, to complete the sum for the Woods, Forests, &c. Office.

MR. RYLANDS said, some observations were made on this Vote about the management of Windsor Park, when it was previously before the Committee, and he now wished to ask whether the remarks then made had received consideration? Windsor Park ought certainly to be brought under public management as the far more economical way.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON replied, that he could only repeat what he said on the former occasion, that any alteration in the manner of managing the Park must be made by legislation. At the time when the Civil List was agreed to, this particular park was placed among the appanages of the Crown, on the condition that the revenue after the expenses had been paid should go into the Exchequer. He might remind the Committee that a great part of the expenditure on the Park was for the benefit of the public, who derived great enjoyment from its use. The real amount spent, after deducting what the maintenance of the roads, the lodges, &c., cost, was really nothing considerable. Something like £11,000 was paid for the maintenance of the roads and lodges, and £5,000 for the lawns and grass, leaving only a very small sum for the rest of the 1,400 acres.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE pointed out that, so far from there being any revenue from the Park, there was a deficit. Undoubtedly, any change that was made must be made by legislation, and that was why he and his Friends had not sought to call attention to the matter by Divisions; but he would urge the Government to consider whether such legislation ought not to take place. In this case they knew nothing of the expenditure. They only knew that every year there was an extraordinary deficit on Windsor Forest, which they were called upon to vote, without knowing at all how it was made up or why it arose.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) £33,684, to complete the sum for the Works and Public Buildings Office.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR called attention to the large increase which had taken place within the past two years in the Vote for the Office of the Chief Commissioner of Works. Of course, the charges for an Establishment of this kind might be expected to vary; but they had already swelled up to an extent far beyond what appeared to be requisite for the additional work known to have been imposed on the Department. He again had to make complaints of the confused way in which these accounts were presented to Parliament, and now they found an increase of nearly 25 per cent in one small Department, which, remembering the dissatisfaction already existing in the minds of many hon. Members, could not be expected to pass without notice. The expenditure ought to be put more clearly before the Committee, so that they could understand the reason for these increases without running into mistakes.

MR. GERARD NOEL explained that during the last few years several new Departments had been thrown on the Office of Works, such as the Inland Revenue, the Embassy and Consular Buildings abroad, and the Customs Departments.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR was at a loss to understand how that could increase the expenses in the Office to anything in the actual proportion that had taken place. A controlling Office like this ought to be able to take over duties without any such augmentation, nor of the kind as now shown. These duties, of course, might have increased the Vote for Public Buildings, but not necessarily the Office expenses. Besides, he believed these charges were first imposed in 1877-8, so that there was ground for a fair comparison, as these Revenue buildings were then included in the Estimates of this Office.

MR. GERARD NOEL explained that last year the addition of the Customs Department involved the employment of a number of additional officers, and a surveyor to the Embassy and Consular Buildings had been appointed, whose salary was £1,000 a-year, besides his expenses.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £19,700, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st of March 1880, for Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services."

MR. RYLANDS moved the reduction of the Vote by £5,000, on the broad ground that he protested against it altogether, and wished to see it struck off the Estimates. They also had £10,000 charged on the Consolidated Fund in addition, making £25,000 voted annually for Secret Service money. The greater part of it, he believed, was spent by the Foreign Office, although a certain amount was spent by the Colonial Office. He had called attention, in former years, to the way in which this fund was misappropriated, by being applied to purposes not contemplated by Parliament at the time the money was voted. In consequence, some of the abuses which then existed had been removed; but still he was by no means prepared to admit that this fund was now expended in an entirely satisfactory manner. In fact, it was utterly impossible for the Government to justify an expenditure of £20,000 a-year on Secret Service. The sum asked was either very much too much, or very much too small. He had a very strong opinion that part of it was spent in grants to widows of Consuls. [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON dissented.] The hon. Gentleman, he saw, shook his head; but, then, that hon. Gentleman knew no more of the expenditure than he (Mr. Rylands) did. Indeed, if the Secretary to the Treasury would give the Committee the assurance of his word, on which they all placed the greatest reliance, that he knew all about the expenditure of this money, and that, as a public man and an officer of the Crown, he was satisfied with the expenditure, he would withdraw his Amendment. But he ventured to say that not only did the Financial Secretary not know, but the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs did not know, anything about it; for, as they heard some time ago, it was only the Permanent Under Secretary who was permitted to know what became of the money. That had been proved in that House some years ago, when it was said that a certain sum of money had been spent for a certain purpose, for the then Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs got up and denied it. It was afterwards proved to be a true statement, and then it was discovered that the Under Secretary of State denied that it had been spent, because he had been told to deny it, and that all the time he knew nothing whatever of the matter. He (Mr. Rylands) did not think it was proper for the Committee to be asked to vote these sums without some explanation of them being given; certainly, payments to widows of Consuls had been made out of this fund, which was not right, for a Vote was already made for that purpose, and it should not be secretly increased in this way without the knowledge of the House. If, however, the money was really spent in bribing people at foreign Courts to bring information to our Ambassadors, then he could only say that it was a very contemptible method of employing the public money. For many years past, at any rate, it had not succeeded; for he did not believe there was a single instance in which the Government had obtained priority of information by this Secret Service money. It was notorious that the Government were the last persons to learn what was happening, and very often, indeed, the Government did not inform themselves of what appeared in the papers, in order that when questioned they might answer that they knew nothing about any such statements. Possibly, there might have been a time when there was some advantage gained from Secret Service money; but it now seemed to him entirely out of date.

General Sir George Balfour

Another objection he had to the Vote was that the Government were asking for more than they knew they would require. For several years past, unless he was mistaken, they had only spent about £13,000, and the balance had been returned into the Treasury. There was a great disadvantage in giving Votes for more money than might reasonably be expected to be required. The Foreign Office should not put down a sum which there was no reasonable probability would be wanted. Even, therefore, if this reduction of the Vote were assented to, the amount voted would be in excess of what had been required for the last few years.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum not exceeding £14,100 be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services."—(Mr. Rylands.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that, although he was amused, as he generally was on the discussion of this Vote, he could not sympathize with the ingenious attempt of his hon. Friend to extract from him information which, if given, would practically destroy the Vote. If he possessed all the information on this subject that would enable him to answer the challenge that had been made to him, he would be the last man to acknowledge that he was so, and to testify it by making certain statements to the Committee. The justification he had to offer for the Vote was the justification which had been offered by every Secretary to the Treasury who had gone before him—that these amounts were distributed to the different Departments, and that the head of the Department was responsible for the proper administration of it. Whatever might have been the practice in times past, he could renew the assurance that had been given for the last two or three years, that none of the money was now employed in supplementing the salaries of officers abroad or in this country. The hon. Gentleman would see that the amount had been slightly reduced from what it had been in previous years; and he could assure the Committee that it was his anxious wish to reduce this Vote to the lowest amount at which it could possibly be put, taking a fair average. Although he admitted the amount expected had not come up to the grant in recent years, the variation had not been such as to justify a large variation. He thought the Vote did justify the reduction he had made; and, without claiming the possession of any knowledge, and without revealing any secrets, he did think that this particular amount would be sufficient.

SIR ANDREW LUSK was altogether dissatisfied with this Vote. When he first knew it, 14 years ago, it stood at £30,000. After a great deal of talking, he and his Friends brought it down to £25,000; and now it had dropped still lower, to £23,000. Last year there was a good deal of excitement in Europe, and, he supposed, a great deal of Secret Service money was spent; and, therefore, he should like to know how it was that a still further reduction was made? They were told, too, that only £13,000 was spent; and, therefore, he did not see why the Government should ask for £23,000. By perseverance they had already considerably reduced the Vote, and he did not see why it should not come down still further.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE pointed out, that the argument of his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) was that the money was not spent, and, therefore, ought not to be asked for. As a mere matter of scientific administration, if the full sum were never required, the Vote should be put at a lower sum. In the present state of Europe, if ever there was a year when they might have expected that all the money voted would have been required, it would have been last year; yet, even in that year, they found that the expenditure had fallen short by some £10,000. Therefore, it would be far more scientific to take a lower sum. His hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands) had already reduced this Vote by some £6,000 or £7,000, and on the principle on which half the fines were given to the informer, he ought to have had a present from the Government of some £3,000 or £4,000.

MR. GOLDNEY reminded the Committee that the extension of telegraphic communication made the transmission of intelligence more expensive than formerly. It would certainly be exceedingly unwise to cut down the Vote in such a manner that in a moment of pressure there might not be enough required to meet an emergency.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he regarded it as a good sign that the consciences of English Members were being stirred on the question of the Secret Service money. If they were as well acquainted as he (Mr. O'Connor Power) was with Irish affairs, they would, at least, know why so large an expenditure was necessary, though they could not justify it. They frequently heard that the Irish were disloyal; but he supposed few people were aware that a portion of this Secret Service money was spent in manufacturing disloyalty in Ireland. The reason why some of the Irish Members had not called the attention of the House to the matter this year was because they had frequently done so before with such very little effect that they had almost sunk into the slough of despair. The time had arrived, however, for the beginning of hope, when they saw the consciences of English Members being awakened. There could be no doubt that this was the most objectionable Vote in the whole Estimates. Time after time explanations had been demanded of the Vote, and they had never been given by anyone who occupied the position of Secretary to the Treasury. As one who was acquainted with the employment of some of this money in Ireland, as he had seen the facts revealed in police courts in Ireland, when political prisoners were being tried, he felt it his duty to protest against the money being voted in the absence of satisfactory explanations.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 59; Noes 155: Majority 96.—(Div. List, No. 87.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(10.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £5,246, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer in Exchequer, Scotland, of certain Officers in Scotland, and other Charges formerly on the Hereditary Revenue.

SIR ANDREW LUSK moved the reduction of the Vote by £218, being the estimate of amount contributed in Scotland for Queen's Plates. He had moved this over and over again for the last 10 or 15 years. ["Hear, hear!"] Well, the Committee surely did not want a man to fall away as he grew older. He should have thought the House of Commons was old enough to set its face against Queen's Plates, or anything of the kind. In his opinion, they ought not to countenance such sports. The public and the people of Scotland were alive to these things, and, as a rule, did not patronize such folly. If the money had been spent to encourage the breeding of good farm-horses, he would not have had a word to say. But he was sure if the Committee could see, as he had often to see in the course of his magisterial experience, the troubles, and difficulties, and evils which came from racing, they would put their faces against any Votes of this sort. They had already the best shorthorns and the best sheep in the world without any assistance from the State. The State gave no prizes for reaping machines, and he did not see why it should offer prizes for racing. Why should they be asked to promote racing, which led to so much evil? He did manage to get the Vote done away with some years ago; but some Scotch Members were weak in the knees, and were so afraid of losing ground with their constituents that they got it restored. What was the good of a race-horse? For his part, he did not see the use of improving the breed of this kind of animal, because, after all, a race-horse was only an exaggerated greyhound. He regarded it as of no use whatever. Bringing the matter to the test of utility, what was the use of racing? He hoped hon. Members who had had experience of that gentlemanly pastime would tell him. Let them produce some tangible and good results from the spending of the money, and he might be induced to alter his opinion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £5,028, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer in Exchequer, Scotland, of certain Officers in Scotland, and other Charges formerly on the Hereditary Revenue."—(Sir Andrew Lusk.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he confessed that while the consistency of the hon. Baronet (Sir Andrew Lusk) was beyond doubt, the same could not be said of some of the Scotch Members. The House had had a large experience with regard to their wishes. In 1870 the Vote was omitted altogether; but in 1872 the Scotch Members, by a majority, requested that it might be again put upon the Estimates. From that time, as they had not expressed any wish to have it removed, he inferred that they were satisfied that it should be there. He was not prepared, at a moment's notice, to discuss the precise anatomical distinction between a race-horse and a greyhound, nor did he say that this particular Vote did immensely improve the breed of horses; but the object with which it was originally given was for the purpose of improving the breed of horses, encouraging the best class of horse in the country, and thus improving the breed. He would rather leave it to hon. Members for Scotland to decide whether the Vote should be continued; whether they had or had not changed the opinion which during the last few years they expressed; whether, in other words, they wished to see Scotland with a Vote for that particular purpose. He had always understood that the Vote was acceptable in Ireland, as it was in England; and he believed, in spite of what the hon. Baronet had said, that the Scotch Members generally did not desire that their country should be in an exceptional position.

Mr. J. W. BARCLAY said, he was quite ready to bear willing testimony to the desire of the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) to look after the morality, not only of the people of England, but of the people of his native country; but he thought it was a pity to take up the time of the House in considering mere cheeseparing economies, and in discussing such comparatively small matters. For his (Mr. Barclay's) own part, horse-racing was rather contrary to his taste; but, nevertheless, he believed that the people of Scotland, if polled, would be found to be in favour of the granting of these Queen's Plates. He knew, at least, one Northern town in which this question decided the fate of a municipal election. The question arose as to whether the Town Council of that particular place should grant the use of the links for the purpose of horse-racing, and those who were in favour of horse-racing carried the day by a large majority. The people liked to have a holiday. He did not say that, if the thing were to be done anew, this particular sum ought to be devoted to this particular purpose. No doubt, the money might flow into more useful channels; but, seeing that it had been devoted for a specific object, he did not think it ought to be cut off on the present occasion. Seeing, too, that a still larger portion of the public money was voted for a similar purpose to England, he thought that the hon. Baronet should endeavour to deal with the latter portion of the United Kingdom before attempting to deal with Scotland or with Ireland.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, the Scotch Members found, after the Vote had been removed, that their constituents were not satisfied that the Votes should be continued to Ireland. They thought, if money was voted to Ireland, that it should be voted to Scotland also. It was a very small Vote; and although he did not know that it did a great deal of good in the way of improving the breed of horses in Scotland, he was satisfied that it was a popular one, and he hoped it would be continued.

Mr. RAMSAY, who rose amid considerable interruption, said, hon. Gentlemen evidently did not wish to hear a single word against the Vote, because they were so fond of racing. The hon. Baronet the Member for Peeblesshire (Sir Graham Montgomery) spoke about improving the breed of horses; but he (Mr. Ramsay) did not know any class of Scotchmen who took any interest in the breeding of race-horses, except those who were interested in the Turf, and their number was very limited. If it had been a proposal to encourage and improve the breed of farmstead horses, such as the Clydesdale, he could have understood it; but there was no advantage to the public generally in improving the breed of race-horses. If the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) went to a Division, he should support him.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 107: Majority 77.—(Div. List, No. 88.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(11.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £10,783, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Fishery Board in Scotland, and certain Grants in Aid of Piers or Quays."

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR called the attention of the Committee to the facts that, while Scotland had to contribute largely in the form of taxes to the construction and repair of harbours in the United Kingdom, and that while the sum of between £40,000 and £50,000 was at present being spent upon Dover Harbour alone, the amount expended on the harbours of Scotland amounted only to the miserable sum of £3,000, notwithstanding that these Scotch harbours were a source of revenue to the extent of £7,000 a-year from the tax on barrels of herrings. His object in doing so was to point out that in the distribution of funds raised by Imperial taxes on all classes of the Kingdom, in the mode in which this money was voted for harbour purposes, great favouritism was shown in respect of England and Ireland, as compared with Scotland; and what was far more objectionable was that, after all, the country had no security that any efficient harbours would be constructed at all. He intended to make use of every opportunity which presented itself to bring this subject before Her Majesty's Government, not with the view of preventing the necessary outlay of money upon harbours, so urgently needed along our coasts, especially on the Scotch North-east coast, but in order to urge upon them the necessity of ascertaining how far harbours in various parts of the Kingdom could be designed and perfected by means of investigations into the extensive failures in the past. In foreign countries harbours had been constructed on good designs, and completed in an admirable manner; but, as he had continually impressed upon the Government, many of the harbours in Scotland, as well as in England and Ireland, were utter failures. He trusted that the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be directed to this question by the Secretary to the Treasury, with a view to instituting inquiries into the designs and construction of the most important harbours at home and abroad, as to the causes of success or failure, in the hope that the knowledge thereby collected would be useful in making this expenditure of some use to the country; otherwise, he should certainly ask that this Vote should be abolished. If it was in his power to move to increase the Vote to Scotland to £20,000, and if he knew that the engineers could design harbours likely to be useful, he would do so; but that was impossible. The Rules of the House prevented the Motion of increase, and the failures in harbour works in the past satisfied him that any further expenditure would be throwing good money after bad; and he must, therefore, remain content with raising his voice against expending money to no useful purpose.

MR. MARK STEWART asked if in the charges for the Salmon Fisheries Commission the Solway salmon fishing was included, or did that merely refer to sea fisheries?

MR. O'DONNELL said, that on the last occasion, when he had the opportunity, he supported the claims of Scotland; and though he rose on the present occasion to move a reduction in this Vote, he was by no means really hostile to the expenditure of the money mentioned under this head. However, following the example of the Scotch Members who the other day moved the reduction of the English Vote under the Poor Law Estimate, because there was not enough on the same head laid out in Scotland, he begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £5,000, inasmuch as if Ireland was being dealt with justly, Scotland was being dealt with at a most extravagant rate. The fact was, that on this Vote he wished to draw attention to the manner in which the Scotch fisheries were subsidized, and their competition with the Irish fisheries facilitated unfairly, by means of the public money. There was no doubt that the reason why this very much larger sum was demanded for Scotland was that the fisheries in that country were still an especial care of the Government; while, in Ireland, the fisheries were scandalously neglected. The result of that was that in all the markets of the world the fisheries of Scotland were able, thus subsidized and protected by the Government, to beat the Irish fisheries. Without going to the length of Protectionism, he believed that all the fisheries of the country ought, as far as possible, to be the object of especial care on the part of the Government; and had there been anything like a fair distribution of this care between Scotland and Ireland, he would have been the very last to say a word against the assistance given to the Scotch fisheries, because he believed that the development of the fisheries in Ireland and Scotland, so far as it could be aided by inspection and judicious direction, was an object eminently worthy of the fostering care of Parliament. As had been said by the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) on a previous occasion—

“A great naval Empire ought to seek to foster the fisheries about its coasts, because a race of hardy fishermen would be amongst the best recruits for the Naval Service.”

But, besides that, the disparagement of the Irish fisheries deprived the country of a source of wealth. Not many years ago 120,000 people found a livelihood in the fisheries of Ireland. But the trade had since suffered terribly, and the Government continued steadily advancing money to its Scotch rivals and competitors, whom they directly subsidized by supplying the cost of branding, as well as the machinery necessary for that purpose, although the trade had developed to such an extent that the expenses of branding could now be paid out of the fees charged to the fishermen. Why was not a sufficiently large sum voted to provide branding establishments in Ireland? He had no doubt whatever, that if that were granted, the same results would follow in Ireland as in Scotland, and that the expense would be fully borne by the fees paid by Irish fishermen and persons engaged in the fishing trade. It was useless to say that this Vote did not give a direct and unfair advantage to one set of fishermen over another; for it was very well known that in the markets of the Continent—where there was a great prejudice in favour of Governmentalism, and where our laissez faire system was not understood—if two barrels of herrings, one Scotch and the other Irish, were for sale, nine out of ten buyers would choose the former, because it had upon it a Government brand, notwithstanding that the herrings in the other might be of as good quality. If branding was necessary in Scotland, it was also necessary in Ireland; and he thought that the Scotch Members should, therefore, give some pledge that they would aid the Irish in their endeavour to obtain a system similar to their own. His Motion for the reduction of the Vote was only technical, and intended to raise this point in a manner by no means hostile to the people of Scotland. So far from the latter being the case, he believed the money was well laid out, and contended only that the same system should be extended to Ireland. Not only ought Scotchmen, but Englishmen, to have an interest in promoting the welfare of the Irish fishermen, who had never been accused of giving any trouble by their political proclivities. No trade in Ireland had suffered more terribly than the fishing trade; still, he believed that no trade could be more easily resuscitated if proper care were bestowed upon it; and with that view, he trusted that the Committee would give some indication of their opinions and put a little gentle pressure upon the Government. In order to bring about the desired improvement, he would move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £5,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £5,783, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Fishery Board in Scotland and certain Grants in Aid of Piers or Quays.”—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

LORD ELCHO said, there was no doubt that immense benefit had been derived in Scotland from the grant of £3,000 for quays and harbours, and he agreed with the hon. and gallant Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour) in thinking that it would be better that a larger sum should be granted for those purposes. Many persons in Scotland were anxious to have harbours of their own; there was, however, great difficulty in their getting loans for that purpose, and he thought it would be good policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government to increase the present grant. But his object in rising was to point out the present condition of the harbour of Dunbar in his own county. There were, in fact, two harbours at Dunbar—one formed by the old sea wall, the other a new and well-constructed work, joined to it at an expense, he believed, of £50,000 or £60,000. Now, the storms of this and the previous year had knocked great holes in the walls of both the old and the new harbours, and rendered the place utterly worthless for the security of the 600 or 1,000 boats which, when the season came on, were sometimes to be seen there. According to the statement of the engineer, the harbour could only be entered in calms and with a steady sea. He (Lord Elcho) understood that but a small sum was necessary to place it in a state of repair; and he, therefore, thought it would be wise to restore it before it got into a worse condition. If, as he was informed, £2,000 or £3,000 would be sufficient for this purpose, he believed the Government would be showing wise economy in spending that sum of money, and he looked with satisfaction upon the fact that the engineer of the Fishery Board had been ordered to report upon the state of the harbour as an indication that the Government would not allow that, to his mind, well-built structure, which, as he had said, had cost the country already £50,000 or £60,000, to crumble away.

MR. RAMSAY agreed that the case of the harbour of Dunbar, described by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), was one that ought to be specially considered. His object, however, in rising was to point out that the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) was, to some extent, under a misapprehension in using the term "subsidy" with reference to this particular Vote. The sum of £5,000, by which he wished the Vote to be reduced, was more than the sum asked to be voted, so far as the Treasury was concerned, the receipts for branding, of which the hon. Member complained, being £7,610, as against £5,430, the amount of the grant; so that the branding, instead of being a cost to the country, was actually a source of profit. When, therefore, matters arrived at that promising state in Ireland, the Government would have no difficulty in appointing persons to brand herrings there in the same way as in Scotland. He believed, however, the hon. Member would find that the larger fish-curers in Scotland were not so much in favour of the system of branding as had been supposed. If the grant were really in the nature of a subsidy, he thought that the Scotch Members would be quite willing that it should be withdrawn; but it was not so, and it was simply an old custom which had grown up, which those who were engaged in the trade to a small extent desired to have perpetuated, because at a distant period it had given and was supposed yet would give them an advantage in foreign markets, where the brand was regarded as a trademark and as a guarantee of quality, and therefore enabled them to sell their goods to better advantage. With regard to the unequal distribution of the grants of various kinds which appeared in the Estimates, he would suggest that the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) should instruct one of the clerks at the Treasury to make out a list of the sums voted from the Treasury for local purposes in each of the three Kingdoms. If that was done, he believed it would be found that the amounts voted for Scotland were not at all equal in proportion to the amounts expended in Ireland and England, whether viewed with reference to the population or taxation in the respective countries. The hon. Gentleman must be aware that the people of Scotland, collectively, paid a greater sum into the Treasury than the people of Ireland, and if the plan he had suggested were adopted of furnishing the details of the distribution of the grants, it would be seen that the people of Scotland had just cause of complaint that they were treated differently from the inhabitants of the other portions of the Kingdom.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the argument used by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) in urging the Government to vote more money for Dunbar was the most remarkable he had ever heard. The sum of £3,000 annually was not put into the Estimates by the Government of their own accord; but it was under the provisions of a very old Act of Parliament, and the money was intended to be applied to the repair of harbours throughout Scotland. The noble Lord told them that Dunbar had already received no less than £50,000 or £60,000 out of that annual grant,

Lord Elcho

LORD ELCHO observed, that he had said nothing of the kind. The money spent in the construction of the new harbour at Dunbar had nothing to do with the £3,000 annual grant.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON replied that it came to much the same thing, as it was all public money; and because £50,000 had been granted for the local benefit of Dunbar, that scarcely justified them in asking for more. He (Sir Alexander Gordon) lived on a part of the coast very much exposed to the North Sea, and thickly populated by fishermen. In the North, they built harbours with their own money, and did not come to the Government for assistance. The noble Lord would, in his (Sir Alexander Gordon's) opinion, act wisely in encouraging the people of Dunbar to do the same. If the local proprietors came forward as liberally in the South of Scotland, the noble Lord would find that Dunbar harbour would soon be repaired. In regard to the branding question, if the fishermen of the West Coast of Ireland showed the same energy as the people in the North of Scotland, they would soon establish their fishing, and then the Government grant would come to them, instead of, as at present, the fishing coming to the Government.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he trusted the different parts of the United Kingdom would not be brought into rivalry with each other as to their share of the public grants, but that each case as it arose would be dealt with in accordance with the necessity of the case. It would be a very unfortunate state of things if they were obliged to measure out so many pounds or half-crowns to Scotland when she did not want them, merely because so much money had been voted to England or Ireland. With regard to the proper investment of money in harbour works, he believed that the investigation suggested by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour) might be very usefully and properly carried out; but this particular expenditure of £3,000 was incurred under an old Act of Parliament as mentioned by the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), and was renewed annually, for the purpose of repairing the harbours in Scotland. It was intended to apply a portion of this amount to the harbour of Burnmouth, a place where £2,000 had already been raised by the local authorities for that purpose, and in such a case as that, where the people of the locality desired to improve their harbour and came forward with a considerable portion of the money required, he thought the grant might very properly be made. The money was sometimes given to one part of Scotland and sometimes to another. As to Dunbar, he agreed with the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), that when so large a sum of public money had been spent on that harbour, it would be false economy to let it go to ruin for the want of £2,000 or £3,000; therefore, since the matter had fallen under his notice, he had directed a Report to be drawn up with a view to ascertain in what way the necessary repairs could be met. With regard to the question raised by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) relating to branding, which was really the subject of the discussion, he would point out that the sum expended in branding was far more than covered by the amount received in fees under that system. He should like the Committee, also, to remember that it was not in every case that that system would meet with favour, supposing it were applied, because, as had often been pointed out, it was only in the case of the small fish-curers that it was supposed to be of great assistance, and it was on that account alone that he thought the Scotch Members and the Scotch people generally would regret to see the branding done away with. He was glad that the hon. Member for Dungarvan had drawn attention to the discussion of last year, because it gave him (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) an opportunity of pointing out that the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) had, on that occasion, deprecated the taking from Scotland of a Vote simply because another part of the Kingdom did not get it. He hoped, therefore, the Committee would agree to the continuance of the Vote, in the belief that it was acceptable to the people of Scotland, and that it really did some good. He would venture to suggest, with regard to the sum of £3,000 expended on piers and harbours, that although it was small, it might still be very serviceable; and wherever it was shown that local effort in Scotland was really being brought to bear upon a harbour with a view to its improvement, the Treasury would be prepared fairly to consider the question whether grants in aid of such efforts could not be made independently of this particular grant.

MR. WHITWELL hoped the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) would not be pressed, because the amount of the grant was exceeded by the credit received for fees. There could not be a better appropriation of public money than that which went to promote large industries, such as were dealt with by the Vote. For that reason, he did not think the Committee should examine too closely whether the advantage gained was equal to the expenditure. With regard to the administration of the Fishery Board, he was compelled to offer some criticism upon that subject, because he found that, at present, considerable sums of money were given to the captains of Her Majesty's ships for doing what he considered to be no more than their duty. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, when Secretary to the Treasury, had listened to what was stated with reference to this, and he (Mr. Whitwell) had trusted that when he became Administrator of Naval Affairs, he would enable the Vote to be so far economized, that the allowance to the officers of Her Majesty's ships should cease. It would be observed that the captain of the Jackal received £100, and the captain of another of our gunboats £50, in addition to their pay. He could not understand why officers, who were only doing their duty, should receive additional payment. If they were not sufficiently paid for their services in the Navy, they ought to be paid out of the Admiralty Department, and not become a charge upon the Fishery Board. Again, he was aware that they had on duty a cutter which cost £2,480 a-year, which was specially charged upon the Service, for the protection of the fisheries against French and other intrusion; but the employment of vessels for that purpose seemed to him to be fairly chargeable upon the Admiralty Department. If this Fishery Board was to be an effective Board, it must be efficient; but was that the case? He found that the secretary and six or seven clerks divided their services between the Fishery Board and the National Board of Manufactures. He had never heard of such a system as that, under which the officials received half of their salaries from one branch of the Service and the rest from another. It would surely be better that the gentlemen employed should devote the whole of their attention to the fisheries. The system appeared, for the reasons he had given, to require re-consideration.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY did not know that he would suggest to the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) that he should divide the Committee. He had, however, done wisely in calling attention to the subject of branding in Scotland, although in his (Mr. O'Shaughnessy's) opinion, the manner in which it had been done would sufficiently impress the House with the necessity of adopting a similar measure with regard to the Irish fisheries. But the House would find before long, when the Irish Party was, as it very soon would be, strengthened, that this and kindred matters would be brought forward affirmatively, and not in an incidental manner. It was not denied by any of the Scotch Members present that the system of branding had done an immense deal of good to the Scotch fish trade; indeed, according to the expression of many of them, he gathered that it had, to a great extent, created that trade. It had, at least, done a great deal to augment and create the foreign fish trade of Scotland, and probably many of the large houses which had reached their present position by means of that system now thought very little about it. But there were small houses, which the system would help to attain a good position, and whose goods were tested by their enjoying a Government brand. It was the very thing for a fishing community, whose interests were small, and where it was desirable to enlarge them. The system was perfectly adapted to enable the small fisheries in Ireland to realize the position obtained by the Scotch by reason of this Government Vote. From the statements of the Scotch Members, it was evident that the small fisheries had achieved their present position largely by the possession of this Government test of the quality of their goods. For these reasons, he thought that similar advantages ought to be obtained for Ireland. Hon. Members had been told that this outlay was repaid from the fees; but that had not always been the case. In the same manner, the progress made in Ireland towards recouping the cost of branding would be at first gradual. Under these circumstances, while he suggested to his hon. Friend not to insist upon a division, he would be happy to support him when the matter came affirmatively before the House.

LORD ELCHO, as a member both of the Fishery Board and the Board of Manufactures, wished to bear his testimony to the thorough efficiency of the work done by the staff of the two Departments. He wished also to say a word with reference to what the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) had said as to the fishermen of that part of the country which he (Lord Elcho) had the honour to represent not being men of energy and enterprize, when contrasting the fishermen of the North with the fishermen of the South. [SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: I spoke of the proprietors.] He wished to state as regarded the harbour which his hon. and gallant Friend fell foul of, the harbour of Dunbar, that it was treated exceptionally, being dealt with by a special grant, and he was glad to have heard the Secretary to the Treasury express the opinion that it would be a false economy to allow that harbour, after the money which had been expended upon it, to crumble away. But as regarded the proprietors, or fishermen, or whatever the hon. and gallant Member choose to call them—[SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: Proprietors.]—he desired to state what had recently been done in regard to that matter at the small fishing village of Cockenzie, near Prestonpans; the fishermen had, for a considerable time, subscribed 6d. per boat, and had collected from £1,500 to £2,000. It was true that they had been aided by the proprietors on that coast; but the result was that without coming to the public for money, a harbour was being constructed by the engineers to the Board. On the other hand, the people of Burnmouth, Wick, and other places, would have liked to receive an advance from Government, but the answer given was, that so much money had been spent of late in the South of Scotland, that the next grant must go to the North.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, or the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, to explain what the Fishery Board did. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Lord would tell them how many meetings of the Board he had attended, and what was the nature of the business that had been transacted by them during the last 12 months? The Board, so far as he (Mr. J. W. Barclay) could understand, simply existed in the secretary and other officials. With respect to the question of branding, instead of being any advantage, he believed that for many years past it had only the effect of keeping down the quality and character of the herrings cured on the East Coast of Scotland, and he was sure that the sooner it was abolished the better it would be for the herring fishing in Scotland. He had no doubt, also, that this grant of £3,000 ought to be withdrawn, because, so far as they could learn, it had been productive of very little good in the construction of harbours in Scotland, and the money had been practically thrown away. It would be very desirable if the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty would inform the Committee what were the duties which the Admiralty cruisers had to discharge. It was popularly understood that the sum given out of this Vote to the masters of those vessels was paid to them for the purpose of encouraging them to assist fishing-boats when in distress, and in the recovery of their nets after a storm. He was led to understand that the masters of these vessels had been applied to for assistance for the latter purpose and had declined to give it, on the ground that it formed no part of their duties. He should like to know what were the orders and instructions which were given to the commanders of the Admiralty vessels with respect to giving assistance to the fishermen?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the duties of the Fishery Board might be defined in this way. They had to look after the branding of the herrings, to superintend the building of fishery harbours, to look after the marine police, the registration and numbering of the fishing boats, and the collection of marine statistics. The hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) had really added to the Question asked by the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell) with regard to the duties of the Government vessels and the salaries of their officers. Practically, these vessels were the police of the sea, and they were sent to the coasts of Scotland to protect the fishing vessels, and to keep order between the vessels of different nationalities. It was true that the captain of the Jackal received £100, in addition to his naval pay; but the hon. Member for Kendal would see that the onerous duties cast upon these officers made it desirable that some such addition should be made to their salaries. With regard to the Question which had been referred to by hon. Members respecting the harbour of Dunbar, he was endeavouring to obtain an accurate Report upon the damage done, in order that the case might be gone into in a scientific manner. Nothing had been decided as to what part of the money required for repairs should be advanced by the Treasury, or as to whether the people of Dunbar should be called upon to pay any sum towards the amount which might be found necessary for that purpose. The money could not come out of the £3,000 for the present year.

MR. RAMSAY said, with reference to the suggestion which he had thrown out for the consideration of the Secretary to the Treasury, it was to be regretted that the hon. Gentleman merely rose to deprecate the introduction of any comparisons that might be made by hon. Members between the respective parts of the Kingdom in the discussion of any particular Vote. He (Mr. Ramsay) agreed with the hon. Gentleman that it might be expedient that each particular Vote should be discussed on its own merits, without any reference to the assistance rendered in various parts of the Kingdom, and he believed this could be done if the Committee had accurate information as to the sums voted respectively for different parts of the Kingdom. But they had no such information, and the consequence was that there existed a diversity of opinion upon the subject between the Scotch and Irish Members. Scotch Members contended that England and Ireland got a larger amount from the Imperial Treasury for local purposes than was voted for Scotland either in proportion to the population or the amount of taxation, and that, he believed, could be demonstrated by the Return which he had suggested should be prepared by the Treasury. They found it to be the case systematically, not in one but in every instance, that the people of Scotland received less for any particular purpose than the people of England or Ireland. And he reminded the Secretary to the Treasury that so long as the Government continued to ignore the right of the people of Scotland to be placed on an equality with England and Ireland in respect of these grants, so long would the hon. Baronet have these disagreeable discussions raised in Committee of Supply.

MR. ORR-EWING thought that hon. Members ought to be satisfied with the discussion that had taken place. He did not think that the remarks of the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay) were likely to tend to economy in the Public Expenditure. If they were going to maintain that because England was getting more than she ought, Scotland should be served in the same way, it would tend very much to extravagance.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he was well acquainted with most of the harbours in Scotland, and could bear testimony to the value of the services of the masters of the cruisers, who were necessarily men of great ability, because they had to maintain what might be called the police of those fisheries. It must be borne in mind that there were something like 2,500 boats which fished within a space of 40 miles by 30 miles off the coast of Aberdeenshire, and they took out of that space more than the land-rental of the whole of that country; and from this it would be seen that the duties of the officers on board the cruisers employed there were of a very onerous kind. He would not have occupied the attention of the Committee had not the name of the Vigilant been referred to, for he held in his hand a note received that afternoon which had filled him with sincere sorrow. The letter told him of the death of the captain of that vessel (Captain Samuel Macdonald), who died suddenly off the coast of Sutherlandshire on Saturday, the 10th of May. He thought it his duty to mention this, inasmuch as that officer had been 40 years in the service; and he had been with him sometimes a month at a time, because he (Sir James Elphinstone) made it his duty, if possible, to see the harbours in all weathers. He (Sir James Elphinstone) deplored the death of this officer, who was one of the most intelligent men he had ever had the pleasure of knowing, and his object in addressing the Committee at that moment was to offer to his family some words of condolence.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR again complained that while between £40,000 and £50,000 was expended on Dover Harbour, and also large sums were given for Irish harbours, the miserable sum of £3,000 was all that was given for Scotch harbours. Moreover, there was no security that when the money was laid out they would have any harbours at all. He knew sufficient of harbours to say that the harbours in Scotland were constructed under the general control of the Fishery Board, composed of gentlemen mostly incapable men. The plans or designs of these harbours were most imperfect, owing to the want of experience. Altogether £10,000,000 of public money had been expended on harbours in the United Kingdom. There was not more than one million's worth of good harbours for that sum. He had reported to the Treasury in 1877 the state of Dunbar Harbour. No notice, otherwise than a mere acknowledgment, had been taken of his statements, either with regard to Anstruther or Dunbar. He maintained that the building and repair of these harbours had been greatly paid for out of misappropriated money. Grants of public money, and loans by the Public Works Commissioners, had been made under the idea of the plans being sufficient for providing good harbours, or on the notion of securities existing which had proved illusory. He warned the Secretary to the Treasury not to get into a mess with Dunbar Harbour. The repairs would involve a considerable outlay, and when completed would fail to make the place ever suitable for boats. He urged him not to allow the engineer of the Fishery Board to meddle with the harbours of that country. The Scotch Fishery Board was composed really of two Boards—the Fishery Board and the Board of Manufactures. The Board as composed might be fit for manufactures, but not qualified for directing or controlling the construction of harbours. He was glad to hear from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury that only a small sum would be allotted to the repairs of Dunbar Harbour; and even if any money was to be spent for the purpose, he trusted the permission of Parliament would first be asked to sanction the expenditure in a regular manner. Moreover, even the small sum of money spent in Scotland was spent in a very loose manner, much more being spent in the South than in the North. The Fishery Board was guilty of great favouritism, and the expenditure of the many thousands on such a harbour as that of Dunbar was an instance of it.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that nearly every year a discussion was raised with the object of securing to Ireland similar advantages to those enjoyed by Scotland in the matter of fisheries. Irish Members were extremely sorry to have to object to the expenditure of this money in Scotland; but that was the only form in which the Rules of the House allowed them to raise their claims. It was, apparently, a very ungracious thing to object to the expenditure on Scotch fisheries, while asking for a like expenditure in Ireland; but there was no alternative for them but to move to reduce the Vote for Scotland, in order to obtain a similar grant for Ireland. He trusted, therefore, that hon. Members from Scotland would understand that their objections to the expenditure of the money in Scotland was only apparent, and not real, and that all they desired was to have advantages in Ireland similar to what were enjoyed in Scotland. What was it they heard every year from their Friends North of the Tweed? Instead of throwing any impediment in the way of Ireland, all they said was that now Scotland could afford to do without the grant. No doubt, they now despised the grant; but there was a time when they did not despise it. They had it stated by the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down (Sir George Balfour), that no sooner was the grant established than the fisheries of Scotland sprang into prosperity.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR observed, that at one time the Government paid persons to get the barrels branded; he believed the sum of 4*d.* per barrel was thus paid, entailing a considerable outlay on the Exchequer. Afterwards, by the advice of a Committee, the allowance from Government for permission to apply this brand was abolished; but it was subsequently re-established, but was then paid for by the persons using it. About £7,000 was now paid into the Exchequer for the use of this brand, and during the time this payment had continued, the Government had received, on the whole, nearly £80,000.

MR. SULLIVAN thanked the hon. and gallant Gentleman for throwing further light on the matter. According to his statement, no sooner was the brand restored than the traders found it worth their while to pay for the use of it. That they had been so ready to avail themselves of the brand, and had paid so many thousands into the Imperial Exchequer on account of it, was a proof that it was of great use to them. The people of Scotland would not pay for the use of the brand unless it were of advantage to them, and all that was now asked on behalf of Ireland was that that country might have a similar chance of paying for a Government brand. Let no one tell him that the brand was of no advantage in trade, for so long as the people of Scotland, who were not deficient in shrewdness, paid for it, it was clear that it was found an advantage in trade. In the South of Ireland there was a considerable trade in butter; there was a Government brand on Cork butter, and butter bearing the brand, whether it came from Cork or not, always fetched the highest price, because of the reputation of the Cork brand. In any market in the world, the butter with the Cork brand fetched the highest price, and although some butter might be put in casks without the brand, yet it would not fetch anything like the same price. Therefore, they felt it would be of use if they were allowed to use a brand for fish. They were willing to pay for the use of that brand, and would again and again ask for its establishment. At the same time, he would assure the people of Scotland that they did not want to take from them the brand they used, but simply desired the Government to establish for the Irish fisheries a similar brand to what was used in Scotland. The expense of setting up that brand would be amply recouped to the Exchequer by the payments of the Irish fishermen, in like manner as the Scotch fishermen now paid for the use of their brand. £100,000 had been lent from the Public Exchequer for Dunbar harbour, in Scotland; they did not complain of that, and they had no desire to object to any just expenditure in Scotland. At the same time, they thought that Ireland was entitled to money from the Imperial Exchequer for similar purposes. With respect to the severe complaints of Scotch Members about the Scotch Fishery Board, he begged that the House would not take them too seriously. The Fishery Board had many valuable functions to perform, whether in Ireland or in Scotland, and if it were abolished people would then begin to discover what advantages they enjoyed by missing them. The traders in the streets of London required the occasional interference of the police in order to sell their wares securely, and what the police were to the traders in the streets of London the Fishery Board was to those engaged upon the sea. With respect to the Scotch Fishery Vote now before the Committee, if his memory served him rightly, the Scotch river fisheries were not provided for by that Vote; whereas the Irish river fisheries were included in the Vote for the Irish Fishery Board. He thought that fact would explain an apparent disproportion between the Votes. Again, on behalf of his own constituents, and as one of the Members for Ireland, he re-iterated for the fifth Session, the request of the Irish people to be allowed, for the protection of their industries, to have the use of a brand like that to which the fisheries in Scotland owed their prosperity.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON rose to correct a misapprehension of the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) to the effect that the brand was used by all the Scotch fisheries. The hon. and learned Member probably did not know that the brand was only used on the East Coasts of Scotland, and that on the West Coasts it was of no use whatever. The herrings on the West Coasts were bred in warmer water, and were of a soft, oily character, which rendered them unsuitable for the foreign market. The brand was of use only for the foreign trade, and there was, therefore, no object in branding the herrings on the Western Coasts. The Irish herrings were of the same character as those upon the West Coasts of Scotland, and were quite unsuitable for the foreign market. Therefore, for the herring fisheries of Ireland there would be no use in a brand, the brand only being of use for fish sent to foreign markets. A very large herring fishery was carried on on the West Coast of Scotland, but the brand was not used there at all. He would also like to make a remark with regard to the expenditure of the officers employed by the Fishery Board, as objection had been made to an allowance of £100 or £50 to the officers employed in the service of the Fishery Board. He might say that those gentlemen were put to very great expense in travelling about and living on the coasts. The hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) had referred in very appropriate terms to the death of Captain Macdonald. He thought if the hon. Member who had objected to this allowance had known that officer, he would not have proposed its reduction. Captain Macdonald had rendered most useful services to the fishermen, and had saved several lives by his gallant conduct. He hoped the Committee would not object to the small allowance of £100 or £50 for the miscellaneous expenses of the Naval officers in the service of the Board.

General Sir George Balfour

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he was struck by the remark of the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir James Elphinstone), that a greater amount of money was taken out of a given part of the sea than was taken out of the same area of land. That was a fact of great importance. He approved of the Vote as it stood. He thought that the Government might very well pay a little more attention than they had hitherto done to the fisheries of the country. The interests of the country were by no means all upon the land, as was very often assumed; and he did not think that sufficient attention was given to matters connected with the fisheries. He would be very glad indeed if their Irish Friends would give them something to brand, for he did think that now food was so very scarce, everything should be done to encourage fishing, which supplied so very valuable an article of food. He was told by those who understood the matter that a great deal more might be done in fishing than now took place. Our agriculturists were being pushed by the Americans; but, on the other hand, this country did not push the Americans enough in the matter of fishing. In Kent, at the present time, we branded hops; that was very fair. Public money was advanced for drainage and other works, and money was given for harbours, and laws were made for the protection of cattle; but he was strongly of opinion that something more should be done to encourage fishing round the coasts of this country. One reason why he said so was, because he found the secretary of the Scotch Fishery Board disposing of half of his time as an official of another Board. A man could not serve two masters, or, at all events, he could not work well in such a position. Perhaps fishing was a fine art in Scotland, and, therefore, the secretary and one of the clerks received half of their pay from the Fine Art Gallery of Scotland. He thought that the secretary of a Board charged with so important a matter as looking after the Fisheries should not have half of his time occupied in Edinburgh by attending to matters even so useful as the Fine Arts.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(12.) £4,621, to complete the sum for the Lunacy Commission, Scotland.

(13.) £5,409, to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, Scotland.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that he had asked the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate why the annual Report of the Registrar General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages for Scotland had not yet been presented? The Report of the Registrar General for England was already before the House; but in Scotland the Report was in arrears, as was usually the case, and he had had frequent occasion to make complaints of the slowness with which that Department acted. With regard to the Irish Report, he had received an answer from the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland as to when that Report might be expected, and he trusted that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would now be able to give the Committee some information as to when the Report of the Registrar General for Scotland would be in the hands of hon. Members.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON) replied, that the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Sir George Balfour) was under a misapprehension in saying that any Question had ever been addressed to him upon the subject. Neither had he ever had Notice of any such Question.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that he did not give Notice to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, as he had communicated with the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Local Government Board (Mr. Sclater-Booth), who had referred him (Sir George Balfour) to the Lord Advocate. The Lord Advocate, not being present when that was said, did not answer the Question; but the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland had courteously answered him with respect to that country. He expected that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, being informed of the matter, would subsequently have given him the information, but he had not done so. If he had omitted any form in his application for the information, he might say that it was contrary to his intention. He now begged to ask the Lord Advocate for the desired information.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON) said, that not being the head of the Local Government Board, the Question put to him did not come under his observation. He understood the hon. and gallant Member to say that if he (the Lord Advocate) had been in his place, he would have given him Notice, but that he had not done so since. He could not answer the Question, nor could he admit that the Report was in arrear. He understood that the Report of the Registrar General was circulated at the end of April in each year, and he had no reason whatever to doubt that such had also been the case in the present year.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that the President of the Local Government Board had referred the Question to the Lord Advocate, and he assumed that that would be sufficient, without any further Questions being put. If he had not thought so, he would have been in his place to put the Question. He now begged to ask the Question of the Lord Advocate.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON) said, he was not in a position to give any further answer to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member.

The Lord Advocate

MR. WHITWELL wished to draw attention to the fact that the expenditure on the travelling expenses of the Office of the Registrar General in Scotland amounted to £1,200, while the salaries were only £5,389. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) would give some explanation of this, for although he was not one that judged of the work done by the remuneration, yet he thought the expenses for travelling in Scotland were very excessive. In England, the travelling expenses only amounted to £970, although there was so much more to do there. He also noticed that the Secretary to the Office received the bulk of his allowance for duties of inspection. He should like to know what duties of inspection those were, and whether the amount received by the Secretary was in excess of his salary?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON was quite aware that the expenditure in travelling allowances in Scotland was much larger than in England. The necessity for that arose from the system of district examination in Scotland, which was peculiar to that country. The district Inspectors in Scotland had large districts to travel over, and that was the reason for the allowances made to them.

Vote agreed to.

(14.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £15,523, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor, and for Expenses under the Public Health and Vaccination Acts, including certain Grants in Aid of Local Taxation in Scotland.”

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved to reduce the Vote by £2,200, principally for the purpose of calling attention to the great increase of expense in the management of the poor in the last few years. Between 1869 and 1878 the cost of management had risen by £23,000, and he was strongly of opinion that this great additional expense was due to the interference of the Board of Supervision in local management. What had that Board done during the last year? They dismissed one Inspector. They had censured two governors of poor houses, and had dismissed one, and had censured one medical officer. That seemed to be the work they had done. The chairman of the Board of Supervision received £1,200. When three members attended it, it was called a Board, when only two it was called a committee. Practically the management rested in the hands of one gentleman, who controlled those who were well able to manage their own affairs without any interference at all. He found that in one case the Board censured the Guardians because on a particular occasion they gave the paupers a cup of tea instead of porridge. When they could attend to such matters, it showed that they had little to do. It was thought they would see that the poor were not unduly pressed upon by the Guardians. But that was an entire mistake. They urged the application of the poorhouse test, knowing there were many people who would rather die than go to the workhouse. In that way they sought to reduce the rates. It was, he believed, intended still further to increase the burdens by passing a Bill appointing Auditors for the parishes in Scotland. He believed that the interference of the Board of Supervision prevented many gentlemen from acting on parochial boards, because they did not like their interference. Originally, the Board was instituted with the idea that it would look after the poor, and stand between them and the local boards; but there was no necessity for anything of the kind, and the fact was in the result the Board of Supervision had not fulfilled its original intention. It put pressure on the local boards, and, as he had said, urged them in their treatment of the poor to apply the poorhouse test. There were many people in Scotland who would rather die than go to the poorhouse, and no doubt, therefore, the system of the Board was an economical one. The result of the action of the Board of Supervision was an economy in the poor-rates of £26,000, but the whole of that amount was swallowed up in the increased charges of management.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £13,323, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor, and for expenses under the Public Health and Vaccination Acts, including certain grants in Aid of Local Taxation in Scotland."—(Mr. J. W. Barclay.)

MR. ORR-EWING said, he was surprised that the hon. Member opposite (Mr. J. W. Barclay) should have referred to the Board of Supervision in the strain he did. He should have thought that any one acquainted with Scotland would have known the necessity that existed for the Board of Supervision to control the parochial boards throughout the country. He believed, having served upon several local boards, that as between the ratepayers, the parochial boards, and the Inspectors, the functions of the Board of Supervision were most useful. He denied altogether that the Board of Supervision concerned itself in the introduction of Bills into that House. The Bill which the hon. Member had referred to was promoted by Her Majesty's Government, and was almost unanimously supported in Scotland. That Bill provided for an audit taking place of the accounts of the local board, and he was never more surprised in his life than to hear the audit objected to. He thought if the hon. Member had studied the question more carefully, he would not have made the remarks he had done.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out, that the Committee would not be in Order in discussing the provisions of a Bill which, he believed, was now waiting for second reading.

MR. JAMES STEWART quite agreed with the statement of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), that it was objectionable to have questions raised as to the proportion of money voted to different portions of the Kingdom. He thought there was no more disagreeable duty to an hon. Member coming from Scotland than to raise such questions; but, at the same time, it could not be doubted that throughout Scotland there was a strong feeling that the amount given for public purposes from the Revenue to Scotland was not in proportion to what might justly be awarded to her, and that was specially the case in regard to the amount granted for medical relief. He observed that £10,000 was put down for medical grants in aid, and in the note it was stated that this money was distributed in sums of from under £1 to £500 and upwards. He observed in England and Ireland that half the total amount—[Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: A quarter.]—was given, and, therefore, he would like to know on what principle the £10,000 was arrived at?

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON hoped the Amendment of the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) would not be pressed to a Division; for he was quite certain that if it were, very few Scotch Members would vote for it. It was proposed to reduce the Vote by £2,200, the salaries of the chairman and the secretary, and, therefore, to leave the Board in existence without either an official or a head. The hon. Gentleman had not stated the grounds on which he moved the reduction of the Vote, and seemed to forget that the Board of Supervision was created under the Act of 1845, on which the whole Poor Law system of Scotland was based, and the whole system would break down if the Board of Supervision were at once done away with. The proper course would be for the hon. Member to move the repeal of the Act of 1845, which created the system. To take away the chairman and secretary of one of the most important bodies in the Kingdom was certainly most incongruous, and he should, therefore, vote against the Amendment, if the hon. Member proceeded to a Division.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he thought the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) had taken what might be called the popular view of the question—[“No, no!”]—at least as seen in the boroughs and the large centres of population. He (Mr. Mark Stewart) himself, however, had been chairman of a very large board, and had taken a very active interest in its working, and he could state most emphatically that many questions were solved and settled by the Board of Supervision, which otherwise would have involved litigation to a very considerable extent. There was not the least hardship in the powers possessed by the Board; on the contrary, he believed that under its management the affairs of the country were better managed than they were before. There were many very complicated questions of settlement, especially in the rural districts, which would otherwise have to be decided at great cost at the Court of Sessions, which were constantly settled by this Board in a very satisfactory manner. Again, the Board undertook a great deal of correspondence, and often gave country boards very useful information as to the working of the Poor Law in other districts. If they did not have this central Board in Edinburgh, they would only find themselves under the control of the central Department in London; and he, for one, had always been strongly opposed to centralization. He did not wish to see more extended powers given to the Board; but he certainly thought something might be done to put it in a position to do greater good. There was another feature in the Board of Supervision that must not be forgotten—namely, that a pauper could appeal from his local board to the Board of Supervision, so that the latter body was a great assistance in getting justice done to the poor in Scotland. The hon. Member had laid great stress on the fact that the whole policy of the Board of Supervision was to make the poorhouse the test of pauperism. No doubt that was in many instances a very useful test, and it was a fair and honest thing that a man who could work and would not work should have that experiment tried on him. The Board was also of great assistance, not so much in reducing as in regulating the poor rate, by giving information about the working of the workhouse tests. He did not at all wish to see the Board done away with. At the same time, he knew that the audit was most imperfectly made, and if it were more perfect it would become a very useful instrument in effectually carrying out the Poor Law system of Scotland. Again, with regard to the dismissal of Inspectors, they all knew very well that, in rural districts especially, jealousies grew up between the Inspector and some of the parishioners, not at all on the question of his fitness, but on some side issue. Certain individuals often had a great dislike to the Inspector, and, therefore, it was very important that he should be protected in doing his duty honestly and honourably, exposed as he was to very great temptations. He was not saying anything derogatory to the Poor Law Inspectors, who did their work very conscientiously; but if they knew that their dismissal depended on the decision of a body elected by the popular voice, and not on the negative or affirmative of the Board of Supervision, they might be influenced in their actions by the fear of popular opinion. He hoped, after hearing these reasons, that the House would have no difficulty in coming to a decision on this matter. It would certainly, in his opinion, be a great mistake to do away with the Board of Supervision in Edinburgh, which had done very good work, and was still capable of doing very good work, because of the cost of the Board, which, after all, considering all things, was really very little indeed.

Mr. James Stewart

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he believed, from all he had been able to ascertain, that the great majority of the Scotch Members did not coincide with the attack which the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) had made upon the Board of Supervision, and upon its working. That being so, after the admirable speech of his hon. Friend (Mr. Mark Stewart), it was not necessary for him to go into details of the work of the Board, for he thought the merits of that work were now fairly submitted to the consideration of the Committee. The point raised by the hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Greenock (Mr. James Stewart), as to the medical grants-in-aid, was raised on the Vote on Account, and the promise of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to put Scotland in a similar condition as to medical relief with England and Ireland was then spoken of. He need only repeat the statement he then made, that the Treasury were quite prepared, as soon as the Bill now before the House, which placed Scotland in the same position as England and Ireland with regard to medical officers, had passed, to grant the same terms to that country as were enjoyed by other parts of the United Kingdom. The Treasury would then pay half the allowance to the medical officers, and the present grant of £10,000 would cease.

DR. CAMERON hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. J. W. Barclay) would not divide on this Motion. He agreed entirely with him that the constitution of this Board was altogether anomalous, and that under a proper system of local boards it would be entirely unnecessary; yet he could quite understand the contention of hon. Members opposite that as parochial boards were now constituted it would be quite impossible to get along, at any rate, in the country districts, without some central control. The position was very different in the towns and in the country. In the towns there was something like a representative board; whereas in the counties, the constitution of the board was most anomalous. It sometimes comprised 500, 1,000, or even 1,500 members—all the rate-paying owners, in fact, with half-a-dozen or a dozen of the rate-paying occupiers, some representatives of the Magistracy, and some of the Kirk Sessions. A board so constituted, often not having even a committee of management, could not be regulated in its action without some benevolent despotism of this kind. Therefore, he felt that if his hon. Friend took a division at the present moment, he would take it on a false issue. Though he quite agreed with him as to its faulty construction, and as to the inadvisability of taking the supervision and management of local affairs out of the hands of the ratepayers, he must say that as long as they had their local affairs in Scotland managed by cumbrous bodies of this sort, he did not think they could get on without some official body to keep matters straight. As to what the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) had said about medical relief, he trusted this was not another of those long-deferred promises by which the heart of Scotland had been made sick. Ever since the commencement of the present Parliament they had been promised every year that as soon as some Act was passed which would place Scotland in the same position as England as to audit, that they should be placed in the same position also as to medical relief. He would suggest to the hon. Baronet that what was desired might be very easily obtained by insisting upon a proper system of audit, so far as regarded the expenditure in respect of which a Government subsidy was granted, and then placing them on an equal footing with the sister countries, so far as concerned the grant-in-aid. It was quite proper that the Government, before granting one farthing of money for which they would be called on to account, should insist on a most strict and scrutinizing audit. But the proper way to deal with the question was to bring in a Bill relating to that alone, instead of repeatedly promising that at some paulo post future period Scotland should be put in the same position as England and Ireland.

If that were done, Scotland would soon be in a position to which she was justly entitled, and of which she had been deprived for what seemed to him very inadequate reasons.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON begged to explain, as he was afraid he had been misunderstood. The whole contention on the part of the Government was, that if an application was made for equal grants, Scotland must accept the same conditions as were accepted by England and Ireland with regard to her medical officers. At present, those gentlemen were not appointed compulsorily, and they were dismissible at pleasure by the Scotch parochial board. These were not the conditions existing in England and Ireland, where these officers were subject to the Local Government Board. The Bill now before the House put the two countries on the same footing, and as soon as it was carried the grant would be made.

MR. M'LAGAN reminded the Committee that this was not the first time the Board of Supervision had been attacked in that House. Ten years ago, it was attacked far more violently. In consequence, a Committee was appointed to inquire into the charges made; and after sitting two years it issued a Report, which did not recommend that the powers of the Board should be diminished, but, on the contrary, that they should be considerably increased. As a member of three parochial boards, he could say that he never knew the Board of Supervision to interfere unnecessarily; and, for his part, he believed the parochial boards were glad to ask the advice of the Board of Supervision, and that advice was always given most frankly, freely, and with great advantage to those who sought it, and to the poor of whom they had charge. As the hon. Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Mr. Mark Stewart) had said, if the Board of Supervision was abolished, they would only have in its place some central body in London, probably the Local Government Board. For his part, he objected most strongly to any such attempt at centralization, and he trusted that every Scotch Member would lift up his voice against the possibility of the Board of Supervision in Scotland being abolished, and that they would vote against the Amendment.

Dr. Cameron

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, he also believed that in the country parishes in Scotland, the Board of Supervision had been in the habit of giving very excellent advice to the different boards throughout the country, and the general feeling of the great majority of the country parishes in Scotland was that they were perfectly satisfied with the constitution of the Board. He had been chairman of a board for many years, and he had always found the Board of Supervision most ready to give their advice to assist parochial boards in the administration of what was often a very difficult matter.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he had no doubt that the advice given by the Board of Supervision might occasionally be very excellent; but the question raised by his hon. Friend (Mr. J. W. Barclay), and upon which the urban constituencies had a strong opinion, was whether the advice was worth paying for at the rate of £2,200 a-year. He contended there was no Board of Supervision at all. There was a chairman who got £1,200 a-year, and the secretary with £1,000 a-year. No doubt, they interested themselves a good deal in their work, and wrote a good many letters; but, as had already been shown, very little was obtained for the money. His hon. Friend did not ask that they should abolish the whole machinery of the Board, but that they should abolish these two unnecessary gentlemen, and that the matter should be put into the hands of headquarters for supervision. He (Mr. E. Jenkins) was speaking with some knowledge of the feeling of his own constituents, at any rate, when he said that in the urban districts of Scotland there was a strong feeling against the interference of this Board of Supervision, which was not responsible to Parliament. He knew nothing of the advantage of the Board to the country districts; but that was not the question raised. He should not advise his hon. Friend to divide on the present occasion, for the subject required further ventilation; but he had no doubt that the agitation of the question would finally result in the country dispensing with the services of the chairman and secretary.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY reminded the Committee that there had been many complaints against the different boards in Scotland some years ago, and that, in consequence, the Treasury had sent down a Commission under Lord Camperdown to enquire into their working; and he felt quite sure the hon. Member for Dundee had never read the Report they gave of the Board of Supervision or he would not have made the charges he had just made against that Board.

DR. CAMERON said, he did not attack the doings of the Board at all. It appeared to him to be a most anomalous body, which might certainly be dispensed with if they had properly-constituted parochial boards throughout the country; but, on the other hand, he was aware that the Committee reported that the charges brought against the Board were not substantiated.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN remarked, that the Sheriffs of Perth, Renfrew, and Ross, were official members of the Board, and received £150 a-year each. He wanted to know why those Sheriffs especially were chosen members of the Board of Supervision? He knew they were appointed by the Act of Parliament; but he wished to know why they were chosen, and what duties they performed?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON) replied, that they were appointed, and their remuneration was fixed, by the Act of 1845.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN said, he knew that. He wanted to know on what ground they were selected?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON) said, they were named in the Statute as members of the Board, and their remuneration was also fixed by the Statute.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he was quite aware of the truth of what had been stated—namely, that the inquiry referred to had resulted in showing that the Board of Supervision had done very good work. At the same time, he fully agreed with the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) in thinking that if they had local boards at all, it was injurious that they should be deprived of all power over their own officers, and that they should be obliged to apply to the Board of Supervision every time they had to discharge one of their officials. He was also inclined to think that the Board of Supervision was somewhat afflicted with the view that it was necessary to adopt a hard and harsh line of conduct towards the poor, and to force the local boards to send them to a poor house, when, perhaps, the latter board might be in favour of a more kindly, and, perhaps, on the whole, a more economical course. But, for all that, he knew that as things were then, it would be impossible to do away with some such officer as they had at the head of the Board of Supervision; and, therefore, he supposed his hon. Friend (Mr. J. W. Barclay), in proposing to do away with the whole Board at one blow, had only taken that course in order to obtain an opportunity of submitting his opinions upon this subject to the House. There was another view of the matter which he (Sir George Campbell) wished to place before the Committee, and it was that the Board of Supervision was something more than the head of a Poor Law Department, for they had sanitary and other Departments entrusted to them, and were, as a matter of fact, the sole representatives in Scotland of the body which in England would be called the Local Government Board. Now, there seemed to be a good deal of current opinion that some re-arrangement of the Board was desirable, and he ventured to submit that its functions should be so adjusted that it should perform the duties of a Local Government Board. In the matter of statistics, he thought the Scotch people were ill-used. Personally, he took a great interest in statistics; and either during the last Session, or the Session before that, he had put a Question to the Government, and had obtained in reply a promise that the tabulated statistics of local affairs which were given with reference to England and Ireland should also be furnished with regard to Scotland. But a very considerable time had passed, and he was not aware that anything had been done to supply the statistics promised so long ago. He could not say whether it was the fault of the Board of Supervision or not; but he hoped the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would state what arrangements had been made to obtain the desired information for the House, and who was answerable that it had not been already supplied. For himself, he thought it should be the function of the Board of Supervision to supply these statistics, and if it was their fault that they had not done so, he should vote very heartily for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Forfarshire to punish them by abolishing them.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY rose to explain that he had no desire whatever for centralization; on the contrary, it was on account of his objection to centralization, that he objected to the Board of Supervision. He wished that England and Scotland should have local representative boards to manage their own affairs. Under the present system, there was no representation in the rural districts, because the administration of the poor laws was practically in the hands of the minister and his Kirk Session. That was an anomaly, inasmuch as the parish minister did not pay any poor-rate. It might be necessary, meanwhile, that the Board should exercise some control over the rural parishes. No confidence should be placed in the statement that localities could not manage their own affairs; he had no doubt whatever that they perfectly well knew how to do that, and there was no more reason for the Board of Supervision to control a parochial board, if representative, than there was for it to control a town council, or a board of police commissioners, bodies which had the control of a large sum of money. The Home Secretary had promised an Under Secretary of State for Scotland, and, in his opinion, this new official could very properly and advantageously discharge such duties as were now incumbent on the Board of Supervision. The Inspectors would report to him, and he, with a seat in this House, would be responsible. At present there was no one responsible for the administration of local business in Scotland but the Board of Supervision; but that Board was not represented in the House of Commons. An Under Secretary of State would take very much the place in Scotland that the Local Government Board took in England, and it was with that view he wished to abolish this irresponsible office of the Board of Supervision. He hoped that the powers of the Board would fall into the hands of the Under Secretary of State for Scotland promised by the Home Secretary; that the Inspectors should report to him just in the same way as the Inspectors of Mines and Collieries reported to the Home Secretary in England; that the new Under Secretary should put a stop to the exercise of unnecessary control; and that he should be responsible to the House for the administration of local affairs in Scotland. He would be able to exercise all the control that was necessary, and would be responsible to that House for proper administration. By this policy, centralization would be decreased instead of being increased.

MR. RAMSAY, who rose amidst considerable interruption, said, it was not much of the time of the Committee or House that Scotland usually occupied, and he thought it was necessary that they should have a perfect understanding of the Vote. The only explanation the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) gave of the refusal to grant an additional sum to Scotland in aid of medical officers employed by the various parish boards was that the medical officers had not been properly appointed under the existing law of Scotland. Well, he should like the hon. Baronet to point out to him a single instance, a single parish in Scotland, for which a medical officer had not been appointed. No doubt, the hon. Baronet had a good acquaintance with Scotland; but so far as his (Mr. Ramsay's) experience was concerned, he was not aware of a single instance in which any parish in Scotland had been left without a medical officer to take charge of the paupers within its limits. If that was so, what was the use of the hon. Baronet telling them that the officers should be compulsorily appointed? It was idle to give that as a reason for the Vote of £280,000 for England, as compared with £10,000 for Scotland. If an anomaly of that kind was to be justified by some defect in the law of Scotland, he did not see in what manner they were ever to come to an equitable administration of public affairs. It was a fact that medical officers were appointed for every parish in Scotland. If they were not compulsorily appointed, he did not know how it was that Scotch people came to be so considerate of the wants of the poor as to appoint a medical officer at their own expense for the paupers in every parish, when the officers were not appointed in that way in England. If they continued the Vote to England, they should give a corresponding Vote to Scotland.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY: I beg leave to withdraw the Amendment, the discussion that has taken place having thoroughly satisfied me for the present.

Sir George Campbell

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON) quite admitted the promise which had been given to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). He might explain that, after due inquiry, it was not thought necessary to increase the staff of the Board of Supervision for the purpose of collecting those statistics, because at that moment there was a Departmental Committee, sitting under the Chairmanship of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), to consider the best mode of collecting official statistics of that class in similar terms for the three divisions of the United Kingdom.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(15.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £5,852, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries of the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other Expenses."

Mr. E. JENKINS begged to move the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £1,562 for the Queen's Plates in Ireland. The hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk), having moved that the money for the Queen's Plate in Scotland should not be granted, he (Mr. E. Jenkins) thought it but fair that the Committee should endeavour to mete out to Ireland the same justice as to England and Scotland. The Irish Members, he was sure, would not feel that there was any impropriety or inconsistency in asking that this large sum spent in the encouragement of gambling in Ireland should be done away with. In the first place, it was but a mere pretence that this grant in any way assisted the improvement of the breed of horses. He thought that no hon. Member in the Committee would get up to defend that view of the case. The country was so rich that it contained a great number of persons quite able to afford to improve the breed of horses without the incentive of running for the Queen's Plates; and, in his opinion, it was absolutely necessary that the Plates should be abolished. Unhappily, the spirit of gambling was itself sufficiently active to induce people to breed horses for the purpose of enabling the people to gamble. He ventured to say that there was not a single public school in the country in which there would not be a sweepstakes on the approaching Derby. Was it a proper thing to encourage these Queen's Plates? The Metropolitan Racecourses Bill had been supported by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, on the ground that it was necessary to place some restrictions upon racing facilities in the immediate neighbourhood of the Metropolis, and the motive for the Bill was that these races collected together almost all the scum of the Kingdom. It could not be right that the Queen's Plates should be voted for the purpose of giving such people the opportunity of gambling. Races were undoubtedly patronized by persons of respectability—persons sitting on the front Benches of the House—but for all that they were highly demoralizing, and the Committee should not be called upon to vote money for the encouragement of the practice of horse-racing, which led to riots and disturbances, and really made the places in the neighbourhood of which they were carried on unfit for the habitation of respectable persons. He would move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,562.

Motion made and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,290, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries of the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other Expenses."—(Mr. Edward Jenkins.)

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he had heard with very great distress the observation of his hon. Friend below him (Mr. E. Jenkins), that the morals of the young men in the public schools of the country were being sapped by the habit of betting, which the hon. Member attributed to the existence of the Queen's Plates. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) was unable to consider the hon. Gentleman the best exponent in the Committee of the practices in the public schools of England, and had, in fact, reason to know that the statement was grossly exaggerated; indeed, he knew perfectly well that in very few public schools in England was there any betting whatever, and what there was could certainly not be attributed to the Queen's Plates. He received every year from the discussion which arose upon this portion of the Estimates an increasing moral shock, because, in listening to the protests of his Scotch Friends, he knew them to be without reality, and mere sham. He would prove this incontestably by argument and by fact. This Vote had been protested against by the Scotch Members on several occasions, and on one memorable occasion, four years ago, they took a Division and carried their point. The Committee consequently disallowed the Vote for Scotland, and what was the consequence? All Scotland was in a state of ferment during the whole of the succeeding 12 months. Members went home to their constituents only to be asked, what in the world have you done? The next year his hon. Friends got the decision reversed, and actually succeeded in persuading the Treasury to pay them the sum previously disallowed. After that, he confessed that his faith in the virtue of his Scotch Friends was very much shaken. Now, the Irish Members had never objected to these Queen's Plates; on the contrary, they all wished they were larger, and maintained that instead of, as at present, being concentrated on a few spots, they should be diffused over the country. They also believed that the breed of horses in Ireland had been very materially improved by them; but, if not, they were still willing to take the money, because it increased the enjoyments of the people. He ventured to remind the Committee of what the Prime Minister had said—namely, that Ireland was discontented because she was not amused. Although he did not agree with that, there could be no question that there did exist a great deficiency in the amusements which brought together the people of England and Scotland in Ireland—for, owing to other causes, there was a great gulph between the rich and the poor—and he rejoiced at the meetings which took place at the Curragh of Kildare, and elsewhere, where the rich and the poor, the landlord and the tenant, and others who were divided by religious and social distinctions, met in the enjoyment of one common pastime. He wished to remind the Committee that the races in Ireland were not usually of the kind called in England by the name of flat races, for they implied something in the shape of courage and jumping, a very large proportion of them being hurdle-races. For these reasons, he felt sure that the Committee would not agree to the proposition of his hon. Friend, whose virtue, at any rate, was not appreciated in Scotland, against the deprivation of money which his constituents had for so long enjoyed; and who, if they succeeded in taking it away, would certainly not help the Irish Members to get back their share.

Mr. ISAAC thought that the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) committed a mistake in looking upon racing as an immoral sport. He was in error, also, in referring to a Bill which had passed in "another place" that night as a condemnation of racing on the part of the House. That Bill had really nothing to do with the question before the Committee, as it was only passed by that House with the view to suppress small races in the vicinity of London, which had become a disturbance and an annoyance to the neighbourhood in which they were held. That had nothing to do with the great races of the country, which were most advantageous in encouraging the production and rearing of horses. He therefore thought it would be wrong in the Committee to assent to the proposal of the hon. Member for Dundee, as they would thereby deprive Ireland of an encouragement which she richly deserved, which was at once an amusement for the people, and an incentive to improvement in the breed of horses—an essential element in Irish prosperity.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL hoped that the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) would press his Motion to a Division. It was a farce to say that these grants really encouraged the breed of horses; that was not done by means of the horses trained for races, as they consisted of the most weedy animals. Those races were a source of great demoralization to horses and men, and set a very bad example in the neighbourhoods where they were held, and far beyond. One of the evils from these races was the encouragement it gave to betting all over the country; in many a school in the country sweepstakes took place over these races, and the same occurred in India, in the Colonies, and in every part of the English-speaking world. It was a source of demoralization not only to young men, but to young women. It was a farce that they should make laws against lotteries, and yet permit great sweepstakes on races. This was a subject upon which he had had some experience, for, when in India, he had to put down the sweepstake lotteries. These things had grown into an enormous abuse, and, in spite of great unpopularity, he had exerted his authority to put them down. In his opinion, the giving of these Plates encouraged gambling of this kind, and it was inconsistent that Parliament should support them while it condemned lotteries.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

MR. J. LOWTHER had no wish to take exception to hon. Members for Scotland taking part in a debate upon a question which related entirely to Ireland; for he had always maintained that every hon. Member had an absolute right to discuss every matter brought before the House of Commons without any reference to what particular part of the United Kingdom he might happen to represent. At the same time, he thought that considering the Representatives of Scotland had already challenged the principle of the Vote for Queen's Plates in connection with that part of the United Kingdom which they themselves represented, it was rather a strong course for Scotch Members to raise that identical question again in the case of the Queen's Plates for Ireland. That seemed to him to be rather infringing the salutary Rule which forbade discussion of the same question twice over. He would not weary the Committee by going over again the arguments in favour of the retention of those Plates; for he thought that it had been sufficiently shown that the voice of the Irish Representatives was entirely in their favour. For these reasons, he hoped that the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), who, he believed, was himself an advocate of the principle of Home Rule, would not persist in going to a Division.

MR. WHITWELL observed, that these Queen's Plates had been under discussion on many previous occasions, and he should like the Chief Secretary for Ireland to give some information with regard to them. A promise had been given on several occasions that the grant should be divided so as really to make it advantageous to the breeding of horses; but they had not yet been told what was the proper appropriation of this Vote, or whether the system was under revision. For his part, he would rather make the Vote larger in a year, and properly appropriate it, in order to encourage the breeding of horses, instead of applying it, as at present, in a disadvantageous manner.

MR. J. LOWTHER observed, that the question of the distribution of these Plates was under consideration. In one instance, it having been represented that a meeting was not of a character to justify giving a Plate to it, the Plate was transferred to another meeting. The instance to which he referred was that of Londonderry, where the races were certainly not in a very flourishing condition; the Plate was transferred from there to the City of Galway, where a rising meeting was established; and it was thought that good results would be produced by giving the Plate to it. He said this to show that the money was not appropriated in any obsolete lines; and how it could be further distributed in order to encourage the breeding of horses would from time to time be considered.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he would not have risen again, if it had not been that the Chief Secretary for Ireland had charged him with inconsistency in moving the reduction of the Vote. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to him as a Home Ruler; but he denied that he belonged to that Party. He wished to point out that the sum of £218 had been allowed to Scotland in respect of these Plates; whereas it was intended to give £1,562 to Ireland, and he, therefore, thought that the Scotch Members had some right to protest against this attempt to win Ireland, or, practically, to bribe it, by giving it this sum. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had said that in pure and moral Londonderry the races were not successful, and that, in consequence of it, the Government were obliged to go to the wilds of Galway to carry out one of these amazing meetings.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY did not think that the Chief Secretary for Ireland was very much to blame for speaking of the hon. Member for Dundee as a Home Ruler, for he did make some of his Irish constituents believe that he was in favour of it. He rose, however, for the purpose of protesting against one expression of the hon. Member—namely, that in which he described these meetings as resorts for scoundrelism. He thought that was an undue, and that he would be right in saying a very improper, expression. The Irish peasantry went to races, and behaved themselves in the most decent manner, and like Christians, and no complaint could be made against them. They freely entered into the sport, and took great pleasure in the amusement. The hon. Gentleman evidently took his idea of race-meetings from some which were held near Glasgow, or, perhaps, some of the London races. He did not suppose that he had had a large experience in those matters; but when he came down to the Committee, and described those meetings as resorts for scoundrelism, he thought it would be wise to make himself better informed first.

MAJOR NOLAN did not think that the epithet applied to Galway by the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) was entirely justified, although he was sorry to say that the county was very much poorer in some parts than in others. The hon. Member, however well he might speak upon political questions within his knowledge, was extremely ignorant on many facts connected with Ireland. Speaking about these races in Ireland, he had alleged that a good deal of gambling took place there. No doubt, a certain amount of gambling took place in Ireland; but the extraordinary part was that it was only in connection with English races. Almost the same number of people betted in Dublin and Ireland as did so in London and Glasgow; but this betting took place on the English races, and was in no way affected by the Queen's Plates. In connection with the effect of the Queen's Plates upon the breeding of horses, he might say that a gentleman who knew a good deal about these matters had recently told him that horses were very often bred in Ireland and sent out of the country for racing purposes, and then returned again for breeding; and, were there no races in Ireland, gentlemen would not keep their horses there. Thus it was that the races held tended to keep up a proper stock of horses in Ireland, and those races mainly depended for their continuance upon the Queen's Plates. A very little money was given to the country for this purpose—about £1,500—and the hon. Member was quite right in saying that only £200 was spent in Scotland for the same object. But the hon. Member for Dundee's real complaint was that Scotland was not demoralized to the same extent as Ireland. In his opinion, both countries got too little for this purpose. He would wish, however, to make some remarks with respect to the distribution of the grant for Queen's Plates. He thought it was a mistake to have races at the Curragh, although it was quite erroneous to allege that the race did harm to the towns. The fact was that a great objection to the way in which the Queen's Plates were distributed was that most of the races at which they were given were nearly 30 miles from any large town. The people, therefore, had great difficulty in getting to the courses where those races were held. He thought that a certain number of races should be run nearer each large town. He would recommend this point to the consideration of the Chief Secretary for Ireland; for although trainers might wish to have the races run at their own doors, yet it would give more amusement to the people if the races were more equally distributed.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN observed, that the question of the distribution of the Queen's Plates in Ireland had been raised in that House on several previous occasions. At the present time very small sums were raced for, and he did not think that the management of the grant for Queen's Plates was conducted in the best manner. It seemed to him that if the sum of £1,500 was divided and allocated to the four Provinces, to be raced for in alternate years, while they would increase the amusement of the people, the stakes might be made so considerable as to encourage improvement in the breed of horses. At the present moment, such small sums as £100 were not a sufficiently strong consideration to induce a man to breed horses for a particular race; whereas, if the money were divided in the way he had suggested, and the races run alternately in the four Provinces, he believed an inducement would be held out to the breeders of horses.

Mr. O'Shaughnessy

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 44; Noes 165: Majority 121.—(Div. List, No. 89.)

Original Question again proposed.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that, before the Vote was agreed to, he wished to refer to two officers in the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of whom no mention had been made that evening—he meant the two “gentlemen at large.” There was evidently great extravagance in connection with the maintenance of the Vice-regal establishment in Ireland, arising especially from the number of officers who were attached to the personal Staff of the Viceroy, including, as they did, a private secretary, several aides-de-camp, a steward of the household, a gentleman in waiting, a master of the horse, a gentleman usher, a chamberlain, besides the two “gentlemen at large.” Now, Her Majesty had a great Viceroy in another part of Her Dominions, and he had some knowledge of the establishments which were kept up by him. In the case of the Viceroyalty in India, with which he was acquainted, the Representative of the Sovereign had a far more important charge committed to him than the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; but the former, nevertheless, had only one private secretary, one military secretary—who had separate functions to perform—and three or four aides-de-camp. He could see no good reason, therefore, why, in addition to the various other officers which he had mentioned, the Lord Lieutenant should be furnished with two “gentlemen at large;” and he should, therefore, move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £258—the amount of their salaries.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum not exceeding £5,596, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries of the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other Expenses.”—(Sir George Campbell.)

MAJOR O'BEIRNE begged to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £328, the amount of the salaries of two aides-de-camp attached to the Staff of the Lord Lieutenant at Dublin Castle. It appeared that on the Staff of the Viceroy of India there were only eight aides-de-camp, while there were 11 on that of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He saw no good reason why that large number should be maintained on the Irish establishment; and he felt perfectly satisfied that if the Lord Lieutenant himself were consulted in the matter, he would say that eight aides-de-camp would be sufficient for all the purposes for which such officers were required. To have a greater number was to waste the public money, and to withdraw officers unnecessarily from the discharge of their regimental duties, to the disadvantage of the Service; for it was a complete mistake that the regiments of the Army were now over-officered. The real state of the case was the very reverse. The number of officers were far too few, and he feared that such appointments as those of which he was speaking were kept up mainly in order that the authorities at the Horse Guards might have a large amount of patronage at their disposal.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that he could not put the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, as there was a Motion for the reduction of the Vote already before the Committee.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that, as a matter of fact, the salaries of only four aides-de-camp instead of 11, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) seemed to suppose, were defrayed out of the Estimates. It was all very well, he might add, to criticize the number of officers on the Staff of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as the Member for Kircaldy (Sir George Campbell) had done; but the real question was whether it was or was not expedient to maintain the Office of Viceroy in that country? If the answer was in the affirmative, it was absolutely necessary that the Vice-regal Court should be kept up with becoming state. He did not believe that the people of Ireland wished to see the Office of Lord Lieutenant abolished, nor did he think they would like to see its dignity impaired.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, it was quite clear that some hon. Members who objected to the expenditure on the establishment of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland were opposed to the continuance of the Vice-regal Office itself. Now, the question of abolishing or retaining the Office was one which had been frequently raised; and, no doubt, people entertained different opinions upon it, both in this country and in Ireland. His own belief was, however, that the great majority of the Irish people were decidedly in favour of continuing the Office, and upon this ground among others—that, so long as it continued to exist, it furnished tangible and distinct evidence of the differences by which the two countries were separated. He should, indeed, regard the abolition of the Office as a great disaster for Ireland, and it seemed to him a most extraordinary thing that any hon. Member should object to the small sum of £285 for the salaries of two officers whose services were required to keep up the dignity of the Representative of the Sovereign. The two “gentlemen at large” were, he thought, very cheap at the price, seeing that they had to be constantly at the beck and call of the Lord Lieutenant. Those who opposed the Vote that evening appeared to him to forget that the functions of the Irish Viceroy were very different from those which the Governor General of India had to discharge. One of the most important duties of the Lord Lieutenant, with the two “gentlemen at large” and his aides-de-camp, was to keep up to a proper standard the social amenities of the Irish capital, and to see that young ladies attending the balls at Dublin Castle were duly provided with partners. Now, in India, although it might be deemed desirable that the Viceroy should do everything in his power to influence favourably to us the male portion of the population, he did not believe there was much hope that we could produce an impression on the female portion of it, or that we should gain much by doing so. Everyone, moreover, was aware that, great as was the influence of the ladies in England, it was doubly great in Ireland; and it was, therefore, in his opinion, most desirable that the most eligible men should be selected by the Lord Lieutenant to fulfil those functions, which, hitherto, whether under Whig or Tory Governments, had been performed with much credit to themselves and satisfaction to the country, by those officers whose salaries it was now sought to cut off. For his own part, he should certainly vote against the proposed reduction.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, he would now move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £328, the salaries of two aides-de-camp to the Lord Lieutenant. He urged in support of the reduction the trifling nature of the duties, such as occasionally attending the Vice-regal receptions for an hour or two, which those officers had to perform. Their position was very different from that of aides-de-camp in India, who had very arduous duties imposed upon them. But the great objection, in his opinion, to the employment of so many officers as aides-de-camp in Ireland was that they were, in consequence, withdrawn from their regiments, which, as he had already stated, were, as matters now stood, under-officered.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £5,524, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries of the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other Expenses.”—(Major O'Beirne.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA opposed the reduction of the Vote, and expressed a hope that hon. Members would refrain from nibbling, as they had been doing that evening, at the establishment of the Lord Lieutenant. He could not help thinking that it was scarcely worthy of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) to take the mode which he had just done of endeavouring to prove how much better he understood the matter of Staff appointments than the authorities at the Horse Guards, though, perhaps, he did. He hoped, however, he would abstain from nibbling any further at the small Vote under the consideration of the Committee.

MR. STACPOOLE was one of those who regretted exceedingly that the Office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was not abolished, and that one of the Royal Princes did not take up his residence in Ireland instead. But, so long as the Viceroyalty was maintained, he did not see how the services of such officers as those whose salaries it was now sought to strike out of the Estimates could properly be dispensed with. As to the argument that officers were kept away from their regiments by being appointed aides-de-camp, and that the Army consequently suffered, he could only say that it was an argument which was equally applicable to the case of a general officer who had an aide-de-camp. It seemed to him, he must confess, to be scarcely worthy of Irish Members especially to quibble about so paltry an item in a Vote which was itself very small.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, notwithstanding what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Stacpoole), he felt more disposed to be influenced by the arguments of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) than by those which he had urged. The hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna), he might add, deprecated what he termed nibbling at the Vote; but if some hon. Member did not commence in that way, Votes would never be reduced at all. If hon. Members were dissatisfied with the very small reduction now proposed, it would be easy to meet that objection by moving a larger reduction. If they were not disposed to cut off a shilling, there was no reason why their wishes should not be consulted by asking the Committee to reduce the Vote by hundreds or thousands. He entirely deprecated, however, the attempt to silence those who desired to criticize the Vote, by the allegation that they were merely nibbling at the establishment of the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland. His own opinion was that it was an establishment which required to be nibbled at very much; and if a Member of that House wished to do his duty, he must not rest content with cutting it only down, but must direct his attention to other Royal and semi-Royal establishments with a similar object—for there were very many of them in whose case it would be well to have the expenditure very much diminished. He hoped, therefore, the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) would press his Amendments to a Division. It was, he contended, perfectly absurd that the public money should be frittered away in order to enable certain young gentleman in Dublin to make love to the ladies, as if Irish gentlemen could not and would not make themselves amiable to the fair sex without any such adventitious advantages.

MR. BRUEN happened to know several gentlemen who occupied the position of aide-de-camp in Ireland, and could bear testimony to the fact that some of them were officers of Militia regiments, who had during a great part of the year no regimental duties to perform. It could not fairly be argued, therefore, that their regiments suffered from their attendance at the Vice-regal Court.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY thought the argument of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) was scarcely a logical one. He seemed to assume that Irish Members wanted to reduce the Vote; but he (Mr. Mitchell Henry), at all events, must beg to enter a most distinct protest against any such reduction. In his opinion, the Office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as long as it was kept up at all, should be maintained with proper state, because the person who occupied it was the Representative of the Sovereign. He had no wish, therefore, even to nibble at the establishment in question. He believed that the longer we could uphold our Constitution under a Crowned Head, the better would it be for all parts of the United Kingdom. He had no sympathy whatever with Republicanism in any shape or form; and he did not, therefore, agree with his hon. Friend in the expediency of commencing the nibbling process which he appeared to approve. He declined to nibble at the Vote, because he desired to see it passed to the full amount. Entertaining those views, he could not go into the Lobby with his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne), who, he might observe, did not seem to be very well informed on the subject; for he evidently was ignorant of the fact that many of the officers attached to the Staff of the Lord Lieutenant did not belong to the regular Army at all, but to the Militia. That being so, their services could not be lost to the Army, as he would lead the Committee to suppose.

MR. STACPOOLE pointed out that out of the 11 or 12 aides-de-camp in Ireland only 4 were paid, and that their pay amounted to only 10s. 6d. a-day each. He must, therefore, repeat that the sort of quibbling in which some Irish Members had thought fit to indulge that evening was scarcely becoming to them.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) laboured under a great mistake, if he supposed that officers were not kept away from their regiments in consequence of holding the position of aide-de-camp, to the injury of the Service. They were absent from their regiments during the summer months, when their services were most needed. That was a state of things against which he felt it his duty to protest.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 193: Majority 144.—(Div. List, No. 90.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £24,840, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in Dublin and London, and Subordinate Departments."

MR. WHITWELL said, he must oppose the Vote. As hon. Members were aware, the whole of the North of England, including Cumberland, Durham, Northumberland, Westmoreland, and even part of Lancashire, were greatly concerned at the very large amount of disease which had been imported into those counties from Ireland. At one time, a very proper and strict inspection of all cattle from Ireland took place at the ports of entry; but since the middle of last year the whole of the Inspectors on the English side had been removed, and almost immediately after foot-and-mouth disease, as well as pleuro-pneumonia, broke out, and it had been ascertained, from perfectly authenticated cases, that the disease came from Ireland. A system of inspection, it was true, had been established on the Irish side; but he was sure that hon. Members for Ireland felt just as much as he did the extreme importance and the great desirability of not neglecting any precaution for preventing any disease being transhipped. Not only did large quantities of cattle come from Ireland which found their way so far as Yorkshire and even Norfolk, but great quantities of breeding stock were now being brought over, and that rendered it all the more necessary that there should be the most rigid system of inspection. Yet the number of Inspectors appointed for the whole of Ireland was six, and two travelling Inspectors, and the whole amount paid them was some £3,000 and odd pounds. The ports at which cattle were imported were Liverpool, Barrow, Whitehaven, Fort Carlisle, Stranraer, and Ardrossan. On some days 1,000 head of cattle were shipped from Belfast alone, in one day, to inspect which but two Inspectors were allowed. From a Return he had recently obtained, he found that, although there were 20 ports in Ireland from which cattle could be shipped, there were but 10 Inspectors in all, including the Chief Inspector and the Assistant Inspector. He admitted that there was a name attached to every port as that of the Inspector; but he contended that the system at present was very incomplete, and he should much prefer the restoration of inspection on the English side. After a good deal of pressure the Government decided that it would be more satisfactory to the Irish exporters if the inspection were on that side, and, consequently, the Inspectors at the ports he had named were removed. At the present time, therefore, the cattle were put straight from the ship on to the railway, and carried into the country. As a result, three cases of foot-and-mouth disease had been traced to Fort Carlisle alone. It was very clear that the inspection was inefficient; but he could not move to increase the Vote, and, therefore, in order to raise the whole question formally and in Order, he would move the reduction of the Vote by £400, so reducing the salary of the Professional Adviser of the Irish Veterinary Department from £800 to £400. It was most important that cattle coming from Ireland should be free from disease, as, of course, if the buyers knew all the cattle were certainly free from any taint, they would give more for them.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £24,440, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries

Mr. Stacpoole

and Expenses of the Offices of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in Dublin and London, and Subordinate Departments."—(Mr. Whitwell.)

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked whether, if the Amendment were put, it would afterwards be competent for him to move the reduction of the Vote by a further sum?

THE CHAIRMAN, in reply, said, that he would be quite in Order.

MAJOR NOLAN quite understood that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell) was merely nominal. The Cattle Plague Act had only just got into working in Ireland; but a great deal of good was being done, and he could not understand why the hon. Member should advocate inspection on the English instead of on the Irish side of the Channel. Last winter he (Major Nolan) visited several places in England where cattle were disembarked. Formerly, they were unshipped, and left to stand about in open places, very often in the wet, before they could be put into the trains; but the railway people told him that they had not half so much to do, or half so much trouble, that the cattle were at once put on the trains, and were far more comfortable. He had no objection to English inspection as well; but he could not understand why the inspection could not be done just as well in Ireland, and certainly it took place under far more favourable circumstances. He would heartily support the hon. Member in any attempt to improve and perfect the inspection in Ireland; but if he attempted to remove it, he certainly should oppose him, for any such attempt he should regard merely as an effort to revive Protection in disguise.

MR. PERCY WYNNDHAM said, whether the present inspection was satisfactory or not he would not say; but it was certain that the moment the English inspection was removed, there was a great importation of disease into that part of the country. He did not wonder that the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Whitwell) had brought forward this subject; for his county, considering its size, contained more valuable cattle than any other in England. In his opinion, the present inspection was not sufficient, and he would heartily support any Motion for increasing the number of Inspectors.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG trusted the Committee would continue the present system; for, in his opinion, the system of inspection at the port of embarkation was by far the most satisfactory.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT thought there should be no difference of opinion amongst the Committee that inspection ought to be thoroughly and properly carried out. Considering the present depressed state of agriculture, there was certainly one thing against which the farmers should have protection, and that was the importation of disease. They, none of them, he believed, objected to the inspection in Ireland, and, for his part, he was decidedly of opinion that it ought to be made there; but he did wish to impress upon his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland the importance and the absolute necessity of making the inspection both sufficient and efficient. If disease had come into the North of England from Ireland, the inspection certainly could not be sufficient and efficient now, and he wanted his right hon. Friend to promise them that it would be made so in the future.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY understood that some very suitable accommodation was offered for the shipping of cattle at Waterford, and if those offers had been accepted, they certainly would not have had these complaints about Milford Haven. He should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had availed himself of this offer from Waterford, which was now one of the most important ports for the shipment of cattle in Ireland?

MR. J. LOWTHER explained that the Act had only been in operation a few months, and, it could not, therefore, be a matter of surprise if the machinery was not at present quite in working order; but, certainly, until he heard the observations of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell), he was entirely unaware of the existence of these complaints with regard to the importation of disease. He could not ascertain that any reports or complaints had reached the English Veterinary Office, and certainly none had reached his own; but he would certainly give the matter his immediate attention. He believed the point as to the inspection at the various ports was already being inquired into.

MR. CLARE READ was very glad the attention of his right hon. Friend had been called to the matter, for he remembered perfectly well that it was the opinion of the Committees which inquired into the Cattle Diseases Acts that the Irish Veterinary Department, some years ago, was both undermanned and underpaid. He saw that there had been a very considerable increase in the number of Inspectors; but if the inspection in Ireland was to be of any use at all, it must be very much better than it had been in previous years. He believed that, as a rule, veterinary surgeons did not abound in Ireland, and that a good many had been imported from England; but he had also heard that one or two young vets who had gone over there were so badly paid that they were obliged to come back.

MR. SHAW believed that the inspection at the ports was very efficient; but in the country districts it was very difficult to get Inspectors, from the want of knowledge of diseases of animals which prevailed. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that he should make the Irish Veterinary Department a teaching Department. At present, there was no school of veterinary teaching whatever in Ireland. In the County of Cork they were trying to do something in connection with the medical schools which the Government were going to establish, in order to teach veterinary science to the farmers. A very few thousands a-year would establish a school of veterinary science, for the county gentlemen were quite ready to come forward with a supplementary grant. He did not believe the Government could spend money more usefully, and they would also prevent the shipment of diseased cattle. Very often, he believed, such cattle were sent to the port through pure ignorance of what was the matter with them on the part of their owners.

MR. WHITWELL said, he did not wish to press his Motion; but he might say that he was well acquainted with this subject, and was sure that if it were investigated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he would come to the same opinion upon it as he (Mr. Whitwell) had done.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that the question involved in the consideration of the Vote was a very large one, and unless the Government would pass it over, he should move to report Progress.

MR. J. LOWTHER thought that the Vote had been sufficiently discussed.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that, under those circumstances, it only remained for him to move to report Progress. If they were to go into the matter fully, there would be no possibility of the discussion being finished under two or three hours. Moreover, two or three other Votes would cause a similar discussion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. O'Shaughnessy.)

MR. J. LOWTHER hoped the hon. and learned Member would not strive to postpone the Vote. It was an annual Vote, and he was not aware of any new matter that had arisen in connection with it. As he had heard no arguments in favour of reporting Progress, he really could not consent to the Motion.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY declined to withdraw the Motion.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY observed, that some Votes following this would also require considerable discussion. Everyone who knew the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) was aware that he never took objections unless they were well-founded, and for the purpose of obtaining proper criticism. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had now, in effect, classed the hon. and learned Member amongst those who wilfully obstructed Business; and, therefore, he should support his hon. and learned Friend in his opposition to going further. He thought the time had come when the Committee was well justified in reporting Progress.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY was firm in his wish to report Progress. He made the Motion for the purpose of recalling the attention of the Committee to the fact that on a previous occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, while objecting to the general terms of a Motion he (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) had brought forward, had stated that it was the intention of the Government to place in that House, in the hands of a responsible Minister, all Irish matters connected with the Treasury. That was a most important subject, and his Motion was to remind the Chief Secretary for Ireland of his promise.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he had no wish to carry on the discussion, and that if the House was not in a humour to proceed with the Estimates, he did not wish to press them to do so. He must, however, take exception to what had been stated by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. What he originally said had no reference whatever to the Vote before the Committee, but referred to the Vote for the Office of Works. If, however, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), and other hon. Members, wished to raise a serious discussion on this and the succeeding Votes, he should have no objection to reporting Progress.

SIR ANDREW LUSK hoped that the Committee would not proceed further with Supply that night, as they had already been engaged upon it for seven hours, and he thought it was a very fair proposition that Progress should be then reported.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he acceded to the proposition to report Progress; but he only wished now to take the Vote for the Registrar General's Office, which was unopposed.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

(16.) £13,109, to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, Ireland.

(17.) £18,596, to complete the sum for the Valuation and Boundary Survey, Ireland.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow;

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION BILL.

[BILL 69-138.]

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Sir Matthew Ridley.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 9th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Supplemental Provisions.

Clauses 22 to 27, inclusive, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 28 (Cost of prosecution of indictable offences dealt with summarily).

MR. PAGET moved, as an Amendment, in page 16, line 30, to leave out all after "section" to "shillings," inclusive, in line 32.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS assented to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 29 (Power of the Lord Chancellor to make rules).

MR. HICKS begged to move that the clause be struck out. It appeared to him that the rules which the clause directed to be drawn up by the Lord Chancellor should be inserted in the Bill itself. The clause gave power to the Lord Chancellor to make such rules and regulations, and to draw up tables of costs and charges and other matters. It appeared to him that all these matters ought to be inserted in the Bill, so that persons who took up the Act might know what the law was, and that the magistrates who had to carry it out might also be informed of it from the Act itself. He submitted that there was plenty of time between this and the third reading of the Bill to enable the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to prepare a fresh clause which should contain all those regulations. The Bill would then be left in such a form that the law could be at once clearly ascertained from it.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the Committee would allow the clause to stand. What was proposed by the present clause was merely what was usual under the circumstances, and was the case with the Judicature Act. It was impossible to make these rules by Act of Parliament, and hon. Members should remember that they dealt with very trivial matters. Moreover, if inserted in the Act itself, it would be impossible to vary the rules, if there were a necessity for it, without a fresh Act.

SIR HENRY JAMES thought that, in this case, the rules were too technical for the Committee to enter into them. Still, he thought the House had grown too much into the habit of delegating its powers to others. The Home Secretary had stated that in the Judicature Act power was given to the Judges to frame rules. He might say that in the Act of 1875 the rules were inserted, but that in 1876 a power was given to the Judges to make rules, which power they had exercised in such a manner as to entirely alter the spirit of the Act. In such technical matters as the present Act dealt with, he thought that it was better to give the Lord Chancellor power to make the rules. He noticed that the rules were to come into operation before they were laid upon the Table of the House. That should be altered, so that the House might have an opportunity of discussing the rules before they came into operation.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) observed, that the matter had been fully considered. What had been done arose from the necessity of the case in making some provision for what must be done before Parliament met.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 30 (Power to provide place for holding petty sessions), agreed to, and added to the Bill.

PART II.

Amendment of Procedure.

Clauses 31 to 38, inclusive, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

On the Motion of Mr. ASSHETON CROSS, Clause 39 (Pleadings and forfeitures) verbally amended, and added to the Bill.

Clauses 40 to 42, inclusive, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 43 (Procedure on the execution of distress warrants).

SIR HENRY JAMES moved, as an Amendment, in page 25, line 31, to leave out the word "warrant," and insert the words "making of the distress."

Mr. Assheton Cross

Amendment agreed to; words substituted accordingly.

MR. GREGORY moved, as an Amendment, in page 26, line 5, after the word "distress," to insert the word "wilfully."

Amendment agreed to; word inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clauses 44 to 46, inclusive, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

PART III.

DEFINITIONS, SAVINGS, AND REPEAL OF ACTS.

Special Definitions.

Clause 47 to 49, inclusive, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

General Definitions.

Clause 50 agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Application of Acts.

Clause 51 agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Savings and Construction.

Clauses 52 and 53 agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 54 (Application of Act).

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON moved, as an Amendment, in page 32, line 4, to leave out from the word "recovered" to the word "under" in line 7.

MR. HOPWOOD objected to the omission of those words. A very strong feeling was entertained by all Members of the Select Committee, except right hon. Gentlemen representing Departments, with regard to this matter. He hoped the Committee would pardon him for a moment, while he explained the subject. The Bill, as drawn up, gave the magistrates power in every case, including those relating to Her Majesty's Revenue, supposing they thought fit to exercise their discretion, and even although they were of opinion offences had been committed, to refrain from convicting the person charged. The Bill gave the Justices the widest powers for a merciful dispensation of justice. At the present time, when a man was brought before the magistrates, charged with some offence against the Revenue, if the offence were proved, the magistrate had no option but to fine him the full penalty, which usually was very heavy. For some trifling offence against the Inland Revenue or Customs, the penalty would be £100, and the magistrate would have to fine the man that amount, although, if left to himself, he would only have awarded £40 or £50, or some less sum. The whole object of the Bill was addressed to giving the magistrate an option as to the infliction of the maximum amount of penalty, and they were required to use their good sense and rely upon their judgment in altering the penalty below the maximum. They might, however, inflict the maximum penalty, or go down to the other end of the scale. The Amendment which had been proposed by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would have the effect of taking the Inland Revenue and Customs cases in this respect entirely from the power of the magistrates. A magistrate would have no option, but would be bound by the particular Statute under which the penalty was recoverable to commit the injustice of imposing it. He did hope in a Committee like that, where the Magisterial Bench was so numerously represented, a protest would be made against the refusal to trust it with the power to exercise discretion in these matters. No doubt, the answer to this would be that the Revenue must be protected, and that in all cases where the Revenue was concerned the matter should be left in the hands of the Revenue authorities alone. But he would strongly urge that if the magistrates were to have a discretion in such important matters as those dealing with the liberty of the subject, that discretion should be extended to cases where it was most needed, and enable them to have a power to abstain from the infliction of the full amount of penalties which they considered excessive.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON must press the Committee to strike out the words, the omission of which he had moved. He might say that they were not in the original draft of the Bill, and only put in the amended copy. If the words were left in the Bill, there would be great difficulty in carrying out the working of the Revenue Departments of the country. It would introduce too great an element of uncertainty into the Revenue, if all these cases were left to the decision of the magistrates. Were that done, the supposed uniformity of procedure under the present system would be at once destroyed. Another point was that costs in Excise cases were not recoverable, and he did not think that they should be made so. In every case of an Excise penalty, the duty was included in the penalty, which was fixed at a high amount in reference to the damage which was inflicted upon the Revenue by the offence. The magistrates could not be so conscious of the danger to the Revenue as those who had to deal with it; and it was, therefore, highly desirable to leave those matters entirely in the hands of the Revenue authorities. Then, again, taking the Custom House, there was a system in use which they did not propose to repeal, and there would be two systems at work at the same time under which these amounts might be collected. There would also be one system in use in Scotland, another in Ireland, and another in England. In Scotland and Ireland the Excise officer would be working under the old system, whereas in England the penalties would not be certain, by virtue of the clause. He thought that the danger to the Revenue would be very considerable if the infliction of those penalties was left to the decision of the magistrates; and he therefore hoped that the Committee would not assent to the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockport.

SIR HENRY JAMES observed, that this question was before the Select Committee, and was fully discussed by them. They determined that the Bill ought to stand as it was now. The Bill was a Government measure, brought in by the Home Secretary; the Committee was now, therefore, asked to reverse both the decision of the Select Committee and of the Government upon this matter. Although they had not been asked to give the magistrates a discretion in such important matters as the liberty of the subject, yet, when they came to offences against the Revenue, they were told that the magistracy could not be trusted to exercise a proper discretion in those matters. The Government would be guilty of great inconsistency, unless it either gave the magistrates the same discretion in all cases, or else struck out the 16th clause altogether. The magistrates should either have the same discretion in all cases, or they should not be allowed to have the power in any case to say—"Although, technically, an offence has been committed, we do not think fit to award any punishment." It was in these Revenue cases, above all others, that the magistrates were continually saying—"We deeply regret that we are compelled to inflict this penalty—it is by virtue of an old Statute, which gives us no option in the matter; you must apply, by memorial, to the Department for a reduction of the penalty." But the Department now came and said—"Reverse the decision of the Select Committee, and give us this provision depriving magistrates of the power given them by the 16th clause in matters of much more importance." Under these circumstances, he trusted his hon. and learned Friend would take a Division on the point.

Mr. DILLWYN wished to give an instance of the necessity for this discretion being exercised by the magistrates in Revenue cases. A case was once brought before him, as a magistrate, of some persons charged with smuggling. A vessel had been boarded, and a seizure made, under somewhat mitigating circumstances. Still, he had no option but to inflict fines amounting to £1,500, a most preposterous sum.

Mr. TORR stated that at Liverpool the necessity for the Bench having some discretion was much felt. He was strongly in favour of the clause remaining in its present shape.

Mr. MORGAN LLOYD said, that the observations of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) went a great deal further than he seemed to think. If there were, as he said, danger to the Revenue in giving the magistrates a discretion in these cases, then there was danger in allowing the magistrates to adjudicate at all on Revenue questions. He could not see why, if the magistrates were empowered to adjudicate on Revenue matters, they should not have the same discretion as was given to them in other cases to regulate the punishment. Either they should take away from them the right to adjudicate at all, or else they should give them a certain amount of discretion as to the penalties they were to inflict. Otherwise, they were placing the magistrates in an invidious position by forcing them to inflict penalties which in their consciences they knew to be too severe. He hoped the Amendment of the Government would be withdrawn, for the only argument that had been advanced in its favour would go a great deal farther than was proposed.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, that the question before the Committee was a very curious one. On all punishable offences the magistrates were allowed by the Bill great latitude; but when they came to touch what were called Revenue questions, no discretion whatever was to be allowed. This was not the first time that the Revenue had been treated in this exceptional manner. He thought that it was fair and right to trust the magistrates in this matter as in others. There was no doubt that very great injustice had frequently been done in those cases, simply because the magistrates were unable to help themselves. They had been obliged to inflict the fines, which they had no power to remit or reduce. If trusted at all, the magistrates should also be trusted in this instance. After the Bill had been so carefully considered by the Select Committee, and this clause bringing Revenue questions within the magistrates' discretion had been inserted by them in the Bill, he thought the Committee should accept it.

EARL PERCY observed, that the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) had compared this clause with the 16th clause. He regretted that he did not divide the Committee upon that clause; for if he had, he should have voted with him. Speaking with very great diffidence—for he had not had very much experience in these matters—he could not but think that it would be the better course for the hon. and learned Member to raise the objection he did before to the 16th clause upon Report. It seemed to him that it would be better to raise the whole question of the desirability of vesting this discretion in the magistrates by objecting to the 16th clause rather than to take the opinion of the Committee upon a clause which was at variance with the principle of the 16th clause.

Sir Henry James

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY was in favour of the magistrates having a discretion in all cases.

MR. COLE remarked that this was not a Bill to increase Her Majesty's Revenue. The Bill professed to be for the purpose of giving the magistrates certain increased jurisdiction in criminal cases; but it seemed that, according to this Amendment, it was to be a Bill to facilitate the collection of Revenue. Unless the hon. Gentleman would consent to the repeal of the 16th clause, he should strongly object to the omission of the words proposed to be left out from this clause.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER must remind hon. Members that the Revenue was an abstraction for which no one felt any sympathy. He believed that there was very widely spread throughout this country a feeling that offences against the Revenue were of a more venial and trivial character than offences against the person or property. It did not surprise him that the Treasury, who had been under the necessity of calling the attention of the Committee to the consequences of the legislation which was now proposed, should find that it was in a minority, as it evidently was, upon this question. After the expression of opinion, first from the Select Committee, and now from the Committee of the House, it would be useless to put hon. Members to the trouble of a Division. At the same time, he was bound to say, as his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury had already said, they considered that in taking this step they were putting the Revenue to a by no means inconsiderable inconvenience.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Repeal.

Clause 55 (Repeal of Acts) agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. COLE, in moving the insertion of a new clause, said, its object was to protect Clerks of the Peace who held a freehold office on their appointment. Everyone knew that this Bill, if passed into law and carried into operation, would have the effect of depriving Clerks of the Peace appointed since 1855 of a great number of the fees which they now enjoyed. Gentlemen accepting the office of Clerk of the Peace gave up everything else and devoted their whole time to it. Within his knowledge gentlemen belonging to his own Profession had given up practice and accepted offices of this kind under the express understanding that they would continue always to receive certain fees which those offices entitled them to. The effect of the present Bill would be to deprive those gentlemen of a large portion of their income. With regard to the Clerk of the Peace for Middlesex, if the Bill passed in its present form he would lose between £500 and £600 a-year, and those fees would go into the pockets of the Clerk to the Justices. It was the same with regard to other Clerks of the Peace. There was ample precedent for the introduction of a clause protecting the rights of Clerks of the Peace; and he hardly thought it could be the intention of the Government to deprive those gentlemen of so large a portion of their emoluments and to give them no compensation. The clause he should propose would only give them compensation during their lives, and when they died out the payments would cease, as, of course, in all fresh appointments, the gentlemen accepting the offices would take them with no right to anything more than they would then be entitled to under the present Bill; but it was extremely hard that gentlemen who had accepted office under the old system should be deprived of a large portion of their emoluments without compensation. He might say that he had numerous authorities in former Acts where similar provisions had been inserted protecting the interests of those affected. The only Act, however, to which he would refer particularly was 14 & 15 Vict., c. 55, s. 9. He begged to move the insertion of a clause providing for compensation to the Clerks of the Peace who would be deprived of their fees by the Act.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that, in his opinion, Clerks of the Peace had no vested right to the fees of which the Act would deprive them. He was aware that in some Acts passed some time ago a clause similar to that moved by the hon. and learned Member had been inserted; but he (Mr. Cross) entirely differed from the reasons put before the Committee for inserting the clause in the present Bill. Although the Bill would have the effect of making some cases which were now tried at Quarter Sessions before a jury be in the future disposed of in Petty Sessions, yet, probably, a great many fresh cases would go before a jury at Quarter Sessions, and appeals would be brought in the Quarter Sessions. He might say that those gentlemen had never rendered the slightest account of the fees which they received from various sources. Moreover, in the Bill before the Committee, it was proposed to bring many cases to the Quarter Sessions which were now triable only at Assizes. If, therefore, any compensation were to be given to the Clerks of the Peace for the fees which they would lose under the Bill, it would also be necessary to ask them to disgorge the fresh profits they would make by it. To his mind, Clerks of the Peace had no kind of vested right in these fees. They had a vested interest in their offices to do all the duties that that House imposed upon Quarter Sessions—no more, and no less. If the duties were added to or diminished it was immaterial, for they had no vested interest in the business put before them.

SIR HENRY JAMES would advise his hon. and learned Friend to withdraw his proposed clause, as he would have a much better chance of bringing it up on the Report, if there were a good case in favour of the Clerks of the Peace.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD also had a clause to the same effect as that already moved, but in different terms. He was quite willing to take the course suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), and bring his clause forward upon Report. When both clauses were printed, hon. Members would be better able to judge which clause they preferred.

MR. COLE said, he would withdraw his clause upon that occasion, as that course was considered advisable, and bring it up upon the Report. He was somewhat surprised at the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that Clerks of the Peace were not entitled to compensation. He would point out, with reference to the right hon. Gentleman's remarks, that these gentlemen only wished to obtain compensation for what they would lose by the proposed alteration of the law. Most Clerks of the Peace were now paid by salaries, and very few were still paid by fees. That made the case of those few the stronger, and on their behalf he wished to add to the Act, which would deprive them of a portion of the remuneration they derived from fees, a clause which would, in some way, compensate them for what they lost.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 1.

MR. PAGET moved, as an Amendment, in pages 34 and 35, in the heading, to leave out the words "children or."

MR. HICKS did not think that at that late hour they should be called upon to go into these Schedules, which proposed to extend the power of the magistrates to a much greater length than at present. He would move to report Progress.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS trusted that the Committee would go on and finish the Bill. Every question could be raised upon Report, and he did not think that any member of the magistracy would say that the Bill placed anything in their hands which they were not competent to deal with. He had been asked the object of the Bill; and he might say, briefly, that its object was to enable the magistrates to dispose of numbers of those petty cases which now went before Quarter Sessions.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT observed, that the magistrates now had the power given them of dealing with many cases summarily by penalty; and it was a question which he thought ought to be carefully considered and enunciated by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary how far magistrates ought to go in that direction. The first line of the Schedule was somewhat indefinite in giving jurisdiction to impose a penalty for the offence of simple larceny when, in the opinion of the magistrate, the value of the property stolen did not exceed 40s. He supposed that by that was meant such cases as an old woman stealing a bundle of faggots; but he considered that it should be made more explicit.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS stated that the magistrates would still have a discretion to send cases of simple larceny to trial.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

Mr. Assheton Cross

Schedule agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Remaining Schedule agreed to, and added to the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 169.]

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING ACT (1865) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 166.]

(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Gerard Noel.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DILLWYN thought the House should have some explanation with regard to the great increase in the cost of these buildings.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the Bill had been introduced to remove certain difficulties that had been experienced in carrying out the Courts of Justice Building Act, 1865. The cost of the buildings was originally estimated at £1,500,000, and that sum was nearly paid by the money voted by Parliament at the time. Afterwards, it was to be paid to the extent of £20,000 by the estimated value of the then existing Courts; partly from a fund belonging to the Chancery suitors, and partly by a tax to be levied on the suitors using the building. Portions of the buildings were now in use, and it became necessary to levy the fees for the use of the building. The fusion of the Court of Chancery in the High Court of Justice had done away with the accuracy of the returns supplied originally, and there was some difficulty as to whether the fees that were now to be raised would have to be levied on a portion of the suitors only, or upon all using the new Courts. The Bill was to remedy these difficulties, and especially those that had been found to arise from the Act of 1865.

MR. WHITWELL remarked, that the Bill gave power to the Lord Chancellor, by his own will, without laying the rules he proposed before Parliament, to raise money by increasing the fees of suitors. That was a very great power to be given, for anyone to have absolute discretion over these fees without consulting Parliament; and it seemed to him, therefore, that the Bill involved a principle of considerable magnitude.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

BLIND AND DEAF-MUTE CHILDREN (EDUCATION) BILL.—[BILL 93.]

(Mr. Wheelhouse, Sir Andrew Lusk, Mr. Scott, Mr. Isaac, Mr. Benjamin Williams.)

CONSIDERATION, AS AMENDED.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now taken into consideration."—(Mr. Wheelhouse.)

MAJOR NOLAN, who had an Amendment upon the Paper to the effect, "That it be considered upon this day six months," said, he was willing, if the House would permit him, to withdraw it, and allow the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Wheelhouse) to forward the Bill a stage that night.

MR. SPEAKER said, that as an Amendment to the Motion stood on the Order Book, the half-past 12 Rule absolutely precluded the Bill being taken.

Question put, and negatived.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till To-morrow.

INCLOSURE PROVISIONAL ORDER (MATTERDALE COMMON) BILL.

On Motion of Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY, Bill to confirm the Provisional Order for the regulation of certain Lands forming part of Matterdale Common, and situated in the parish of Grey-stoke, in the county of Cumberland, and the Provisional Order for the Inclosure of certain other Lands forming the remainder of the same Common, and situated in the same parish, in pursuance of a Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY and Mr. Secretary Cross.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 171.]

INCLOSURE PROVISIONAL ORDER (REDMOOR AND GOLBERDON COMMONS) BILL.

On Motion of Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY, Bill to confirm the Provisional Order for the inclosure of certain lands known as Redmoor and Golberdon Commons, situate in the parish of South Hill, in the county of Cornwall, in pursuance of a Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY and Mr. Secretary Cross.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 172.]

MR. CLARE READ was very glad the attention of his right hon. Friend had been called to the matter, for he remembered perfectly well that it was the opinion of the Committees which inquired into the Cattle Diseases Acts that the Irish Veterinary Department, some years ago, was both undermanned and underpaid. He saw that there had been a very considerable increase in the number of Inspectors; but if the inspection in Ireland was to be of any use at all, it must be very much better than it had been in previous years. He believed that, as a rule, veterinary surgeons did not abound in Ireland, and that a good many had been imported from England; but he had also heard that one or two young vets who had gone over there were so badly paid that they were obliged to come back.

MR. SHAW believed that the inspection at the ports was very efficient; but in the country districts it was very difficult to get Inspectors, from the want of knowledge of diseases of animals which prevailed. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that he should make the Irish Veterinary Department a teaching Department. At present, there was no school of veterinary teaching whatever in Ireland. In the County of Cork they were trying to do something in connection with the medical schools which the Government were going to establish, in order to teach veterinary science to the farmers. A very few thousands a-year would establish a school of veterinary science, for the county gentlemen were quite ready to come forward with a supplementary grant. He did not believe the Government could spend money more usefully, and they would also prevent the shipment of diseased cattle. Very often, he believed, such cattle were sent to the port through pure ignorance of what was the matter with them on the part of their owners.

MR. WHITWELL said, he did not wish to press his Motion; but he might say that he was well acquainted with this subject, and was sure that if it were investigated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he would come to the same opinion upon it as he (Mr. Whitwell) had done.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that the question involved in the consideration of the Vote was a very large one, and unless the Government would pass it over, he should move to report Progress.

MR. J. LOWTHER thought that the Vote had been sufficiently discussed.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that, under those circumstances, it only remained for him to move to report Progress. If they were to go into the matter fully, there would be no possibility of the discussion being finished under two or three hours. Moreover, two or three other Votes would cause a similar discussion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. O'Shaughnessy.)

MR. J. LOWTHER hoped the hon. and learned Member would not strive to postpone the Vote. It was an annual Vote, and he was not aware of any new matter that had arisen in connection with it. As he had heard no arguments in favour of reporting Progress, he really could not consent to the Motion.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY declined to withdraw the Motion.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY observed, that some Votes following this would also require considerable discussion. Everyone who knew the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) was aware that he never took objections unless they were well-founded, and for the purpose of obtaining proper criticism. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had now, in effect, classed the hon. and learned Member amongst those who wilfully obstructed Business; and, therefore, he should support his hon. and learned Friend in his opposition to going further. He thought the time had come when the Committee was well justified in reporting Progress.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY was firm in his wish to report Progress. He made the Motion for the purpose of recalling the attention of the Committee to the fact that on a previous occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, while objecting to the

of this right is a matter which depends on the Sultan alone. Even supposing the Sultan was so misguided—which I cannot imagine—as to wish to renounce this right, which is of considerable value for the purpose of defending his Dominions, he could not renounce it without the consent of the other Powers who were parties to the Treaty of Berlin.

SUPPLY OF DRINK ON CREDIT BILL.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

EARL STANHOPE, in presenting a Bill to consolidate and amend the Law relating to the Supply of Intoxicating Drinks on Credit, said, that the Select Committee of their Lordships' House had neither examined witnesses nor reported on this particular point. It was only the fringe of a great question; and though he did not believe in legislation as a cure for the drunkenness of the country, still it occasionally might remove temptations out of the way of those who frequented public-houses. The provisions of the Act of 24 Geo. II. c. 40, which applied to England and Scotland, were confined to cases in which credit was given for spirits of less value than £1 supplied anywhere, or of less quantity than a reputed quart delivered at the purchaser's residence. That Act was made more stringent by the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 38, under which publicans taking pledges for drink were liable to a penalty. Both Acts were, however, silent as to loans, promissory notes, or securities; and also as to wines and all intoxicating drinks other than spirits. On the other hand, the County Courts Act, 1867, did extend to loans and securities; but was equally silent as to loans and pledges, and to wines and other intoxicating drinks. In Scotland the law was the same as in England, except that the County Courts Act, 1867, did not extend to that Kingdom. In Ireland matters of that kind were regulated by 55 Geo. III. c. 19, the enactments of which were confined to spirits of less quantity than two quarts. In that country, as in England and Scotland, publicans were liable to a penalty for taking pledges; but, unlike the law applying to England and Scotland, the Act applying to Ireland provided that unlicensed retailers of intoxicating drink of any value were deprived of right of action for debts incurred for drink, and employers were subject to a penalty for paying workmen in a public-house. The object of the present Bill was to consolidate and make uniform throughout the United Kingdom the enactments which related to the sale of intoxicating drinks on credit. By the 9th and last clause in the Bill, he proposed to introduce a new system into the English law—namely, to make a penalty on paying wages to workmen in a public-house where intoxicating drinks were sold by retail. The practice of paying wages at a public-house was radically wrong, as it placed a premium on workmen immediately spending their money in drink either "for the good of the house," or in treating friends. It might be said that there would be difficulties in carrying out this provision; but in Ireland it was already the law, and surely in England it would be far easier than in Ireland to find other places than public-houses to pay wages in.

Bill to consolidate and amend the enactments which relate to the Supply of Intoxicating Drinks on Credit—Presented (The Earl STANHOPE); read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 84.)

House adjourned at a half past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 13th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED—For Limerick City, v. Isaac Butt, esquire, deceased.
SELECT COMMITTEE—Law of Libel, Mr. Egerton
Hubbard and Mr. Blennerhassett added.
SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions
[May 12] reported.
PRIVATE BILL (by Order)—Select Committee—Report—Thames River (Prevention of Floods)
[No. 178].
PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders
(Killarney, &c.) * [178].
First Reading—Rivers Conservancy * (175); Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (London) * [176]; Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation
(Brighton and Preston, &c.) * [177].
Second Reading—Local Government (Poor Law)
Provisional Orders * [155].
Committee—Report—Bills of Sale (Ireland) *
[45]; West India Loans * [167].

PRIVATE BUSINESS.CITY OF LONDON SCHOOL BILL. [Lords.]

MR. RAIKES said, that a Motion stood in his name upon the Paper in regard to this Bill. He need only say that this was a Bill which raised a rather important question as to the site of the City of London Schools. It was promoted by the Corporation of London; but certain objections were taken to it by the Charity Commissioners. He begged to move—

"That the City of London School Bill be referred to a Select Committee, Three to be nominated by the House, and two by the Committee of Selection.

"That all Petitions against the Bill, presented on or before the 17th instant, be referred to the Committee, and that such Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petitioners.

"That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records:—That Three be the quorum."

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF JOHN STANLEY.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that a cabman, named John Stanley—who was convicted at Beaumaris on a charge of assault upon a policeman, on whose sole evidence the sentence of six months' imprisonment was passed, and whose evidence was subsequently proved to be perjured, in consequence of which Stanley was released by an order from the Home Office—is at present precluded from obtaining any redress for the wrong done him in consequence of the judges having come to no conclusion, after several months, in the case of The Queen v. Hughes, Hughes being the policeman on whose testimony Stanley was convicted, and who now seeks a reversal of his own conviction for perjury on the ground of an original informality in the warrant obtained by him against Stanley; and, whether he will cause inquiry to be made with a view of obtaining some compensation for the injury Stanley has suffered?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, in reply, said, it was perfectly true that a man named John Stanley was convicted last year on a charge of assaulting a policeman on the sole evidence of that policeman; it was subsequently proved that the evidence was perjured; and on the recommendation of the learned Judge who tried the case John Stanley was released from prison. The Home Office had no means of knowing whether an action such as that referred to by the hon. Member was pending, and had no power to force the Judges to come to a decision upon it. With reference to compensation, it was open to Stanley to proceed against the policeman for damages if he felt that he was entitled to them.

UNCERTIFICATED LEGAL PRACTITIONERS—(SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

MR. MACKINTOSH asked the Lord Advocate, If his attention has been directed to the number of uncertificated legal practitioners in Glasgow and other towns in Scotland, and whether he will give orders to have the laws as to admission and annual licence enforced?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. WATSON): Sir, I have a good deal of information to the same effect as that contained in the Question of the hon. Member. If I were simply to reply to the Question in the affirmative, it might be misleading. According to the law of Scotland, no man is entitled to practise as an agent in any Court unless he is possessed of certain qualifications, and those who practise without these qualifications render themselves liable to penalties. Then, as to persons practising as conveyancers, they are required to take licences, or they render themselves liable to heavy penalties. Whenever infractions of the law in either of these respects have been brought to my attention, I have always directed a prosecution to be instituted. There is, however, a third class, regarding whom my information is that, not professing to be lawyers, they at the same time profess to give legal advice on very moderate terms. As the law of Scotland at present stands, no penalty is incurred by those so acting unless they are guilty of misrepresenting their own character or position.

EAST INDIA (DUTIES ON COTTON GOODS)—GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT, 1858.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether in the communications sent to the Viceroy of India by the Secretary of State, in relation to the repeal of the Cotton Duties, the provisions prescribed by "The Government of India Act, 1858," were observed, which require, by section 24—

"That any communication proposed to be sent to India, unless the same has been submitted to a meeting of the Council, shall be placed in the Council Room for the perusal of all Members of the Council during seven days before the sending thereof, in order that any Member of the Council may record in the Minute Book his opinion with respect to such communication ;"

or by the further provision in section 26, that—

"When the despatch of any communication appears to be urgently required, the urgent reasons for sending the same, without depositing it for seven days in the Council Room, shall be recorded by the Secretary of State, and notice thereof given to every Member of Council ;"

whether it is claimed that the communications in reference to such a matter come within the exception in section 29 as to the subjects which before that Act were transacted by the Secret Committee of the Court of Directors ; and, if that is not so, whether he will state why the provisions of the Act before referred to have not been complied with ; and also what are the dates of the receipt of the communications from the Viceroy on that subject and of the replies of the Secretary of State ; and whether those communications will be presented to this House ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : Sir, I have communicated with my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India upon this subject, and he informs me that it was not his intention to send, and it is not his opinion that he did send, any order or communication to India within the meaning of the section of the Government of India Act referred to. The telegrams in question were sent in reply to a telegraphic inquiry from the Viceroy, and they bore a heading which, according to an understanding between the last two Secretaries for India—the Duke of Argyll and the Marquess of Salisbury—as well as the present Secretary and the Viceroy, show them to be of the nature of a private letter. The telegram sent by the Secretary of State in no way committed the Council to an approval of what was done. These communications will not, of course, be laid on the Table of the House.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT : In consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to give Notice that, on an early day, I will call attention to the manner in which the design of Parliament in providing a Council, both in India and in England, composed of men experienced in Indian affairs, as advisers and checks upon the Administration, and particularly on measures relating to finance, have been evaded and defeated by the action of the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India.

ARMY—60TH RIFLES—COURT MARTIAL. QUESTION.

MR. FRENCH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will take steps to obtain copies of the evidence produced at the trial by Court Martial of a sergeant of the 60th Rifles for retiring a picket without the order of his officer on an alarm of the enemy, at which he was sentenced to five years' penal servitude and reduction to the ranks ?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, he was informed that the proceedings of the court martial on a sergeant of the 60th Rifles would be forwarded for the information of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief. The proceedings of courts martial were held to be privileged.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL. QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When he proposes to ask for the £69,000 expended in the Transvaal in addition to the Grant in the past year ; whether Her Majesty's Representatives in Africa have authority to spend any more British money on the Transvaal Administration in the present year ; and, if so, when Estimates for that will be presented ; and when a Statement showing how the money has been expended will be presented ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : Sir, with regard to the £69,000 expended in the Transvaal in a former year, I think in 1877-8, that money was expended out of the Army Fund in respect of services in the nature of Army services connected with the annexation of the Transvaal. I have not at this moment a Statement of the application of the money; but I will inquire of the War Office, and, if possible, it shall be furnished. The money was expended out of the Army grant, and the account of that grant has been before the Controller and Auditor General, and has been passed by him; and as there was no excess found, no grant has had to be asked for. With regard to the second Question, Her Majesty's Representative in South Africa has no authority for spending any British money in the administration of the Transvaal in the present year; but, if necessary, of course, an Estimate would be submitted. The only exceptional case might be that in the event of any serious military emergency he might, upon his own responsibility, draw on the Treasury chest, and in that case the funds would have to be supplied. No expenditure can be incurred in the administration of the Transvaal without the previous sanction of the Home Government.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked, If there would be any expenditure this year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Perhaps the hon. Baronet will give Notice of that Question.

THE SUGAR INDUSTRIES—THE SELECT COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. RITCHIE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, seeing that the House of Commons and the Government have approved of the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the Sugar Industries, and that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has officially intimated that Her Majesty's Government have decided to make no further representations on the subject to Foreign Governments until the Select Committee has reported, he will afford me facilities for nominating the Committee, as, in consequence of notice of opposition to the nomination of the Committee having been placed on the Paper, it is rendered practically impossible, without the assistance of the Government, to carry out the decision of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he regretted very much that any impediment had been thrown in the way of proceeding to the appointment of the Select Committee with reference to these duties. He did not quite understand upon what ground the opposition which he saw was offered to the nomination of the Committee by his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Isaac) rested. He thought that was the only opposition which was now offered, and it would be hardly fair if the matter were brought on at a period of the evening when it would not be possible to discuss it. It would not be easy, and would probably cause some inconvenience, if he were to propose to alter the other Business in order to take the Motion for nominating this Committee. He therefore trusted that his hon. Friend might be able to arrange that the Notice of the Amendment might be taken off the Paper.

MR. RITCHIE asked the hon. Member for Nottingham if he should persist in his opposition?

[No reply was given.]

EGYPT—FINANCIAL CHANGES—DISMISSAL OF MR. RIVERS WILSON AND M. DE BIGNIÈRES.

QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, although Mr. Rivers Wilson has been withdrawn from Egypt, the French Government has not declined to withdraw M. de Bignières; whether the idea of any joint action in regard to Egyptian affairs between the English and French Governments has been abandoned; and what, if any, difference existed in the grounds on which the application of the Khedive for permission to be granted by the French and English Governments respectively to Messrs. Wilson and de Bignières to accept office in Egypt was assented to by those Governments?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I shall be very happy to give a definite answer to the second Question of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dundee. The hon. Member asks me whether the idea of any joint action with France in relation to Egyptian affairs has been abandoned.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

I beg to reply that the idea of joint action in regard to Egyptian affairs has not been abandoned. With regard to the other Question on the Paper of the hon. Member, I must inform him that the Question relates to the action and motive of the French Government, and, although we are most happy to give every information we can with regard to the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government, it would be impossible for us to adopt the same rule in regard to the proceedings of a foreign Government.

INDIA (FINANCE, &c.)—THE INDIAN BUDGET.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON wished to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to a conversation that took place yesterday regarding the Indian Budget. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked whether he would agree to introduce the Indian Budget on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair, and would allow discussion in the ordinary manner. He understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that he preferred that the statement should be made in Committee on the Resolution referring to the Loan. He wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, taking into consideration what had fallen from Mr. Speaker, and also the strong feeling entertained in some quarters of the House upon the propriety of that course, he could see his way to adopt the more ordinary and regular course, and to arrange that the Indian Budget should be made upon the Motion that the House should go into Committee on the Indian Accounts, and not in the exceptional manner which he proposed yesterday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was very far indeed from the wish of Her Majesty's Government to proceed in any exceptional manner with reference to the Indian Budget. But what he wished to point out to the House yesterday, and would again remind them of, was this—there was an important financial proposal with reference to India which required the passing of a Bill for the purpose of raising a loan. It was necessary, in the first instance, to have a Committee of the House. In that Committee a Resolution would be passed upon which the Bill would be founded, which would subsequently pass through all its stages. That was a matter upon which there would naturally be some discussion, and he observed that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had given Notice to raise the question of the amount of the loan in that stage of the preliminary Committee, not upon the Loan Bill itself; and, therefore, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was afraid that if they proceeded first by taking a discussion upon the Budget that, possibly, would run even more than one night upon Indian Finance generally, and were not allowed to make any progress with the Loan Bill, considerable delay would occur. If he could see his way to any arrangement by which that might be avoided, he should be very glad to make an arrangement. He would suggest that after the discussion had taken place on the Indian Budget, and the House had decided upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), they should be allowed to take the preliminary stage of the Loan Bill without further delay and discussion; and if his hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy would postpone till a later stage of the Bill the question which he proposed to raise, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would take care to bring it on at such a time as would afford ample time for discussion. The House would see that, in making this proposal, he wished to deal as fairly as possible with those who were interested in the matter.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, his difficulty was that the first stage of the Indian Loans Bill would be the passing in Committee of a Resolution to the effect that it was desirable to raise this loan of £10,000,000. This would distinctly pledge the House to the expediency of raising the loan. He was quite willing, however, to agree to the suggested arrangement, provided it was clearly understood that they did not bind themselves to the principle involved in the Resolution, and that he would be at liberty to raise the question of which he had given Notice on the Motion for the second reading of the Bill. He might take this opportunity of saying that if the Resolution of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) was moved, inasmuch as it must inevitably be accepted by the Government, he (Sir George Campbell) would move an Amendment to the effect—

“That this House regards with apprehension the state of the finances of India, and is of opinion that it is not sufficiently controlled, Her Majesty’s Government having disregarded the letter and spirit of the provisions of the Act for the better government of India on that subject.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Resolution which the Government would propose would be a Resolution, not to raise £10,000,000, but to raise any sum of money not exceeding £10,000,000. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman would not be compromised by the passing of it.

ARMY—VOLUNTEERING FROM THE MILITIA TO THE LINE.

QUESTION.

COLONEL MURE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that volunteering for the Line has been opened within the last few days in various regiments of Militia; and, if that is the case, whether this course has been rendered necessary owing to the youth and want of stamina of the regiments at home which would naturally furnish the reinforcements of the Army in Zululand?

COLONEL STANLEY: It is the case, Sir, that on this, as on some other previous occasions, volunteers from the Militia have been called for to fill up vacancies in certain regiments—in this instance, in the first regiment for foreign service, and in the depôts of regiments serving in the field. The vacancies had been caused by these other regiments having to give up large numbers of men to the regiments serving at the Cape. It has been decided to limit the volunteering to men of 20 years of age. It is with the view undoubtedly, of getting men of a more seasoned nature than the recruits who would naturally come to the Colours, and, to a certain extent, trained men.

COLONEL MURE gave Notice that, on an early day, he should call the attention of the House to the unsatisfactory working of the present short-service system in the Army, to the youth and immaturity of a large portion of the Infantry of the Line, and the consequent difficulty in providing an ample Force for the defence of our Colonial Empire in times of emergency.

Sir George Campbell

PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN. QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT said, he rose for the purpose of making an appeal to the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) with reference to the Motion which stood in his name for that evening as to the Royal Prerogative. He did not desire at present to say a word as to the merits of that Motion; but he thought he should be expressing the opinion of every hon. Member, when he said that it raised a question of extreme importance and great delicacy. Anyone who knew the hon. Member for Swansea—

MR. E. JENKINS rose to Order. He desired to know whether it was in Order for the hon. Member for Hackney to address an appeal to the hon. Member for Swansea with reference to a Motion now before the House?

MR. SPEAKER: So far as the hon. Member for Hackney had proceeded, I cannot say that he was out of Order.

MR. FAWCETT said, that everyone who was acquainted with the hon. Member for Swansea must be aware that he was the last man who would knowingly place the House in an unfair position to consider such a question; and he appealed to his hon. Friend as to whether he did not think that, in consequence of the course he had adopted in the present instance, the House would not approach the discussion of this question with advantage? What were the facts of the case? Six weeks ago, the hon. Member put a Question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer—[“Order!”]—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member appears to be now entering into the subject of the Motion, and is trenching upon the limits of Order.

MR. FAWCETT said, he only desired to explain the reasons for making his appeal. The Motion of the hon. Member for Swansea had been on the Paper for six weeks, and arose out of a reply which he received to a Question addressed by him to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Yesterday afternoon, the hon. Member suddenly announced that he was prepared to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), and to embody it in his Resolution. The House was thus placed at once in a difficulty—

SIR ROBERT PEELE rose to Order. Of course, if the hon. Member for Hackney intended to conclude with a Motion, the whole question would be opened at once; but he put it to the Speaker whether it was at all regular for the hon. Gentleman to enter upon the discussion of a matter which was to form the subject of a debate about to take place?

MR. SPEAKER: No doubt, it would be quite irregular for the hon. Member to discuss any portion of the matter embraced within the scope of the Motion which the hon. Member for Swansea proposed to submit to the House.

MR. FAWCETT did not say a word as to the merits or demerits of the Motion. He was merely making a statement of facts. His hon. Friend said he accepted the Motion of the hon. Member for Dundee, and late on the previous evening had given Notice of a Resolution in a materially altered form. Now, what he desired to know was, whether it was not contrary to the ordinary usages of Parliament, and inconsistent with the convenience of the House, that Notice of Motion on a most important and delicate question should be given at so late an hour of the previous evening that it was impossible for hon. Members to see it in print, and, therefore, to give adequate Notice of any Amendments to it which they might wish to move? In these circumstances, and not because he was anxious that the Motion should be indefinitely postponed, he begged to ask his hon. Friend whether he did not think it fair to the House to put off his Resolution for some time longer?

MR. DILLWYN said, he was rather surprised at the appeal which had been addressed to him. His hon. Friend who had just spoken was present when he (Mr. Dillwyn) had the honour of waiting upon Mr. Speaker with reference to the alteration of the Resolution. He found that a misconception had arisen respecting the object of his Motion; and, therefore, he was glad to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), and endeavour to embody it in his Resolution. That Amendment eliminated words which seemed to some hon. Gentlemen objectionable, inasmuch as they appeared to them to reflect upon the action of Her Majesty. The hon. Member for Hackney raised before Mr. Speaker his objection to the alteration of the Motion; but Mr. Speaker's decision was that he (Mr. Dillwyn) was quite in Order. Under these circumstances, he did not see how he would be placing the House in an unfair position by proceeding with his Resolution, as altered; and he did not feel disposed to respond to the appeal which had just been made to him.

MOTIONS.

PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN.

RESOLUTION.

MR. DILLWYN, in rising to move—

"That, to prevent the growing abuse by Her Majesty's Ministers of the Prerogative and influence of the Crown, and consequent augmentation of the power of the Government in enabling them, under cover of the supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign, to withdraw from the cognizance and control of this House matters relating to policy and expenditure properly within the scope of its powers and privileges, it is necessary that the mode and limits of the action of the Prerogative should be more strictly observed," said, he desired, before entering upon the question which it raised, to disclaim any intention whatsoever of reflecting upon the action of Her Majesty the Queen, who thoroughly understood her duty as a Constitutional Sovereign, and who never interfered improperly in public affairs. He understood that her Majesty always took care to be fully informed of all the proceedings of her Ministers, which she required should not be carried on without her full knowledge and concurrence. In 1852, Lord Palmerston, having altered some despatches, Her Majesty sent a Memorandum to Lord John Russell, who was then Prime Minister. That Memorandum was as follows:—

"The Queen requires, first, that Lord Palmerston will distinctly state what he proposes in a given case, in order that the Queen may know as distinctly to what she is giving her Royal sanction; secondly, having once given her sanction to a measure, that it be not arbitrarily altered or modified by the Minister. Such an act she must consider as failing in sincerity towards the Crown, and justly to be visited by the exercise of her Constitutional right of dismissing the Minister. She expects to be kept informed of what passes between him and the Foreign Minister before important decisions are taken based upon that intercourse; to receive the foreign despatches in good time, and to have the drafts for her approval sent to her in sufficient time to make herself acquainted with their contents before they must be sent off. The Queen thinks it best that Lord John Russell should show this letter to Lord Palmerston."

That Memorandum served to show that Her Majesty identified herself with the acts of her Ministers; but she, at the same time, knew it was right and proper not to take action without her Ministers. It would be seen, from the last volume of the Life of the late Prince Consort, that a letter of his to the French Emperor, which had been characterized by the writer as "a long and friendly chat," had been submitted in the usual way to the Prime Minister and to Lord Clarendon. The Prerogative of the Crown was very large and undefined, and the very uncertainty which existed on the point made it all the more necessary that they should distinctly watch and observe the action of that Prerogative. It was so great that, unless checked, and kept within its proper limits, it would be inconsistent with the privileges, the rights, and the liberties of the people. It was, therefore, the duty of Parliament, whenever a doubt arose, to consider and debate the whole subject. Lord Erskine, speaking in the year 1807, said, with regard to Prerogative—

"The maxim that the King can do no wrong does not seek to alter the nature and constitution of things, but to preserve the Government, not only against the irreverence and loss of dignity arising from the very imputation of it. No act of State or Government can, therefore, be the King's; he cannot act but by advice, and he who holds office sanctions what is done, from whatever source it may proceed. This, my Lords, is not the legal fiction of the Constitution, but for the practical benefit and blessing of it. I am pleading the cause of the King and the people together in enforcing it, and I never will remain silent when this principle is disturbed."

Blackstone asserted that—

"There cannot be a stronger proof of that genuine freedom which is the boast of this age and country than the power of discussing with decency and respect the limits of the King's Prerogative."

For his own part, he knew that in discussing Prerogative he should do so, not only with decency and respect, but as loyally as the most loyal of Her Majesty's subjects. The uncertainty that pervaded the subject was indicated in the opinions of Mr. Allen, Earl Russell, and the present Lord Chancellor. The former of these, in his Inquiry into the Rise and Progress of Prerogative, said—

"The King, it is true, can do no wrong, and is not amenable to any earthly tribunal; but, on the other hand, he can perform no one political act without an adviser responsible for the same.

"A Prerogative founded on usage, which cannot be enforced because it has fallen into desuetude, is a contradiction in terms. No one will pretend that any Prerogative of the King of England is founded either on military force or on the express consent of the people; every Prerogative of the Crown must, therefore, be derived from Statute or from prescription, and, in either case, there must be a legal and established mode of exercising it. Where no such mode can be pointed out, we may be assured that the Prerogative, so boldly claimed, is derived neither from law nor usage, but founded on a theory of Monarchy imported from abroad, subversive of law and liberty, and alien to the spirit as well as the practice of our Constitution."

Lord Russell, in his book on the English Government and Constitution, wrote—

"The King has, by his Prerogative, the command of the Army; but that Army is only maintained by virtue of a law to punish mutiny and desertion passed from year to year. The King has a right to declare war, but if the House deny supplies he cannot carry it on for a week. The King may make a treaty of peace, but if it is dishonourable to the country the Ministers who sign it may be impeached. Nor is the King's command any excuse for a wrong administration of power. The Earl of Danby was impeached for a letter which contained a postscript in the King's own hand, declaring it was written by his order. The maxim of the Constitution is that the King cannot act without advisers responsible by law; and so far is this maxim carried that a commitment by the King, although he is the fountain of justice, was held to be void because there was no Minister responsible for it."

Lord Cairns, too, gave it as his opinion that—

"Prerogative is a power not conferred by Statute—that is what makes Prerogative differ from every other power in this country. . . . Now, there is one thing very clear in our Constitution—the Crown can do no wrong; and another thing is, that it is to the advice given by Ministers that we are to look for responsibility. . . . If the Sovereign were to place her veto by the advice of Her Majesty's Ministers upon a Bill that had passed through the two Houses, that veto would be operative; but no one would deny that it would be unconstitutional."

It was to be noticed that the Constitution had imposed limits to the exercise of the Prerogative; and of these the first and foremost was the check possessed by the House in being able to control the public purse, a power which, though it ought to be most jealously guarded, seemed to have been to a certain extent impaired and diminished of late years. Next to that check came the principle of Ministerial responsibility, according to which the Prerogative could not be constitutionally exercised, save by the advice of the Ministers of the Crown. With respect to this latter safeguard, he desired to point out that neither the advice nor the responsibility of a single Minister, however distinguished and able he might be, was intended by those who had originally obtained the concession and recognition of the principle. That was the gist of his whole argument, and lay at the root of the Resolution he was about to propose. The country desired that the responsibility should rest, not on any individual Minister, but on a number of Noblemen and Gentlemen in whom they had confidence, and who would meet together as a Cabinet Council, and, after full discussion, initiate the policy to be recommended to the Sovereign. It was obvious that, if individual responsibility were to take the place of collective responsibility, the country would be landed in great difficulty. If they permitted government by Departments, or government by individual Ministers, the connecting link between the Executive and the Legislature would be severed, and the whole power would be in the hands of the Minister who might happen to be in the ascendant at the Council of the Sovereign. All Constitutional lawyers had admitted the necessity of collective responsibility, and Macaulay specially stated that while each Minister separately ruled his own Department, his more important acts and decisions were brought under the consideration of his Colleagues. Again, Hallam, in his Constitutional History, quoted a paper from Somers's Tracts, to the following effect:—

Mr. Dillwyn

“The Constitutional doctrine is thus laid down:—According to the spirit of the recent Act of Settlement, as to the setting of the Great Seal of England to foreign alliances, the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper for the time being has a plain rule to follow—that is, humbly to inform the King that he cannot legally set the Great Seal of England to a matter of that consequence unless the same be first debated and resolved in Council, which method being observed the Chancellor is safe and the Council answerable.”

It was, no doubt, the Privy Council, and not the Cabinet, that was here referred to; but this did not affect the principle he relied on. The principle of Government by Cabinets was much older than many people supposed, and was to be met with over and over again at a period antecedent to the Act of Settlement. For instance, in the Rolls of Parliament, 7 & 8 Henry IV. s. 31, occurred the following passage:—

“Likewise, on Saturday, the 22nd of May, the Commons came before the King and the Lords in Parliament, and there represented that they prayed the King at the beginning of the Parliament and since, and represented besides that the Archbishop of Canterbury had made report to them that the King wished to be counselled by the wisest Lords of the Realm: To all which the King agreed, and repeated with his own mouth that it was his entire will; and upon this a Bill was read containing the names of all the Lords who should be of the Council.”

A more recent illustration of the same principle occurred in 12 & 13 Will. III. c. 2, which provided that—

“All matters and things relating to the well governing of this Kingdom which are properly cognizable in the Privy Council by the laws and customs of this Realm shall be transacted there, and all resolutions taken thereupon shall be signed by such of the Privy Council as shall advise and consent to the same.”

But the Privy Council was found to be too large and cumbersome a body to work satisfactorily in this way; and by degrees, therefore, it was found convenient that the Cabinet and Departmental Government should take its place. Lord North, no very revolutionary character, in a conversation with Mr. Fox, in 1807, said—

“If you mean there should not be a Government by Departments, I agree with you. I think it a very bad system. . . . Government by Departments was not brought in by me. I found it so, and had not the vigour and resolution to put an end to it.”

The latest case to which he would refer was one that occurred under the Liverpool Administration, in the reign of George IV. That Sovereign desired, in 1825, to fix the responsibility of certain advice which had been given him respecting the recognition of the independence of the Spanish Colonies in South America upon Mr. Canning, the individual Minister to whom he believed that advice was due. With this object, he endeavoured to obtain separate memoranda upon the subject from individual Members of the Cabinet. But the Cabinet, in reply, requested permission to give their answer generally and collectively. The power of Parliament and Ministerial responsibility were the two great restraints upon the undue exercise of the Prerogative of the Crown, and both these restraints had, he believed, been relaxed in recent years. Did they not know that the present House of Commons had been left in ignorance of very grave matters which seriously concerned the honour and welfare of the country until it was too late to take any steps with regard to them? In the first place, there was the purchase of the Suez Canal Shares. The amount of money involved was, perhaps, not large; but the entanglements and responsibilities to which it had led us were very considerable. Had the House been consulted before that scheme was embarked upon, he did not think it would have been carried out in the way it was. The whole matter had been a failure, and at this moment we were left out in the cold, and saw France in a stronger position than ourselves. Then, again, no opportunity had been afforded them of expressing an opinion with regard to the bringing of the Indian troops to Malta, which Lord Selborne had declared to be a violation of the law. The Anglo-Turkish Treaty was another case in point. If the House had been consulted, he did not believe they would have sanctioned it. They had been hurried into the Afghan War in a similar manner; and with regard to the annexation of the Transvaal, which had resulted in the Zulu War, no option had been allowed them. They had been merely called upon to register the decrees of the Cabinet Council. In all these cases Parliament ought, in the first instance, to have been consulted; and, for his own part, he believed that all these enterprizes might with advantage have been stopped. He had further to complain that misleading information was frequently given by Her Majesty's Government in reply to Questions put in that House. For instance, on February 8, 1878, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply to a Question by the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington), described the position of affairs in Turkey, and said the Government

"Feel that the state of affairs disclosed by the terms of the Armistice which I have just read has given rise to the danger which they then apprehended, and they have, in the circumstances, thought it right to order a portion of the Fleet to proceed at once to Constantinople for the purpose of protecting the lives and property of British subjects."—[3 Hansard, ccxxxvii. 1329.]

Mr. Dilkeyn

On the question of the £6,000,000 Vote, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at the close of his speech, said—

"We go (to the Congress). We should propose to go with no desire whatever of using force; it is not for that we ask it at all; but we desire to go armed with this, which would be, not only a Vote of Credit, but a Vote of Confidence, entitling us to speak as we would wish to speak in the Councils of Europe," &c.—[Ibid. 561.]

The answers given by the Government to Questions respecting the Berlin Congress were altogether at variance with the Salisbury-Schouvaloff secret agreement. Personally, he had the highest respect for the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he was satisfied that he would not intentionally mislead the House; but the truth was that the right hon. Gentleman himself had been misinformed on those subjects, and that there had not been that concert in the Cabinet with respect to foreign affairs that had been so loudly asserted. Again, it was a familiar form of speech for the Government, when questioned with regard to any particular matter, to reply that they had received no official communication in reference to it, although the whole of the facts of the case might have been conveyed to them by private correspondence. Thus, on the 31st of March last, he had asked a Question as to the statement of Mr. A. Forbes, relating to a direct correspondence between the Queen and Colonels Mansfield and Wellesey during the Russo-Turkish War, and between Her Majesty and the Viceroy of India at an eventful crisis of the Afghan difficulty, to which he had received the following reply from the Chancellor of the Exchequer:—

"I can give no information to the hon. Gentleman or the House on this subject, further than to say there is no kind of official communication between Her Majesty the Queen and the Viceroy of India. Letters have occasionally been written by the Viceroy, and by successive Viceroys, to the Queen, and, no doubt, letters have been written from the Queen to the Viceroy. Of those we know nothing, any more than we do of any private correspondence of Her Majesty."

Again, on the 21st of January, 1878, he asked whether a statement which had appeared in The Times relative to the Queen having interceded with the Emperor of Russia on behalf of Turkey was true, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer answered that it was; that a communication which the right hon. Gentleman read had been made; but that it had been made by the advice of the Ministers, though it was a private and personal communication. He did not understand private and personal communications in reference to public matters passing between high official persons. Recent events in India showed that instructions must have been given to our officials which were not known to all the Members of the Cabinet. Our Generals appeared to have a roving commission to annex territory wherever they pleased; but even with this, he did not think General Roberts would have ventured upon making the speech he did to the tribes in the Khurum Valley without some direct authority from home. The next case to which he wished to refer was that of Sir Bartle Frere, who had established in South Africa a scheme of dominion which was likely to land this country as well as the Colony in disaster and defence. The conduct of Sir Bartle Frere was censured by the Secretary of State for the Colonies; but in a debate in that House recently the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel), stated that the same mail which took out the censure also carried communications addressed to Sir Bartle Frere telling him that he need take no notice of the official censure. He did not know nor pretend to say by whom those communications or that communication had been sent, if sent at all; but if anything of the kind suggested by the right hon. Baronet occurred, he could only say that it was not a course likely to support Ministers of the Crown at home or the rule of England in her Colonies, especially in cases where the Crown was represented by a wrong-headed Minister like Sir Bartle Frere. What was the effect of one thing being said publicly with reference to Sir Bartle Frere, and another privately? In the first place, it encouraged him in a course which had been condemned, and in the next it encouraged the Colonies to pursue a course which was anything but desirable. Was it surprising that the Colonists, who could sell their produce at a high profit, which we should have to pay for at a very high price indeed, should express their confidence in Sir Bartle Frere and desire the war to continue? They all knew that he was supported by the highest authority at home against the Colonial Secretary. He would quote from The Daily News Correspondent—because it seemed to him that the only reliable information the House could get was from the newspapers. Only the other day the Correspondent of The Daily News at the Cape, in a very interesting letter, said that the strongly-sustained agitation throughout that Colony had resulted in meetings supporting the policy of Sir Bartle Frere and expressing confidence in him.

“The autograph letter of Her Majesty expressing confidence in Sir Bartle Frere has been an important factor in stirring up popular feeling.”

An unofficial—he would not say private—letter had been used to stir up an agitation in contravention of the censure which had been sent out by one of the responsible Ministers. He thought he had stated sufficient to prove his case. He admitted that the case had been one very difficult of proof. [Ministerial cheers.] He understood that cheer; but he would remind the House that his difficulty lay mainly in the fact that many official transactions had been studiously kept from the knowledge of the House and of Parliament—transactions which, if they had seen the light of day, would have materially diminished the difficulty of the task he had undertaken. The House had always been jealous of private communications addressed by the Sovereign to the authorities, particularly abroad. For instance, Lord Chatham, on his expedition to the Scheldt, addressed a private narrative to the King, which for some time was kept quiet; but when it came out he was called to account by Parliament, although he refused to answer questions, on the pleas of being a Peer, and also that while in command of this expedition he was a Cabinet Minister of the Crown, and had a private right to communicate with the Crown. A formal Resolution was passed, and Lord Chatham was censured by the House. In 1780, Mr. Dunning moved a Resolution that “The influence of the Crown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished.” In support of that Motion, Mr. Dunning said it would be idle to require proof; they must look for support to their consciences. Again, Mr. Fox in the same year, said that the undue influence of the Crown could not be proved, because it showed itself in the dark, and could only be proved by notoriety of the fact. In the present case there was certain ground for believing, as he (Mr. Dillwyn) had shown, that the control of Parliament had been evaded. The country had been involved in troubles which he thought might have been avoided had Parliament been consulted; but Parliament had not been consulted, and the consequence was additional wars and increased expenditure. He would appeal to the House to say whether either the information obtained had not been misleading, or had been withheld from Parliament, since their information had been procured from other sources? He did not wish to reopen old sores; but he did desire to do what he could to stop the progress of the system of Departmental Government. He wished to see the advice of the Cabinet given to the Crown, and not the advice of a single Minister, so that we might have the responsibility of the whole Cabinet, and not that of any individual. In bringing this question before the House, he was only anxious to assert the Privileges of Parliament, which were being invaded, and, in doing so, he believed most conscientiously that he was doing his duty as a loyal Member of the House, and in the interests of the country as well as of the Crown itself. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving—

“That, to prevent the growing abuse by Her Majesty’s Ministers of the Prerogative and influence of the Crown, and consequent augmentation of the power of the Government in enabling them, under cover of the supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign, to withdraw from the cognizance and control of this House matters relating to policy and expenditure properly within the scope of its powers and privileges, it is necessary that the mode and limits of the action of the Prerogative should be more strictly observed.”

MR. COURTNEY, in rising to second the Motion, said, he thought it must, at all events, be plain to the House that the desire of his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) was not in any way to move a Vote of Censure against the Crown. The Motion was directed solely against Her Majesty’s Government. Those who approved the course taken by the hon. Member for Swansea would be false to the object which they had in view, if they were to direct their censure in any other quarter. He held that the language of the hon. Member’s original Motion, which had been thought by some to suggest that the Sovereign protruded herself into affairs of State, was identical in meaning with the Motion before the House, which was a Motion of condemnation of Her Majesty’s Ministers, and nothing more. They wished to bring home to Her Majesty’s Government the responsibility for what had happened—for the weakening which Constitutional guarantees had suffered from their policy. The maxim, “The Queen can do no wrong,” had been sometimes spoken of as a mere fiction; but he regarded it as a Constitutional principle of the highest importance; for if once it came to be admitted that wrong could be brought home to the Crown, they would have to divert their action from a quarter in which it might be useful, and waste their powers in attacking that which by its very nature was invulnerable. Precedents existed, showing what were the views of high authorities with regard to the responsibility of Ministers. In 1807, after the death of Mr. Fox, in consequence of a pledge supposed to have been given by the new Ministry to the King not to raise the Catholic question, a Motion was proposed in the House by a Gentleman bearing a name that had always been honoured—Mr. Brand—asserting that it was contrary to the first duties of the confidential Servants of the Crown to restrain themselves by any pledge, expressed or implied, from offering to the King such advice as circumstances might render necessary for the welfare and security of the Empire. That Resolution was supported by Sir Samuel Romilly, Mr. Whitbread, Lord Howick, and other Gentlemen equally eminent in the House of Commons, and a similar Motion in the House of Lords received the support of Lord Erskine. The objection was made, then, that the Resolution was an attack upon the Sovereign; and in the course of the debate a speech was made by a distinguished person—Mr. Plunket, the Attorney General for Ireland—who warmly defended himself and those who were in favour of the Motion against the imputation that it was wished to attach blame to the King, for whom he had the highest respect. The precedent was further important, because it was argued by Mr. Percival, the then Prime Minister, that although it was quite true that every act of the Crown must be vouched for by a responsible

Mr. Dillwyn

Minister, yet in the interim between successive Ministries the action of the Crown was necessarily independent, and whatever was done then was beyond Parliamentary criticism, and could not be made the subject of a Vote of Censure on the Ministers. If that argument had been allowed, it would have done away altogether with the responsibility of Ministers; but although the House of Commons, by a small majority, rejected Mr. Brand's Motion, that argument was distinctly repudiated in 1835, when Sir Robert Peel came into Office. He was summoned from Rome, and a considerable interval intervened between the dismissal of Lord Melbourne and the acceptance by Sir Robert Peel of the Seals of Office; but his first act was to accept the responsibility of what had been done in the interregnum, including the dismissal of Lord Melbourne. No interval could at all be allowed, even in imagination, to interpose between the responsibility of one Ministry and another. These instances proved that, under no circumstances, could the Crown itself commit an act which could be the subject of censure or blame. It might be said that he had been referring to what were elementary truths; but it was necessary to remind hon. Members of the elementary truths of Constitutional principles in these days, when they were not altogether "understood of the people." He ventured to say that the opinion which was held in some quarters, that the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) was a Vote of Censure on the Crown, could only be entertained by those who had lost sight of elementary truths. A writer, to whose merits the Chancellor of the Exchequer had paid a just tribute (Mr. Bagehot), had said that if a gentleman attempted to explain to his servants the phrase "The Queen reigns, but does not govern," he would find they did not understand his language. It would seem as if the ignorance of the kitchen had invaded the House of Commons. A Vote of Censure on the Crown was an absurdity, because such a Vote would contradict the principle that the Crown was above responsibility. His hon. Friend attacked the Ministry because he held that they had protruded the name and authority of the Queen, so as to obtain undue power through the respect due to her name; and because they had initiated and pursued great lines of policy in comparative independence of one another, thus minimizing the collective judgment, the collective authority, and the collective responsibility of the Cabinet, and also minimizing the control of the House. As to the first question, of the undue use of the name and authority of the Crown, no one, he supposed, would follow the example of Wolsey and say, "Ego et Rex meus," in order to push himself forward; but Ministers might change the form of the phrase and say, "Regina mea et ego," in order to shield themselves from criticism. The true function of the Crown was thus laid down by the high authority to whom he had already referred (Mr. Bagehot)—

"The Sovereign has, under a Constitutional Monarchy such as ours, three rights—the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn."

Not one of these rights suggested the power of initiation. The first two had reference to the action of the Ministers, the third to warning given against action taken by the Ministry. The writer added—"and a King of good sense and sagacity would want no other." Another high authority said—

"A Constitutional Government insures to the King a wide authority in all the councils of the State. He chooses and dismisses his Ministers. Their resolutions upon every important measure of foreign and domestic policy are submitted to his approval; and when that approval is withheld, his Ministers must either abandon their policy or resign their office. They are responsible to the King on the one hand, and to Parliament on the other; and while they retain the confidence of the King by administering affairs to his satisfaction, they must act upon principles and propose measures which they can justify to Parliament. And here is the proper limit to the King's influence."

Such were the words of the learned gentleman (Sir Erskine May) who sat at that Table. Then, again, as the Crown had no power of initiation, the Crown must not be put forward as having used it. It must not be suggested that the Crown had a policy of its own which had been adopted by the Ministry instead of being put forward by the Ministry and sanctioned by the Crown. If the Ministry accept suggestions from the Crown, they must do so on condition of making them their own, and merging their origin in themselves. All this sprung from the principle that the Crown could never take responsibility upon itself. They saw that in the dark, and could only be proved by notoriety of the fact. In the present case there was certain ground for believing, as he (Mr. Dillwyn) had shown, that the control of Parliament had been evaded. The country had been involved in troubles which he thought might have been avoided had Parliament been consulted; but Parliament had not been consulted, and the consequence was additional wars and increased expenditure. He would appeal to the House to say whether either the information obtained had not been misleading, or had been withheld from Parliament, since their information had been procured from other sources? He did not wish to reopen old sores; but he did desire to do what he could to stop the progress of the system of Departmental Government. He wished to see the advice of the Cabinet given to the Crown, and not the advice of a single Minister, so that we might have the responsibility of the whole Cabinet, and not that of any individual. In bringing this question before the House, he was only anxious to assert the Privileges of Parliament, which were being invaded, and, in doing so, he believed most conscientiously that he was doing his duty as a loyal Member of the House, and in the interests of the country as well as of the Crown itself. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving—

"That, to prevent the growing abuse by Her Majesty's Ministers of the Prerogative and influence of the Crown, and consequent augmentation of the power of the Government in enabling them, under cover of the supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign, to withdraw from the cognizance and control of this House matters relating to policy and expenditure properly within the scope of its powers and privileges, it is necessary that the mode and limits of the action of the Prerogative should be more strictly observed."

MR. COURTNEY, in rising to second the Motion, said, he thought it must, at all events, be plain to the House that the desire of his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) was not in any way to move a Vote of Censure against the Crown. The Motion was directed solely against Her Majesty's Government. Those who approved the course taken by the hon. Member for Swansea would be false to the object which they had in view, if they were to direct their censure in any other quarter. He held that the language of the hon. Member's original Motion, which had been thought by some to suggest that the Sovereign protruded herself into affairs of State, was identical in meaning with the Motion before the House, which was a Motion of condemnation of Her Majesty's Ministers, and nothing more. They wished to bring home to Her Majesty's Government the responsibility for what had happened—for the weakening which Constitutional guarantees had suffered from their policy. The maxim, "The Queen can do no wrong," had been sometimes spoken of as a mere fiction; but he regarded it as a Constitutional principle of the highest importance; for if once it came to be admitted that wrong could be brought home to the Crown, they would have to divert their action from a quarter in which it might be useful, and waste their powers in attacking that which by its very nature was invulnerable. Precedents existed, showing what were the views of high authorities with regard to the responsibility of Ministers. In 1807, after the death of Mr. Fox, in consequence of a pledge supposed to have been given by the new Ministry to the King not to raise the Catholic question, a Motion was proposed in the House by a Gentleman bearing a name that had always been honoured—Mr. Brand—asserting that it was contrary to the first duties of the confidential Servants of the Crown to restrain themselves by any pledge, expressed or implied, from offering to the King such advice as circumstances might render necessary for the welfare and security of the Empire. That Resolution was supported by Sir Samuel Romilly, Mr. Whitbread, Lord Howick, and other Gentlemen equally eminent in the House of Commons, and a similar Motion in the House of Lords received the support of Lord Erskine. The objection was made, then, that the Resolution was an attack upon the Sovereign; and in the course of the debate a speech was made by a distinguished person—Mr. Plunket, the Attorney General for Ireland—who warmly defended himself and those who were in favour of the Motion against the imputation that it was wished to attach blame to the King, for whom he had the highest respect. The precedent was further important, because it was argued by Mr. Percival, the then Prime Minister, that although it was quite true that every act of the Crown must be vouched for by a responsible

Mr. Dillwyn

Minister, yet in the interim between successive Ministries the action of the Crown was necessarily independent, and whatever was done then was beyond Parliamentary criticism, and could not be made the subject of a Vote of Censure on the Ministers. If that argument had been allowed, it would have done away altogether with the responsibility of Ministers; but although the House of Commons, by a small majority, rejected Mr. Brand's Motion, that argument was distinctly repudiated in 1835, when Sir Robert Peel came into Office. He was summoned from Rome, and a considerable interval intervened between the dismissal of Lord Melbourne and the acceptance by Sir Robert Peel of the Seals of Office; but his first act was to accept the responsibility of what had been done in the interregnum, including the dismissal of Lord Melbourne. No interval could at all be allowed, even in imagination, to interpose between the responsibility of one Ministry and another. These instances proved that, under no circumstances, could the Crown itself commit an act which could be the subject of censure or blame. It might be said that he had been referring to what were elementary truths; but it was necessary to remind hon. Members of the elementary truths of Constitutional principles in these days, when they were not altogether "understood of the people." He ventured to say that the opinion which was held in some quarters, that the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) was a Vote of Censure on the Crown, could only be entertained by those who had lost sight of elementary truths. A writer, to whose merits the Chancellor of the Exchequer had paid a just tribute (Mr. Bagehot), had said that if a gentleman attempted to explain to his servants the phrase "The Queen reigns, but does not govern," he would find they did not understand his language. It would seem as if the ignorance of the kitchen had invaded the House of Commons. A Vote of Censure on the Crown was an absurdity, because such a Vote would contradict the principle that the Crown was above responsibility. His hon. Friend attacked the Ministry because he held that they had protruded the name and authority of the Queen, so as to obtain undue power through the respect due to her name; and because they had initiated and pursued great lines of policy in comparative independence of one another, thus minimizing the collective judgment, the collective authority, and the collective responsibility of the Cabinet, and also minimizing the control of the House. As to the first question, of the undue use of the name and authority of the Crown, no one, he supposed, would follow the example of Wolsey and say, "Ego et Rex meus," in order to push himself forward; but Ministers might change the form of the phrase and say, "Regina mea et ego," in order to shield themselves from criticism. The true function of the Crown was thus laid down by the high authority to whom he had already referred (Mr. Bagehot)—

"The Sovereign has, under a Constitutional Monarchy such as ours, three rights—the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn."

Not one of these rights suggested the power of initiation. The first two had reference to the action of the Ministers, the third to warning given against action taken by the Ministry. The writer added—"and a King of good sense and sagacity would want no other." Another high authority said—

"A Constitutional Government insures to the King a wide authority in all the councils of the State. He chooses and dismisses his Ministers. Their resolutions upon every important measure of foreign and domestic policy are submitted to his approval; and when that approval is withheld, his Ministers must either abandon their policy or resign their office. They are responsible to the King on the one hand, and to Parliament on the other; and while they retain the confidence of the King by administering affairs to his satisfaction, they must act upon principles and propose measures which they can justify to Parliament. And here is the proper limit to the King's influence."

Such were the words of the learned gentleman (Sir Erskine May) who sat at that Table. Then, again, as the Crown had no power of initiation, the Crown must not be put forward as having used it. It must not be suggested that the Crown had a policy of its own which had been adopted by the Ministry instead of being put forward by the Ministry and sanctioned by the Crown. If the Ministry accept suggestions from the Crown, they must do so on condition of making them their own, and merging their origin in themselves. All this sprung from the principle that the Crown could never take responsibility upon itself. They saw that in the dark, and could only be proved by notoriety of the fact. In the present case there was certain ground for believing, as he (Mr. Dillwyn) had shown, that the control of Parliament had been evaded. The country had been involved in troubles which he thought might have been avoided had Parliament been consulted; but Parliament had not been consulted, and the consequence was additional wars and increased expenditure. He would appeal to the House to say whether either the information obtained had not been misleading, or had been withheld from Parliament, since their information had been procured from other sources? He did not wish to reopen old sores; but he did desire to do what he could to stop the progress of the system of Departmental Government. He wished to see the advice of the Cabinet given to the Crown, and not the advice of a single Minister, so that we might have the responsibility of the whole Cabinet, and not that of any individual. In bringing this question before the House, he was only anxious to assert the Privileges of Parliament, which were being invaded, and, in doing so, he believed most conscientiously that he was doing his duty as a loyal Member of the House, and in the interests of the country as well as of the Crown itself. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving—

“That, to prevent the growing abuse by Her Majesty’s Ministers of the Prerogative and influence of the Crown, and consequent augmentation of the power of the Government in enabling them, under cover of the supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign, to withdraw from the cognizance and control of this House matters relating to policy and expenditure properly within the scope of its powers and privileges, it is necessary that the mode and limits of the action of the Prerogative should be more strictly observed.”

MR. COURTNEY, in rising to second the Motion, said, he thought it must, at all events, be plain to the House that the desire of his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) was not in any way to move a Vote of Censure against the Crown. The Motion was directed solely against Her Majesty’s Government. Those who approved the course taken by the hon. Member for Swansea would be false to the object which they had in view, if they were to direct their censure in any other quarter. He held that the language of the hon. Member’s original Motion, which had been thought by some to suggest that the Sovereign protruded herself into affairs of State, was identical in meaning with the Motion before the House, which was a Motion of condemnation of Her Majesty’s Ministers, and nothing more. They wished to bring home to Her Majesty’s Government the responsibility for what had happened—for the weakening which Constitutional guarantees had suffered from their policy. The maxim, “The Queen can do no wrong,” had been sometimes spoken of as a mere fiction; but he regarded it as a Constitutional principle of the highest importance; for if once it came to be admitted that wrong could be brought home to the Crown, they would have to divert their action from a quarter in which it might be useful, and waste their powers in attacking that which by its very nature was invulnerable. Precedents existed, showing what were the views of high authorities with regard to the responsibility of Ministers. In 1807, after the death of Mr. Fox, in consequence of a pledge supposed to have been given by the new Ministry to the King not to raise the Catholic question, a Motion was proposed in the House by a Gentleman bearing a name that had always been honoured—Mr. Brand—asserting that it was contrary to the first duties of the confidential Servants of the Crown to restrain themselves by any pledge, expressed or implied, from offering to the King such advice as circumstances might render necessary for the welfare and security of the Empire. That Resolution was supported by Sir Samuel Romilly, Mr. Whitbread, Lord Howick, and other Gentlemen equally eminent in the House of Commons, and a similar Motion in the House of Lords received the support of Lord Erskine. The objection was made, then, that the Resolution was an attack upon the Sovereign; and in the course of the debate a speech was made by a distinguished person—Mr. Plunket, the Attorney General for Ireland—who warmly defended himself and those who were in favour of the Motion against the imputation that it was wished to attach blame to the King, for whom he had the highest respect. The precedent was further important, because it was argued by Mr. Percival, the then Prime Minister, that although it was quite true that every act of the Crown must be vouched for by a responsible

Mr. Dillwyn

Minister, yet in the interim between successive Ministries the action of the Crown was necessarily independent, and whatever was done then was beyond Parliamentary criticism, and could not be made the subject of a Vote of Censure on the Ministers. If that argument had been allowed, it would have done away altogether with the responsibility of Ministers; but although the House of Commons, by a small majority, rejected Mr. Brand's Motion, that argument was distinctly repudiated in 1835, when Sir Robert Peel came into Office. He was summoned from Rome, and a considerable interval intervened between the dismissal of Lord Melbourne and the acceptance by Sir Robert Peel of the Seals of Office; but his first act was to accept the responsibility of what had been done in the interregnum, including the dismissal of Lord Melbourne. No interval could at all be allowed, even in imagination, to interpose between the responsibility of one Ministry and another. These instances proved that, under no circumstances, could the Crown itself commit an act which could be the subject of censure or blame. It might be said that he had been referring to what were elementary truths; but it was necessary to remind hon. Members of the elementary truths of Constitutional principles in these days, when they were not altogether "understood of the people." He ventured to say that the opinion which was held in some quarters, that the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) was a Vote of Censure on the Crown, could only be entertained by those who had lost sight of elementary truths. A writer, to whose merits the Chancellor of the Exchequer had paid a just tribute (Mr. Bagehot), had said that if a gentleman attempted to explain to his servants the phrase "The Queen reigns, but does not govern," he would find they did not understand his language. It would seem as if the ignorance of the kitchen had invaded the House of Commons. A Vote of Censure on the Crown was an absurdity, because such a Vote would contradict the principle that the Crown was above responsibility. His hon. Friend attacked the Ministry because he held that they had protruded the name and authority of the Queen, so as to obtain undue power through the respect due to her name; and because they had initiated and pursued great lines of policy in comparative independence of one another, thus minimizing the collective judgment, the collective authority, and the collective responsibility of the Cabinet, and also minimizing the control of the House. As to the first question, of the undue use of the name and authority of the Crown, no one, he supposed, would follow the example of Wolsey and say, "Ego et Rex meus," in order to push himself forward; but Ministers might change the form of the phrase and say, "Regina mea et ego," in order to shield themselves from criticism. The true function of the Crown was thus laid down by the high authority to whom he had already referred (Mr. Bagehot)—

"The Sovereign has, under a Constitutional Monarchy such as ours, three rights—the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn."

Not one of these rights suggested the power of initiation. The first two had reference to the action of the Ministers, the third to warning given against action taken by the Ministry. The writer added—"and a King of good sense and sagacity would want no other." Another high authority said—

"A Constitutional Government insures to the King a wide authority in all the councils of the State. He chooses and dismisses his Ministers. Their resolutions upon every important measure of foreign and domestic policy are submitted to his approval; and when that approval is withheld, his Ministers must either abandon their policy or resign their office. They are responsible to the King on the one hand, and to Parliament on the other; and while they retain the confidence of the King by administering affairs to his satisfaction, they must act upon principles and propose measures which they can justify to Parliament. And here is the proper limit to the King's influence."

Such were the words of the learned gentleman (Sir Erskine May) who sat at that Table. Then, again, as the Crown had no power of initiation, the Crown must not be put forward as having used it. It must not be suggested that the Crown had a policy of its own which had been adopted by the Ministry instead of being put forward by the Ministry and sanctioned by the Crown. If the Ministry accept suggestions from the Crown, they must do so on condition of making them their own, and merging their origin in themselves. All this sprung from the principle that the Crown could never take responsibility upon itself. They saw that in the Royal pledge with respect to the Catholic claims, the responsibility of which rested upon the Ministry. There was another illustration of great interest in this matter, and that was the action taken at the close of the Great War by the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister. At the close of the Great War the then Czar proposed a "holy alliance" between the victor Kings—himself, the Emperor of Austria, the King of Prussia, and the Prince Regent, and he wrote an autograph letter to the Prince, inviting him to sign the necessary Treaty. In what way did the then Foreign Secretary and Prime Minister deal with that matter? Lord Castlereagh wrote thus to Lord Liverpool—

"Upon the whole this is what may be called a scrape. . . . I am desired by the Emperor of Austria, through Metternich, to express his earnest hope that the Prince will not refuse himself to this overture. . . . My own opinion very much concurs with that of His Imperial Majesty, and in weighing difficulties on both sides I think no person will blame the Prince for not refusing assent himself to a proposition so made to him. But I think the Prince must take it upon himself, and sign it, without the intervention of his Ministers, as an autographic avowal of sentiment between him and the Sovereigns his allies, tending to preserve the tranquillity of Europe. To decline doing so might produce very unpleasant consequences."

Lord Liverpool, in his reply, said—

"It is quite impossible to advise the Prince to sign the act of accession which has been transmitted to him. Such a step would be inconsistent with all the forms and principles of our government, and would subject those who advised it to a very serious responsibility. . . . Nothing is more clear than that the King or Regent of Great Britain can be a party to no act of State personally; he can only be a party to it through the instrumentality of others who are responsible for it."

Well, these were illustrations of the principles he wished to lay down in confirmation of what he had said as to the necessity of action originating with the Ministry and not with the Crown. He would next touch upon the necessity of collective action on the part of Ministers. The action of an individual Minister was not sufficient to substantiate every nominal action of the Crown. The advice given to the Crown must be that of the Ministry collectively. Upon that point, he would quote the opinion of an eminent authority on Constitutional Law—

"All correspondence between the Sovereign and a subordinate Minister should be submitted to the Premier; if not beforehand, at any rate immediately after it has taken place. . . . Until Ministers have come to an understanding as to the advice they will tender to their Sovereign upon any given occasion it would be premature for them to communicate with the Crown thereon. The Premier himself is under no obligation, either of duty or of courtesy, to confer with the Sovereign upon any matter which is still under the consideration of the Cabinet."

The House would remember what took place when the present Government were last in Office. In the year 1867 the present Prime Minister threw upon the Crown, instead of taking upon himself, the responsibility of deciding whether or not there should be a Dissolution after a hostile vote of that House. But as to the necessity of collectivity of action, he would refer to the action taken by Lord Chatham in 1810. Lord Chatham, who was a Member of the Cabinet as well as a Peer, came back from his expedition to the Scheldt, drew up a Memorandum of his proceedings, and, going to a Levée, gave it to the King. It remained in the hands of His Majesty some time. Lord Chatham desired to make an alteration in it, received it back, made the alteration, and again handed it to the King, who, after a time, handed it to the Secretary of State. What was the result of Lord Chatham's proceeding? A Motion was made in the House of Commons by Mr. Whitbread, censuring the transaction, and the House approved the Motion by a large majority, after a discussion, which lasted, the record stated, till half-past 6 in the morning. Mr. Canning, who was not then in Office, spoke, and supported the Motion of Censure, although it was urged that Chatham, as a Peer, might demand an audience of the King, and that, as a responsible Minister of the Crown, he was entitled to act upon his responsibility. The House of Commons, however, held that the document should have reached the King through the collective Cabinet, and not as the result of individual dealing between the Crown and an individual Minister. The case which occurred under Lord Liverpool's Administration in 1825 was, perhaps, even more remarkable. The Cabinet having drawn up a Memorandum on the subject of the action to be taken in reference to the Spanish Colonies, which had revolted, the King endeavoured to obtain from the Members of the Cabinet separately their opinions on the question. But the Cabinet, in reply, humbly requested the King's permission to give their answer generally and collectively, although they admitted that among themselves differences of opinion existed. The manner in which Lord Palmerston's expression of his individual opinion on the coup d'état of 1851 was regarded might also be taken as a case in point. Throughout the whole range of English politics, in fact, one principle prevailed—namely, that there should be no sheltering of the action of Ministers under the name of the Crown, and that the action of Ministers should be collective and not individual. That the authority of this principle had been infringed of recent years his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had produced abundant evidence to show. His case might, perhaps, be lacking in the precision which was insisted upon in a Court of Law; but that was inevitable from the nature of the case, for they were dealing with action which was impalpable, half concealed, and half revealed. The very manner in which Ministers had treated Questions which had been addressed to them on this subject—the apparent assumption on their part that the principles of the Constitution were only to be regarded as musty, fusty phrases—was in itself a sufficient justification for the Motion now before the House. There were several instances in which similar Motions had been brought forward, and he would ask the House to consider how this question of evidence had been considered. When Mr. Fox's Indian Bill was before the House of Lords, a Memorandum, to the effect that the King would regard as his friends those who voted against the Bill, was taken about and shown to different Peers. Thereupon a rumour arose, and a Motion was made in the House of Commons by Mr. Baker in the following terms:—

Mr. Courtney

“That it is now necessary to declare that to report any opinion, or pretended opinion, of His Majesty upon any Bill or other proceeding” (and, of course, any line of policy, Indian or Colonial) “depending in either House of Parliament, with a view to influence the votes of its Members, is a high crime and misdemeanour, derogatory to the Crown, a breach of the fundamental privileges of Parliament, and subversive of the Constitution of the country.”

And how did Mr. Pitt meet that Motion? He asked—

“Was it founded on any positive facts, either proved or stated? No. . . . Upon what was the mighty grievance complained of supposed to depend? Not on any misdemeanour substantiated to the satisfaction of the House by any sort of evidence whatever, but on the vague surmises or lies of the day.”

Mr. Pitt allowed himself to use that language, although he knew it was perfectly true that the Memorandum had been circulated; but such a line of defence Mr. Fox treated with scorn, as one unbecoming a Minister, and disrespectful to the House. In all such cases, in fact, the supporters of the Motion held that it was not necessary to substantiate their case with the same minuteness as a prosecutor in a Court of Law. Had no breaches of the principles of the Constitution been committed? He was afraid that, in perfect innocence, a great many had been committed from time to time. He saw before him at that moment a noble Lord who was very busily engaged in what was an undoubted breach of the Constitution. They would all be sorry if anything serious should happen to that noble Lord; but, without knowing it, he was exposing himself to the very gravest censure. [Laughter.] Somebody laughed. But he would read an extract from Sir Erskine May's work, which would perhaps explain what he had said—

“The privileges of Parliament,” said Sir Erskine, “were systematically violated by the King (George III). In order to guard against the arbitrary interference of the Crown in its proceedings, Parliament had established, for centuries, the Constitutional doctrine that the King should not hear or give credit to reports of its debates. . . . yet during the proceedings of the Commons against Wilkes, the King obtained from Mr. Grenville the most minute and circumstantial reports.”

It was a true and sound Constitutional principle that the Crown should know only of the collective action of Parliament—that it should know nothing of the action of individual Members of that House to guide it in the distribution of its favours. Of course, it might not be true that the noble Lord he referred to took notes of the proceedings of that House for transmission elsewhere; but such was the rumour. Now, about the breaches of Constitutional principles. Was not the conclusion of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, without any previous communication being made to Parliament, a stretching of the Prerogative and a derogation of the power and authority of that House? In fact, Parliament was committed to a certain course before it could say aye or no. And could not the same be said of the bringing of the Indian troops to Malta? When asked a Question in reference to alleged lengthy communications between the Crown and the Viceroy of India, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said there might have been private communications—such things had happened before, and might happen again; but he showed no anxiety whatever as to whether the Constitution had been trenchanted upon; he treated it as a matter of no importance, and in doing so he was supported by the cheers of Members about him. If Lord Chatham, being a Cabinet Minister, was not permitted to have individual correspondence with the Crown, would it have been permitted at that time for the Viceroy of Ireland to have had particular and confidential communications with the Crown upon the progress of affairs in that country? Would not such conduct a fortiori have been open to the censure passed upon that of Lord Chatham? Ought not a similar censure to attach to the conduct of the Viceroy of India now? At least, it was surely the duty of the Ministers of the Crown, if they were jealous for the maintenance of the Constitution, to have ascertained from the Viceroy something more as to the nature of the correspondence with the Sovereign. It was admitted that a communication was made to Lord Chelmsford upon the authority of a single Member of the Cabinet, and it was confessed that in that instance the collective action and responsibility of the Cabinet were abandoned. The annexation of the Transvaal was made by a stretch of the Prerogative absolutely unprecedented. A Commission was given to Sir Theophilus Shepstone from the Sovereign, who was then in the Highlands; it was countersigned by Lord Carnarvon; and under that Commission the Transvaal was annexed, without any warning, or even suggestion, to Parliament that such a thing would be done. But it was done, and this country had been saddled with a weight to an extent of which they now did not know. Contrast that with the annexation of Fiji, which was pressed upon that House by the worthy Member for Lambeth (Mr. Alderman M'Arthur), was discussed, and almost approved before it was effected. It had been pleaded that there was a parallelism between the conduct of our agents abroad and that of the agents of the Czar in Central Asia, by whom the Czar himself was overreached; but there were no Constitutional relations between the Czar and his people, and such a parallelism was a confession that in our case the Constitution had been abandoned. When a question was raised as to the bringing over of the Indian troops, the noble Lord, now the President of the Board of Trade, and also the Under Secretary of State for India, argued that if there had been any suggestion of what was intended there would have been interminable debates, and every difficulty would have been thrown in the way of the Ministry; and that argument simply meant that the checks of the Constitution and the control of that House must be got rid of in order that the Government might be free to work their own will. These facts were sufficient of themselves to justify the alarm that was felt, especially when they were accentuated by the conduct of the Prime Minister in 1867. Instead of submitting to the Crown a distinct resolution of the Cabinet, he put two courses before the Crown, offering to adopt that which was preferred, and thus threw upon the Crown the responsibility of an important decision. The Prime Minister did not understand Constitutional principles as they had been understood by a series of statesmen. There was published in 1835, in a letter to a noble and learned Lord, a Vindication of the English Constitution, by Disraeli the younger, which was well worthy of being reprinted and carefully studied, for it had disappeared from public notice, and he had been able to obtain it only from the library of the Cambridge University. It showed the opinions then entertained by the present Prime Minister on the relations between the Crown, the Ministry, and Parliament. Speaking of the advent of William III. to the Throne, the author said—

“Here, then (under William III.), commences the age when the influence of the Court rapidly declined, when Ministers were virtually appointed by the Parliament instead of the Sovereign, and when, by the institution of the Cabinet, the scheme and policy of the Administration devolved upon a Parliamentary Committee, and the King was, in fact, excluded from his own Council.”

Mr. Courtney

[“Hear, hear!”] The noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) apparently regretted that change; but the whole question was whether it was to be regretted or approved, and it was generally approved; but, in 1835, the Prime Minister evidently thought it was a change to be regretted. In the pamphlet he further said that George I., unsupported by the mass of the people, and ignorant of our language, was entirely dependent upon the Whig Peers, who resolved to compensate themselves by establishing the Cabinet on its present basis. It was added—

“It is curious to trace the Kingly office from the era of the Plantagenets, when the characters of a Royal Council and a Legislative Chamber were so blended together in the House of Lords that the Monarch always presided over his Parliament, to the moment when the Sovereign under the Brunswicks was virtually excluded from his own Council.”—[P. 170.]

Again, an opinion was hinted, though, perhaps, it was not completely stated. Coming down to George III., the author said—

“It was the clear sense and the strong spirit of his able grandson—George III.—that emancipated this country from the government of ‘the great families.’ The King put himself at the head of the nation, and, encouraged by the example of a popular Monarch in George III., and a democratic Minister in Mr. Pitt, the nation elevated to power the Tory or National Party of England, under whose comprehensive and consistent, vigorous and strictly democratic system, this island has become——”—[P. 173.]

[Cheers.] If he was to understand that cheer as an approval given to George III., in emancipating himself from the control of his Cabinet, he recognized in it another ground for the Motion of his hon. Friend. There was another extract, which, with the permission of the House, he would read, which was conclusive as to the view of the Prime Minister of the present situation. This was written after Lord Melbourne was dismissed by William IV., and, of course, the question arose what was the view of the Prime Minister with reference to it. The quotation was this—

“Let us hope that our Gracious Sovereign may take warning from the first of his house that ruled these realms, and follow the example of George III. rather than George I.”

The present Prime Minister was then young and only entering into public life, but he had formed his opinion deliberately; he had consistently maintained it, and to a large extent had endeavoured to carry it out in the government of the country—namely, the destruction of the collective authority of the Cabinet and the elevation of the authority of a particular Minister and the augmentation of the power of the Crown. That was the idea of the present Prime Minister. If these were called “musty phrases,” he might quote later writings to show that what he then said had been consistently manifested since. When the question came to be considered by the historian, the anomaly must surely present itself how, in the Reign of the Queen who had ruled for 40 years with universal satisfaction to her subjects, regarding most carefully and attentively every Constitutional principle, an alarm was suddenly raised that the guarantees of the Constitution were being sapped, and the authority of the Cabinet overthrown, a single Minister using the name and authority of the Sovereign, that Minister having throughout his career held Constitutional principles which led up to that change. His fear was not a fear of any real resuscitation of the power of the Crown. He believed the controversy on the part of the Crown for the supremacy of the will of the individual wearer of the Crown had long since been closed. What he feared was a democratic power being raised under the forms of an autocratic authority. What he feared was lest the power of the First Minister should be aggrandized by transmutation. He believed no Minister of the Crown could possibly hold Office now who did not command the support of a majority of the House. The experiment made by William IV., in dismissing Lord Melbourne, could not be successfully imitated. But what were the checks on the Minister of the Crown supported by a majority? Was there any check against the abuse of the Prerogative when the Minister had a majority at his back? He might neglect and override all these checks. He came to the discussion of this question from no motive of Party; and, therefore, he had no hesitation in referring to the instance of a Prime Minister who, having a majority, had used the Prerogative to bring about a great change, overriding the authority of the other House of Parliament. [“Hear, hear!”] But did those who disapproved of that use of the Prerogative do so because they disliked unconstitutional action, or because they disliked the end effected? Was there no danger the same authority might again be used in a way they did not like? That was a precedent to which he freely referred, in order to show the real danger with which they were now threatened—the danger of a Minister, disregarding Constitutional checks, misusing the name and authority of the Crown to carry out his individual policy. It had been said by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) that he was an old Whig. Well, he also was an old Whig; and it was on the ground of affection for the principle of the Constitution, as settled from the beginning of the present century, of maintaining the authority of a collective Cabinet, and a collective Cabinet only, and restricting the action of the Crown in the direction at which he had pointed, that he should support the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea. He did so, because he was anxious to guard against the realization in the future of what the present Prime Minister had described as the policy of the Tory Party, but what he should rather describe as the triumph of unchecked Democracy, reflecting the prejudices and the passions as well as the moderation and reason of the nation, and brought into power with a majority which would assuredly not always belong to the Conservative Party. He begged to second the Resolution of his hon. Friend.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That to prevent the growing abuse by Her Majesty's Ministers of the prerogative and influence of the Crown, and consequent augmentation of the power of the Government in enabling them, under cover of the supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign, to withdraw from the cognizance and control of this House matters relating to policy and expenditure properly within the scope of its powers and privileges, it is necessary that the mode and limits of the action of the prerogative should be more strictly observed."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. SPEAKER having read the Motion,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, MR. GLADSTONE, and LORD ROBERT MONTAGU rose together; but the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER resumed his seat.

MR. SPEAKER called on Mr. GLADSTONE.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: I rise to Order. [Mr. GLADSTONE resumed his seat.] About six weeks ago, I gave Notice of an Amendment to the Motion of the hon. Member for Swansea. By giving Notice of an Amendment a Member is supposed to secure the opportunity of immediately following the Seconder of the Motion. I have to ask you, Sir, whether it is in accordance with the Rules and Orders of the House, as it certainly is not in accordance with the custom and usages of it, for any Member to interpose between the Mover of a Motion and the Mover of an Amendment of which Notice has been given? If it is the Rule and Order of the House, all our balloting and all our giving Notices will be simply a farce, because if that priority is gone once it is gone for ever.

MR. SPEAKER: There is no Order of the House on the subject. When several hon. Members rise to address the Chair, the first who catches the eye of the Speaker is called upon; and as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich caught my eye first, I call upon him to proceed.

MR. GLADSTONE rose to speak.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: I rise, Sir, to Order. You told me, Sir, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was about to address the House after the Mover and Seconder had concluded. ["Chair, Chair!" "Order, order!"] I am going to ask a Question as to Order. I arranged with you, Sir—["Order, order!"]—

MR. CHAPLIN: Sir, I rise to Order.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: I have risen to Order.

MR. SPEAKER: Is the noble Lord speaking to a point of Order? If so, the noble Lord is entitled to be heard.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: Yes, Sir, I am. I arranged with you, Sir, that I should rise at the same time with the Chancellor of the Exchequer—

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord is now referring to communications between himself and myself before this debate came on. It is not usual to take that course. At the same time, if the noble Lord, acting on his own discretion, thinks right to do so, I have no objection.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: I am much obliged to you, Sir. I agreed with you that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer should rise to speak, I would sit down. I did not wish to stand in the way of his reply, although I understood that the Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to squelch the debate. The

Mr. Courtney

Chancellor of the Exchequer did not rise when the Seconder of the Motion sat down; but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich leaned across the Table and said to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "Will you rise?" and the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, "No; do you;" and then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich rose, and was called upon to speak; and I think it is quite unfair—"Order, order!"

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord is not now addressing himself to a point of Order. If he wishes to raise the point, he can do so now.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: Very well, Sir. The only Question I wished to ask is, whether it is competent that any Member who has given Notice of an Amendment to a Motion should be preceded by a Member who has not given any such Notice?

MR. SPEAKER: It is quite competent for him to be so preceded, if he was not the first to catch my eye. There is no Rule that gives precedence to an hon. Member who has given Notice of an Amendment.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I can assure the noble Lord that on a question of Order I have not the slightest disposition to object to his mode of vindicating it, or to do anything that can possibly impair it. My anxiety to say a few words to the House without delay is an anxiety that I can very easily explain. In fact, my object is obvious, and it will explain itself in the course of the few observations I have to make. Of course, if, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, who are attacked and arraigned by the present Motion, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thought fit to rise just now, his was a claim with which I could not have thought for a moment of standing in competition. But I am one of those who desire now to say the little they have to say, because I am not, like the noble Lord, prepared to enter upon the discussion of this question upon its merits; and I am one of those who heartily concur in the spirit and contention of the appeal made before the debate began by my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). It did, undoubtedly, appear to me that, under the almost unparalleled circumstances attending the history and production of this Motion, it was hardly desirable that a matter involving considerations of so high and serious an order should be pressed, and the question brought before the House for discussion, with only a few hours of Notice. What I would observe is this—We have had, as the noble Lord has truly stated, on the Paper for many weeks a Notice of a Motion to be proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), not involving a direct Censure, though probably carrying an indirect Censure, upon Her Majesty's Government, but presenting to us as the primary and proper subject for our consideration the very important and delicate question how far the direct and personal interposition of the Sovereign in affairs of policy is admissible or desirable, or otherwise. Sir, upon that question, it would have been my duty to place at the service and command of the House any knowledge which the means of observation in my former experience and a long Parliamentary life might have afforded. Of course, I would have been prepared to state to the House the reasons which induced me to believe—though perfectly conscious of the loyalty and public spirit of the hon. Member for Swansea—that the terms of his Motion could not be justified or sustained. That was undoubtedly the opinion that I should have endeavoured to support, and to support by reference to many matters of fact of such a nature that I think that even my hon. Friend himself would not be disposed to withstand the force of the arguments which would have been used against his proposition. But now, Sir, upon the Notice Paper this morning—for I had not the good fortune to hear what took place yesterday afternoon, not being very well—we have presented to us a proposition which alters, as it appears to me, for every practical purpose, the entire front of the case. The question of the direct interposition of the Crown is, indeed, referred to in the Motion that is now before us, because there is, it appears, or there has been, a supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign; but it is only introduced parenthetically, and apparently is a part of the Motion which is only considered secondary by the Mover, whereas the Motion is changed substantially into a direct and sweeping Vote of Censure upon Her Majesty's Government, involving the retracing of all the ground that we have trodden during the discussions of the present and the last Sessions, and calling on the House for a verdict of condemnation. Now, I must say I think I have not been backward in making complaints, whether they were right or whether they were wrong, of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in respect to the Privileges of Parliament; but really, in censuring the Administration, I do feel that some considerations of external propriety of Parliamentary usage should be regarded, and I am not ready, upon the production on Tuesday morning of a Vote of Censure upon the Government, to appear in my place on Tuesday evening and support that Vote of Censure. But that is not the only thing which makes me believe that this proposal is out of place on the present occasion. I have heard the interesting historical disquisition of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney); and I am sorry that that obliges me, parenthetically, to refer to his assault upon myself. In order to attain his paramount purpose of proving his own superiority to Party considerations, he has found it necessary to refer to what occurred in the last Parliament. [Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: Hear, hear!] My hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea approves of the same thing, and what I shall say will apply to the one as well as to the other. Both these hon. Gentlemen, in their desire for lofty impartiality, have severely condemned the exercise of the Prerogative by which Purchase was abolished in the Army. I have not the smallest objection to that condemnation, if their minds lead them to that judgment upon an important action taken at an important crisis. But I did not detect, from the speeches of either or both hon. Gentlemen, that they were in the slightest degree aware of the ground of that exercise of the Prerogative. Now, the ground of that exercise of the Prerogative was this—and it is necessary that there should now be said what was said at the time, but apparently it has not found a place in the recollection of either of them. The ground for the exercise of that Prerogative was this—It had been brought to the knowledge, not only of the Government, but of Parliament and of the entire community, that there was bound up with the working of the system of Purchase a system of grave and flagrant illegality—an illegality, in many instances, mixed up with personal complications, but, at any rate, an illegality of the nature and character of which there was not the slightest doubt—an illegality which was imbedded in the system of extra-regimental prices for commissions; and that system was inseparable from the system of Purchase. It was to put a stop to an illegality, and for no other purpose, that the Prerogative of the Crown was exercised. I will not now go into the question whether that was a sufficient reason or not. It did not appear to be a reason in the slightest degree within the cognizance of either of these hon. Gentlemen. I am sorry that neither the hon. Member for Chelsea, nor any other hon. Gentleman, made that exercise of the Prerogative the ground of a question in this House at the time when they might have been fairly discussed, and the arguments on both sides fairly urged. It would not be desirable for me to detain the House by entering at length into the subject; but after what fell from the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), it was impossible for me to pass it over altogether. What I would say to the Motion of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) is this. I do not know whether any Amendment will be moved; but I assume that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to meet the Motion with a direct negative. I must say, for myself, that it is entirely impossible for me to enter into any discussion of the Motion; but I think that the making of such a Motion, under such circumstances, is so entirely contrary to all the Rules of Parliamentary procedure, that I entirely decline—I am compelled to decline, with the utmost respect for my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, than whom there is not a more upright man in the House—all participation in this debate. The Motion is not, indeed, one on the construction and meaning of the terms of which I should be disposed dogmatically to pronounce. I find that there is a “Growing abuse by Her Majesty's Ministers of the Prerogative and influence of the Crown, and consequent augmentation of the power of the Government in enabling”

Her Majesty's Government to do something; but what that “enabling” is, or what it is that “enables” them, I do not know. Whether it is the abuse of the Prerogative, or whether it is the augmentation of the power of the Government, or whether it is the personal intervention of the Sovereign, I am not perfectly clear about on reading the sentence, and, consequently, I speak on that point with submission and with reserve. But one thing I say is, that while this Motion asserts—and asserts as I believe truly—that there has been an undue use of the Prerogative by the Government, I do not see why it connects that use of the Prerogative with the supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign. Now, there is no connection whatever, so far as I know, between them. But this business of the undue use of the Prerogative is a proposition which we have sifted and bolted down to the bran on former occasions. As far as I know, we frankly assailed the Government on this subject with reference to the subject of the Indian troops. We asserted it with respect to the Anglo-Turkish Convention; we asserted it with respect to the suppression or withholding of the history of the Afghan negotiations before the Afghan War; and we asserted it, in some degree, with respect to what is called the Salisbury-Schouvaloff Convention. We made our case; but not in any one of those instances was it attempted to establish the slightest connection between abuses, real or supposed, of which we complained and the intervention of the Sovereign. Therefore, to assert that the practices which we complained of have been carried on under cover of the supposed interposition of the Crown—which we never alleged, or attempted to allege—entirely prevents me from giving my support to the Motion, or entering into any of those wide general principles which I entirely admit to be involved. I must, likewise, say this—that I think it is hard, under the circumstances, to propose a Vote such as this against Her Majesty's Government, when I consider what has taken place. We complained of the policy of the Government in the case of the Afghan War; we complained of it in the case of the Anglo-Turkish Convention; we complained of it in the case of the Indian troops; but the policy of Her Majesty's Government in every one of these cases was sustained by large majorities in this House. After it has been so sustained, if I am to ask the majority of this House to pass a Vote of Censure, I will ask it to pass a Vote of Censure, not upon Her Majesty's Government, but upon itself. I will frame my Motion, and it would be a fair Parliamentary proceeding, in such a way as to make it a Vote of Censure by the majority of this House upon its own proceedings. Undoubtedly, the majority of this House have lifted off the shoulders of Her Majesty's Government the main responsibility for what we consider to be invasions of the Prerogative of the Crown. We have a right, a perfectly justifiable right, to complain to our constituents and to the country. We shall take an opportunity, when the Constitution gives it, of appealing to the nation with regard to that method of proceeding. But I must say it would be rather hard to stigmatize, by a Vote of Censure, the growing abuse by Her Majesty's Ministers of the Prerogative and influence of the Crown, when every part and portion of this abuse, as we allege it to be, is an abuse which has received the sanction, the warm sanction, of the majority of this House, including, in some cases, the partial approval of those who belong to the Liberal Party in this House. Under these circumstances, I must say I think it is quite impossible for me to enter upon a discussion of the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea. I am extremely sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) did not succeed in the appeal which he made, as I thought most reasonably, to my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea. Even after the two or three hours' debate which we have had, I hardly know whether we are or whether we are not engaged in a serious discussion. It may be that there is a great deal of very interesting Constitutional lore in the speech of the Seconder of the Motion; but I am bound to say I find it extremely difficult to connect that lore with the terms of the Motion which is before us. There is no more interesting passage of history than the period of the discussions on the India Bill of Mr. Pitt, and of the marvellous conflict which he sustained in this House; but how in the world that is to be connected with the Resolution which we are invited to vote to-night, I must confess myself entirely at a loss to conceive. The doctrine and the lore of the Constitution have been searched, even including resources which, though they are not those of a Member of this House, yet, we rejoice to think, are in one and a very important sense the resources of this House. The doctrine of the time of Mr. Grenville in regard to the communication of the debates of this House to the Sovereign has been gravely and seriously adduced in a great debate on a Vote of Censure on the Government as a doctrine applicable to the present time, and some notes of my noble Friend opposite (Viscount Barrington), which, it is presumed, he was making for the purpose of a very effective reply, were referred to. I can conceive that this House might object to the communication of the details of its procedure to the Crown at a period when it objected to the communication of the details of its procedure to the nation. That was the doctrine of those times, and the practice was consistent. It would have been a false position for this House to have the details of its debates made known in private to the Sovereign while the nation was kept in ignorance; but can the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) really think that it should now be made an offence to communicate to the Sovereign the details of debates in the House of Commons which are made known to all persons throughout the country, from the Sovereign to her subjects, not only with the knowledge, but with the virtual approval of this House, by every newspaper in the Kingdom? I therefore must really decline to enter upon these high Constitutional matters on the present occasion—not because they are not serious, for they are of a most serious character—and it is because they are so serious that I grieve over the unhappy circumstances in which they are now brought into discussion. For my own part, even with the attractions which an opportunity of assailing Her Majesty's Government may be supposed to supply me with, I must respectfully demur to being called upon to assume any responsibility whatever in that matter. I assume at once that Her Majesty's Government will put a negative on this Motion. I cannot in the slightest degree complain of their taking such a course, when I find that from the matter contained in the Motion, and the mixture of allegations which are untimely with those which are absolutely incapable of being maintained, it is even impossible for me to give it my support.

Mr. Gladstone

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (who rose at the same time as Lord ROBERT MONTAGU) said: I can assure the noble Lord that I will not stand between him and the House for many minutes; but I think I owe some explanation to the House, after the observations of the noble Lord in regard to my not having risen immediately after the Motion was put. Undoubtedly it is true that I had communicated to some of my Friends my original intention to speak immediately after the Seconder; but the Motion was changed in so extraordinary a way that I thought it necessary to listen to the speeches in order to understand what was the meaning of the Motion submitted to the House. I confess that, difficult as I found it to construe that Motion as it stood on the Paper, I find it still more difficult to attach a meaning to it after hearing it explained by the hon. Gentleman. Considering, therefore, the great importance of the subject, which raised two fundamental Constitutional questions of this country—namely, the Prerogative of the Crown and the Privileges of Parliament—I thought it was only respectful that I should wait to see what the general feeling of the House on the subject might be. I agree with my right hon. Friend who spoke just now that we are placed in a position of considerable embarrassment and of great difficulty. The Motion has been turned into a Motion of Censure on the Government. To such a Motion we should wish, if possible, to move a direct negative. But we are in a difficulty in that respect. I do not desire to interfere with the freedom of any hon. Member, and I reserve any observations I may have to make till the close of the debate, if the debate is still to go on; but I may say now that we are prepared, on the ground that was originally taken in the Motion of the supposed interposition of the Sovereign in affairs of State, and upon that now taken, to challenge and deny any statement that has been made in any way, directly or indirectly, casting, or seeming to cast, any censure on the action of Her Majesty's Government. We are only embarrassed by the extreme feebleness and the shadowy character of the suggestions made of that kind. If more definite charges should be made hereafter, we shall be prepared most definitely and distinctly to meet them. With regard to a Vote of Censure upon ourselves, we shall be prepared, at the proper time, to meet that Vote of Censure by a direct negative.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, in rising to move the following Amendment:—

“That, by the Constitution and Laws of this Realm, it is the right and duty of the Sovereign, with the advice of the Council, and only by that advice, or by the advice of Parliament, to direct the foreign policy of the Country, to negotiate and enter into Treaties, and to declare war, or conclude a peace;"

Mr. Gladstone

said, the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had told them that he had proved his case; but what case had he proved? For six weeks there stood on the Paper a Motion which had a black and ugly look; and so it was left until last night. During the night it had been transformed in a most wonderful manner. For six weeks it had howled discordantly and acted grotesquely with the blackened face and spotted garb of a Christy Minstrel. That morning it had washed its face, and appeared like an ordinary person. The Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) was as disrespectful to the Sovereign as the original Motion of the hon. Member for Swansea. They would both put the Sovereign on her trial; the only difference was that the hon. Member for Hackney would bring in the Scotch verdict of Not Proven, for he simply said "there was no evidence to show" that the offence had been committed. Both the original Motion and the Amendment called in question the personal conduct of the Sovereign. The Amendment he (Lord Robert Montagu) proposed to move had the advantage of not alluding to the person of the Sovereign. Again, the present—not the original, but the substituted—Motion, and that of the hon. Member for Hackney, implied a censure on the Government. He (Lord Robert Montagu) was not going to bring a charge against the Government; but as certain shadowy notions had been put forward, he wished to explain what had really been the Constitution of the country from its very commencement up to the present day. All the arguments and authorities adduced by the hon. Member for Swansea had been taken from later years alone, with the exception of two, and those two told directly against the hon. Member. The first of those authorities was taken from the time of Henry IV., when, as the hon. Gentleman said, the Commons appeared before the King and Peers in Parliament, and requested the King to act only with the advice of his Council. That was perfectly true. It was an assertion of the Law and Constitution. They had no Cabinet in those days; but the King was bound to act with the advice of his Council. The second authority which the hon. Gentleman adduced, and which was against him, was a letter written by Harley, Lord Oxford, and to be found in Somers' Tracts. That authority said not one word about Cabinets, but that the Sovereign's Prerogative must be exercised solely by the advice of the Council. He now came to what the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) called the elementary truths of the Constitution. He did not think that that hon. Member had looked at one of those elementary truths. He had read a book written a few years ago by Mr. Bagehot; but he (Lord Robert Montagu) denied that it was of any authority whatever in regard to the Constitution of the country. The authorities of the Mover and Seconder belonged to a time when the Constitution had been in abeyance. Both that hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Swansea, in their treatment of this question, reminded him of a young doctor who would go to the hospital in order to learn the human constitution by the side of a fever-stricken patient. They had, apparently, studied the Constitution of the country only during the time of its disease, and not of its health, and no wonder they should have gone wrong. What was the meaning of the Constitution? It was the system of fundamental law, by which good government could be secured. And what were the requisites of good government? The requisites of good government were—firstly, a knowledge of public affairs on the part of those who were called on to direct the State and guide its destinies; secondly, calm, unbiassed, unswerving, and unagitated judgment; thirdly, secrecy in some affairs; and, fourthly, proper checks on private ambition and Party intrigues. He would show that every one of those safeguards was secured by the Constitution of England, and that not one of them was secured by the present system of Cabinet government. The hon. Member for Swansea said the Prerogatives of the Crown were large and undefined. With that the hon. Member for Liskeard did not agree, because he reduced all the Prerogatives of the Crown to the simple nullity that they might only ask the Crown its opinion on any measure which the Ministry proposed, and that the Crown had no initiative and no opinion in political affairs until it was asked. That was a very different account of the Prerogatives of the Crown from that given by the right hon. Member for Greenwich in a little book which was well worthy of their study.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present, LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, resuming, asked whether it would be fitting that the Government should allow a Count-out to be effected on a grave occasion like that, when two speeches had been made attacking Her Majesty, and no reply had been offered in defence of the Constitution.

MR. DILLWYN: I rise to disclaim the imputation of making an attack on Her Majesty. I distinctly disclaimed such an intention at the beginning of my speech.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, perhaps in his speech he did not do so; but in the Motion which the hon. Gentleman first put on the Paper he used the words, "the direct interference of the Sovereign in the political affairs of the Country." He did not impute disloyalty to the hon. Member. Far from it. But what would be the effect on the country if they allowed two speeches on one side to go forth, and no reply on the other? Would it not be thought that the whole House of Commons adopted the opinion of those two hon. Gentlemen. A Count-out would be most disastrous. The country knew that a Count-out was usually brought about to avoid an inconvenient question. He did not believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer would adopt such a course in the present instance. When he was interrupted, he was about to call the right hon. Member for Greenwich into court. He regretted that that right hon. Member, instead of making the short speech which he had made that night—not elucidating the question, but rather confusing it—not aiding the debate, but squelching it—not assisting the House to a just conclusion, but rather leading it astray—had not rather given them more fully the views set forth in the little work called Gladstone's Gleanings, what the right hon. Gentleman had written on the subject of the Prerogatives of the Crown. The right hon. Member for Greenwich used these words—

Lord Robert Montagu

"The Sovereign in England is the symbol of the nation's unity, and the apex of the social structure; the maker"—let the House mark the words—"the maker, with advice, of the law; the supreme governor of the Church; the fountain of justice; the sole source of honour; the person to whom all military, all naval, all civil service is rendered. The Sovereign owns very large properties, receives and holds in law, the entire Revenues of the State; appoints and dismisses Ministers, makes treaties, pardons crime, or abates its punishment; wages war or concludes peace; summons and dissolves the Parliament; exercises these vast powers, for the most part, without any specified restraint of law; and yet enjoys, in regard to these and every other function, an absolute immunity from consequences." (P. 245.) "The Crown is entitled to make a thousand Peers to-day, and as many to-morrow; it may dissolve all and every Parliament before it (the Parliament) proceeds to business; may pardon the most atrocious crimes; may declare war against all the world; may conclude treaties involving unlimited responsibilities, and even vast expenditure, without the consent"—again let the House mark the words—"without the consent, nay, without the knowledge of Parliament; and this, not merely in support or in development, but in reversal of policy already known to and sanctioned by the nation."

The hon. Member for Swansea had devised his own checks and limits on the Prerogative; but in the same breath he had shown that those checks were nugatory. The first of his checks was the responsibility of Ministers, and then he told them that this responsibility was not to be individual but collective in the whole Cabinet. Practically, this was denying the responsibility—for how were they to be responsible if not individually accountable? Where was the responsibility of Ministers if, as the hon. Member alleged, the House of Commons had nothing to do but to register the decrees of the Cabinet? The right hon. Member for Greenwich went further, for he said that the majority of the House had lifted off the shoulders of the Government all responsibility for its acts. It was clear, therefore, that the first check was entirely nugatory. The other check was the power of the purse. The same arguments applied here. In the Afghan War, for instance, where was the power of the purse as a check? Take the purchase of the Suez Canal Shares, and the other instances cited by the hon. Member—once the thing was done, did Parliament ever refuse to pay? He had said that four requisites of good government were secured by the Constitution. What, then, was the Constitution? It was simply this—it was a rule of law—both of Common and

Statute Law—that the Sovereign could exert the Prerogative only with the advice of the Council. The Privy Counsellor swore—he quoted from Selden's Discourse on the Laws and Government of England—that he would give advice fearlessly and honestly, unswayed by passion; abstain from corruption; refuse to be bound by any other oath—evidently referring to secret societies; to receive no gifts from anyone, only from the King. He was to keep the King's counsel secret, and—

“To help the execution of whatever may be determined in Council and to withstand all persons who would attempt the contrary.”

This was directed against private ambition and Party government. Another provision of the oath was that the Counsellor was to reveal to the Crown in Council “whatever may be intended concerning things pertaining to the Crown.” This gave them a clear insight into what the objects of the Council were. These enactments were repeated, not once or twice only, but times innumerable. [The noble Lord then quoted at length from a very valuable book—The Proceedings and Ordinances of the Privy Council—which probably the hon. Member for Liskeard had never looked at—published by the Record Commissioners, in seven volumes.] In this book were to be found some remarkable examples of the action of the Privy Council. For instance, in 1395, the King, being in Ireland, wrote to the Council asking them to sanction a general pardon. In this case, the Council had urged harsh measures against MacMurrough, O'Neale, and others; but the King, finding on the spot that not the Irish but the English of the Pale were the offenders, suggested that the Irish should be dealt with in a just spirit, and obtained the approval of the Council. Again, the Act of 7 & 8 Henry IV. ordained that everything the King did “should be made and endorsed by the advice of the King's Council.” [The noble Lord then read at great length, from various authorities, the duties, privileges, and regulations of the Privy Council, all their proceedings being finally recorded by the sworn clerk in the “Proceedings and Ordinances of the Privy Council:” and said that the business of the Council being to advise the Crown in the exertion of the Prerogative, and that being the very essence and life of the Council, it was spoken of as “the instrument of the Prerogative.”] In support of his position the noble Lord read a passage from Trenchard, who, in his short History of Standing Armies, said—

“Formerly all matters of state and discretion were debated and resolved in the Privy Council, where every man subscribed his opinion and was answerable for it. The late King Charles was the first who broke this most excellent part of our Constitution by setting a Cabal or Cabinet Council, where all matters of consequence were debated and resolved and then brought to the Privy Council to be confirmed.”

Hallam, in his Constitutional History, thus cites a passage from Harley, in his Vindication of the Rights of the Commons of England—

“The Constitutional doctrine is thus laid down—As to the setting of the Great Seal of England to foreign alliances, the Lord Chancellor, or Lord Keeper for the time being, has a plain rule to follow—that is, humbly to inform the King that he cannot legally set the Great Seal of England to a matter of that consequence unless the same be first debated and resolved in Council; which method being observed, the Chancellor is safe and the Council answerable. . . . Former Princes did sometimes advise with particular persons, before they offered a matter to the Council, to be debated and determined; but it is an innovation by evil Ministers, that war and peace, and matters of the highest consequence, should be finally concluded in a secret Cabal and only pass through the Privy Council for form's sake, as a conduit-pipe to convey those Resolutions with authority to the people. All proclamations for declaring war, &c., are constantly set forth in the name of the King, with advice of his Council (which shows that it ought to be so), when perhaps the war was resolved in a private Cabal, and only declared in a Privy Council, and published with that authority to the people; which is an abuse of the Constitution.”

When the Council was discontinued disasters happened. For instance, when Henry VI. came to the Throne in 1422, his uncle, the Duke of Gloucester, was appointed Lord Protector. After a long struggle, the Lord Protector discontinued consulting his Council, and the result was the loss of Anjou, Maine, and Normandy abroad—factions and rebellions at home. The Cabinet was introduced in 1640 for the first time, and it consisted of personal friends of the King, not the leaders of the people and the wisest in the land. They met together, and what happened? The old result. England was divided into factions—Cavaliers and Roundheads—a rebellion broke out, and the King was beheaded in 1649. In 1660, Charles II.

came to the Throne. For a few years the King always acted by the advice of his Council, and the result was he found himself secure on the Throne. And then came temptation. He would like to be absolute and reign like a Cæsar, and with this end he discontinued his Council. Clarendon fell, and the disgraceful annals of our country began. Then came Lord Danby's Administration. At that time the Cabinet system became the established practice, and the Constitutional rule of the King in Council was left in abeyance. The Cabinet of that day was called the "Cabal," perhaps from the initial letters of the names of the statesmen who composed it. It lasted five years, and then came Danby's impeachment. At the command of the King Danby had written a letter to Mr. Montagu, British Ambassador in Paris, instructing him to offer the neutrality of England in the impending war with Spain for the sum of £300,000 a-year for three years. This letter was ordered and was signed by the King; but not on the advice of the Council. Lord Danby was tried for having written this letter. He pleaded the King's command, which he thought sufficient, "as the King is the sole judge at all times of peace and war." The Commons would not hear of this excuse, and the Resolution for his impeachment was carried by 179 votes to 116; and he would ask the attention of the House, and particularly that of the hon. Member for Liskeard—who, if he had read the record of the impeachment, would have known something of the "elements of our Constitution"—to the first article in the impeachment. It was in the following words:—

"(1.) That he hath traitorously encroached to himself regal power by treating, in matters of peace and war, with foreign Ministers and Ambassadors, and by giving instructions to His Majesty's Ministers abroad without communicating the same to the Secretaries of State and the rest of His Majesty's Council, against the express declaration of His Majesty."

Now, this Danby was the Principal Secretary of the State; and yet he was impeached for having communicated with foreign Ambassadors and foreign Powers, even at the command of the King. Then came the unfortunate reign of James II. He discontinued the Council, and the same result followed. A revolution occurred, and the King was hurled from the Throne. William

III. entirely set aside the Council, and Cabinet meetings became the practice. The Cabinet soon followed the fate of the Council; the King was becoming absolute, the country became divided into parties, and the factions of Whigs and Tories arose. Then came standing Armies, the National Debt, the Excise, and "the Dutch." It was not until the passing of the Act of Settlement in 1701 that the House of Commons returned to the true remedy for the evils of the state of things which prevailed. By the 3rd clause of that Act it was declared that—

"All matters and things relating to the well governing of this Kingdom which are properly cognizable in the Privy Council by the laws and customs of this Realm shall be transacted there, and all Resolutions taken thereupon shall be signed by such of the Privy Council as shall advise and consent to the same."

Now, he was going to prove that that clause of the Act of Settlement remained still unrepealed, and that, according not only to the Common Law, but to the Statute Law of the land, the Crown could not act except by the advice of the Privy Council, and that every one of the Privy Councillors was bound to sign his name to his advice. The 3rd clause of the Act of Settlement, in fact, was a distinct declaration that government by the Cabinet without the Privy Council was illegal and contrary to the Constitution. There was a General Election in 1705, and soon after there was passed by the House of Lords a Bill commonly called the Regency Bill, though its proper title was a Bill for the Security of the Queen's Person. It was very hotly contested in the Commons, who inserted a clause respecting the 3rd section of the Act of Settlement, and the Amendment was not accepted by the Lords until after three Divisions and three Protests. It was said that that clause had been repealed by the 4 & 5 Anne, c. 20; but there was no provision of the kind in the original Act itself, although it was to be found in some of the common editions. The clause in the Schedule of the Act of Anne was not regarded at the time as a repeal of the 3rd Clause of the Act of Settlement. In the same year the Treaty of Union with Scotland was signed; and the second Resolution of the Commons agreeing to the Articles of that Treaty expressly referred to the 3rd section of the Act of Settlement as being then in force. Having referred to other proceedings in Parliament in support of his position, the noble Lord said that, at all events, the matter had since that time been put beyond doubt; for that Act of Anne was repealed in 1867 by the Statute Law Revision Act passed by Mr. Disraeli. Therefore, the 3rd clause of the Act of Settlement had from that time, if not from the time of William III. been in force, and every Cabinet which had been held since that time had been illegal, every Member of every Cabinet had been guilty of a violation of the Constitution and of the Statute Law.

Lord Robert Montagu

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, resuming, traced the continuous history of the Privy Council, mentioning that its powers had been recognized in their full validity by Walpole, Bolingbroke, and Chatham. On January 28, 1740, there was a remarkable Protest, which was entered by certain Lords, on a Motion for "the Representations made by Admiral Vernon to the Admiralty." This Motion was lost on division. Then a Motion—

"That a Secret Committee be appointed to inquire into the conduct of the War, consisting of all the Lords of this House who are of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council," was negatived. This was the protest—

"The so-often-urged argument of secrecy proves too much, and may as often without, as with reason, be used in bar of all inquiries, that any Administration conscious either of their guilt or their ignorance, may desire to defeat. It may not only prove the security, but the cause of a sole minister—secrecy being undoubtedly best observed by one; and such a sole minister may, by the same reasoning, as well refuse the communication of measures to the rest of His Majesty's Council, and thereby engross a power inconsistent with and fatal to this Constitution."

Lord Chatham, speaking in 1742 on the Motion for inquiring into Sir Robert Walpole's Administration, had said—

"There are several suspicions abroad relating to his (Sir Robert Walpole's) conduct as a Privy Councillor, which, if true, would be of the last importance to the nation to have discovered. It has been strongly asserted that he was not only a Privy Councillor, but had usurped the whole and sole direction of Her Majesty's Privy Council."

With regard to the excessive power of a single Minister, or of a section of the Ministers, the noble Lord said that the evil principle of the supremacy of the Prime Minister had grown into a vast system, and adduced in support of his argument the statement of the Duke of Wellington on coming into Office in 1834, that he could understand no question, because all had been carried on by private letters, so as to keep the incoming Cabinet in the dark. There was also the remarkable letter of the Prince Consort, addressed on Her Majesty's behalf, to Lord John Russell, complaining of the independent action of Lord Palmerston, who was then Foreign Minister—

"As a Minister, the Sovereign has a right to demand from Lord Palmerston that she be made thoroughly acquainted with the whole object and tendency of the policy to which her consent is required; and, having given that consent, that the policy be not arbitrarily altered from the original line; that important steps be not concealed from her, nor her name used without her sanction. In all these respects Lord Palmerston has failed towards her, and not from oversight or negligence, but upon principle, and with astonishing pertinacity against every effort of the Queen."

On the 20th of August, the Queen wrote a Memorandum, in which these words occur—

"The Queen requires—first, that Lord Palmerston will distinctly state what he proposes to do, in a given case, in order that the Queen may know, as distinctly, to what she is giving her Royal sanction. Secondly, having once given her sanction to a measure, that it be not arbitrarily altered, or modified by the Minister. . . . She expects to be kept informed of what passes between him and the Foreign Ministers, before important decisions are taken."

It appeared from this that there was a common practice for the Prime Minister to take action without telling the Sovereign; and another bad practice of arbitrarily and wantonly altering measures which the Sovereign had sanctioned; and a third nefarious custom of carrying on secret negotiations between the Prime Minister and Foreign Ambassadors, without informing the Sovereign. On August 17, the Prince Consort, on the part of the Queen, had an interview with Lord Palmerston, of which he wrote a memorandum—

"To give him an example of what the Queen wanted, I would ask him a question point-blank. He was aware the Queen had objected to the Protocol about Schleswig (July 4th 1850), and of the grounds on which she has done it. Her opinion had been overruled: the Protocol, stating the desire of the Great Powers to see the integrity of the Danish Monarchy preserved, had been signed, and upon this the King had invaded Schleswig, where the war was raging. If Holstein were attacked also, which was likely, the Germans would not be restrained from flying to her assistance. Russia had menaced to interfere with arms if the Schleswigers were successful. What would Lord Palmerston do when this emergency arose (provoking most likely a European war), and which would arise very probably when we should be at Balmoral and Lord John in another part of Scotland? The Queen expected from his foresight that he had contemplated this possibility, and required a categorical answer as to what he would do in the event supposed. Lord Palmerston entered into a long controversy about the Protocol and the complicated state of the Danish question, called the contingency a very unlikely one, &c., &c. After a full hour's conversation on the subject we were, however, interrupted, without my being able to get a positive answer."

Again, Mr. Disraeli, in his address to the electors in 1857, had complained of Lord Palmerston that he had led the country into secret negotiations, and had by that means subjugated Parliament to himself. Now-a-days, matters were concealed even from Members of the Cabinet themselves. The Duke of Newcastle, when examined before the Sebastopol Committee, in 1855, said there was no quorum to make a Cabinet, and those Ministers who were not in town had no knowledge of what was going on except from the public prints. A curious illustration occurred last year of the way colleagues in the Cabinet were kept in the dark. On the 13th of June the Secretary of State for the Colonies, addressing an audience in Gloucestershire, assured them

"That the main points, the principal lines which had been distinctly laid down in Lord Salisbury's despatch (of April 1) would be adhered to at the Congress of Berlin;"

and yet the very next day the publication of the Salisbury-Schouvaloff surrender in The Globe newspaper showed that these main points had been given up three weeks before. The thing had been erected into a vast system by this time. Lord Wodehouse, in the evidence before the Committee on Diplomatic Service, in 1861, said it was indispensable that there should be a private correspondence between the Foreign Secretary and the heads of the Missions abroad, and that in publishing despatches the Foreign Secretary might, if he pleased, omit any part. Lord Clarendon said that in his correspondence with Foreign Ministers he invariably wrote private letters, and not despatches, in order that they might not be laid before Parliament. Sir Andrew Buchanan and Lord John Russell gave corroborative evidence. The noble Lord then referred to cases in which Lord Palmerston had acted independently of the sanction of the Crown and the approval of his Colleagues, and particularly to his isolated and independent action with regard to the coup d'état of 1851, when he seemed to have regarded himself as an absolute Dictator. In recent times this system appeared to have been carried still further, for it had been said that along with the despatch which censured Sir Bartle Frere a private letter had been sent out telling him not to mind the censure. If this were not true, it behoved the Ministry to deny it. The noble Lord proceeded to cite the judgment of Lord Chief Justice Camden, delivered in the case of "Entick v. Carrington," which was reported in Volume 19 of the State Trials, to show that the practice of the issuing of warrants for the seizure of papers by the Secretary of State was illegal. The learned Judge said—

Lord Robert Montagu

"The practice since the Revolution has been strongly urged with this emphatic addition—that an usage tolerated from the 'Era of Liberty,' and continued downwards to this time through the best ages of the Constitution, must necessarily have had a legal commencement. If the practice began then, it began too late to be law now; if such a right should have existed from the time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary and never yet have found a place in any book of law is incredible."—[State Trials, v. 19.]

Therefore, he contended the mere fact of the Cabinet being the usage of the time did not take from the Privy Council the right to advise the Crown—a right which was in accordance with the Common and Statute Law of the land. In comparing the old Constitutional system with the present illegal system, he begged to remind the House that the latter had sprung up in the very worst and most corrupt period of our history, when certain unprincipled men, having banded themselves together for the purpose of furthering their private ends, took into their own hands the power of advising the Sovereign. The right hon. Member for the London University (Mr. Lowe), in speaking on this question in August, 1878, said—

"As long as the King administered the Constitution he had a great reason for exercising moderation; because he had a great stake in the country. The Revolution came, and the change which I have mentioned followed; the Administrative Government of the country was placed in the hands of the gentlemen who for the time possessed the confidence of the House of Commons. This, so far from mending things, has made them a great deal worse; because those gentlemen have not the same stake in the country that the King had. They can produce the most enormous results; they can dare the most extremely audacious things without having to suffer anything very severe in consequence. Therefore, the use of arbitrary power has become much easier and stronger against the people than it was in the old times before Ministers governed the country. It is perfectly manifest that if this state of things may be supposed to be permanent the liberties of the country are not worth a day's purchase."

He thought, then, he had shown that both by Common Law and by the Act of Settlement a Cabinet was an illegal adviser; and proceeded to cite the opinions of Charles James Fox, Sir George Cornewall Lewis, and Mr. Gladstone, to the effect that the Cabinet was an illegal body. He further proceeded to cite the recent declarations of Lord Derby, to show the impossibility of fixing responsibility for any act of the Cabinet upon any individual Member of it. There was one act which must fall upon the Crown alone, for which no pretence of responsibility could be adduced on the part of the Cabinet, and for which, if there was no Privy Council to be responsible, then no one was—he meant the dismissal of a Ministry. King William IV., for instance, dismissed Lord Melbourne when there was a large majority in that Minister's favour. Who was responsible for that dismissal? If the Privy Council had advised it, there would be evidence of their advice; and they would be held responsible. But they could not say that the Cabinet was responsible, because the Cabinet was itself dismissed, and the Members of it were not responsible for their own dismissal. Yet the Crown was never responsible. Who, then, was responsible? "No," someone would say, "nobody was responsible for that act, except the King himself." Yet they told him he was never responsible. Was not that a reductio ad absurdum of Cabinet government? The Crown was not responsible; the Cabinet was not responsible; and nobody was responsible for the most grave and critical of all acts—the dismissal of a Ministry—unless they re-established the Privy Council, and held them responsible.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, who, on rising to proceed, was received with cries of "Divide, divide!" said, if the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets and the hon. Baronet the Member for Wexford would behave themselves properly and keep themselves decently quiet, he would not continue much longer. ["Order!" and "Divide!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the noble Lord to address himself to the Chair.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU continued by saying that if the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets would be decently quiet he would conclude in two or three minutes; but if that hon. Member would not refrain from interrupting, he would have to occupy another hour or more. The noble Lord continued his address amid much interruption and total inattention, saying that what he had been endeavouring to prove was this—that by the Statute Law and the Common Law, the Crown was bound to exercise its Prerogative on the advice of the Council, and on that advice alone—that in no other manner whatsoever could anyone be held responsible for the policy or for the acts of the Crown—that there could be no responsibility, except on the advice of the Council—that individual Members of the Cabinet were not responsible, and that by the Cabinet system responsibility was entirely evaded. The noble Lord continued to point out at great length his views of the evils of the Cabinet system, in assuring the omnipotence of a single individual (the Prime Minister) without individual responsibility; and finally moved the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

THE O'CONOR DON seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "by the Constitution and Laws of this Realm, it is the right and duty of the Sovereign, with the advice of the Council, and only by that advice, or by the advice of Parliament, to direct the foreign policy of the Country, to negotiate and enter into Treaties, and to declare war or conclude a peace,"—(Lord Robert Montagu,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. MARTEN observed that, it was a little hard upon hon. Members on his side of the House to be taunted with not replying at once to Motions brought forward by hon. Members opposite, because hon. Members opposite contrived by means of Amendments to deliver at least four speeches before their opponents could get in a word. The answer to the speech of the noble Lord was very simple. It was this—that the machinery of the Privy Council was already in full force, and was constantly exerted, as the noble Lord would see if he read The London Gazette, and that the Government of this country being conducted on Party principles, it was impossible that a body like the Privy Council could satisfactorily replace the Cabinet. The informal character of Cabinet Councils, so far from being an evil, appeared to him to be a great advantage, as tending to facilitate Business. The Resolution of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) was a direct, though very complicated, Vote of Censure upon the Government. It involved no less than 13 propositions, and the suddenness with which it had been placed upon the Paper in its present form was quite unprecedented in a Motion of so serious a character. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), in seconding the Resolution, quoted the well-known book, A Vindication of the English Constitution, by Mr. Disraeli. He was surprised at the hon. Member's hardihood in so doing, for the book contained the best vindication of the Tory Party and the strongest condemnation of the Whigs and Radicals that ever was penned by a statesman; and he was quite sure that the hon. Member would not make many quotations from it that would serve his purpose from a political point of view. Neither the Proposer nor the Secunder offered any argument to show why the House should practically without notice entertain their proposal. But apart from the suddenness with which it was brought forward, he objected to the Motion because it was totally unjustified by any facts which hon. Members opposite had cited. The policy of the Government on all the subjects that had been mentioned had been formally challenged and debated in the House over and over again; and in every instance there had been a triumphant majority for the Government, fully confirmed by the opinion of the country. The hon. Member for Swansea, in one of the 13 propositions, asked the House to affirm that the abuse of the Prerogative of the Crown was a growing abuse. What proof had he given that there had been any abuse whatever? The Secunder of the Motion spoke of the Abolition of Purchase in the Army as the greatest abuse of the Prerogative in modern times; but that had occurred during the Premiership of the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and, therefore, it disposed of the allegation that there was a growing abuse. Nothing had been done by the present Government which at all approached the exercise of the Prerogative which was achieved by the right hon. Member when, by a stroke of the pen, he abolished Purchase, in spite of the decision of one of the co-ordinate Branches of the Legislature. Notwithstanding his desire to adapt his Resolution to the feelings of his Friends, the hon. Member for Swansea, like the madman in the novel who could not keep Charles I. out of his letters, had been unable to keep the "supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign" out of the Resolution. It was only "supposed," and what ground was there for saying even that? The only ground was that Her Majesty had written a letter to Lady Frere. Was Her Majesty to be the only lady in her Dominions who was not to write a private letter? The character of the assertion made was the more atrocious, because if ever there was a lady of the highest rank who had lived, as it were, fully before the people and taken them entirely into her confidence, it was Her Majesty. She had caused books to be published which had allowed the public to enter into her daily life, and which contained many interesting and touching accounts of the private life of the Royal Household. After all this, was Her Majesty to be condemned because she had written a private letter to Lady Frere? A more monstrous proposition was never brought forward. The hon. Member had not the courage of his former Resolution; but he asked the House to act on a supposition, and that a most improper one, entirely unsupported by facts. The last proposition which the House was asked to affirm was that the Government had withdrawn from the cognizance and control of the House matters which ought to be within its scope. He contended that no proof had been given of this allegation. The purchase of the Suez Canal Shares was brought before Parliament immediately it met. As to the removal of the Indian troops to Malta, it was impossible that such a measure, any more than the plan of a campaign, could be previously discussed by the House. The theory of the Constitution was that Her Majesty acted by means of agents who were responsible for acting in a legal manner, and liable to impeachment if they did not; and the very instances of impeachment which had been named proved that the Constitution was strong enough to meet any cases that were likely to arise. It was, therefore, idle to maintain that under these circumstances there was any likelihood of the Prerogative of the Crown being strained or abused. He trusted that the House would reject both the Resolution and the Amendment, meeting the Resolution by a negative.

MR. HUTCHINSON said, he was afraid that the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. Marten) who had just sat down had not furnished an exception to the usual plan of leaving the arguments of the Opposition unanswered. He had, in his turn, made two complaints—first, that the Resolution of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had been altered; and, secondly, that that had been done too suddenly. It had, however, already been explained that the change had been made to obviate misconception; and as for the Vote of Censure said to have been sprung suddenly upon the House and the Government, the altered form of the Resolution was in that respect identical with the original. The Government had, therefore, received notice of Censure some six weeks ago, which he (Mr. Hutchinson) thought afforded ample time for preparation. The language of the hon. and learned Gentleman had been animated, but yet, upon the whole, characterized by a laudable degree of moderation, which he hoped would be maintained to the end. Though there would be much difference of opinion respecting the necessity of the Motion, or even of any Motion on the subject, there ought to be absolute unanimity respecting the tone and temper in which the question should be discussed, if raised at all. Our Constitutional system, being itself largely the product of centuries of mutual conciliation and reciprocal adjustment, even when there was reason to believe that the lost balance between its various forces needed to be regulated anew and restored, the process should be marked by a careful avoidance of needless political friction. With the utmost courtesy, then, towards the Government, and with respectful loyalty to the Crown, he desired to express his opinion that the spirit of mutual forbearance he spoke of had latterly been a good deal less active than might be wished. Instead of it, there were indications of a desire to insist on wider limits of Prerogative, and even to stretch them, as the phrase was; to forget that a strictly technical right might be exercised so as to become a grievous practical wrong. That which might be even constitutionally lawful, according to the letter, was not by any means invariably politically expedient. Especially did it behove those in authority in this country, whether Monarchical or Ministerial, to remember that only when power was gentle could they expect obedience to be liberal. When Prerogative, for example, claimed that some unexpected extension of its jurisdiction was, after all, within the four corners of legality, the subjects of Prerogative in their turn began to inquire not how much service they could cheerfully render, but how little might suffice. It was the old story over again of Isaac of York, in Ivanhoe, who calculated how few coins might pass muster for a handful; and hesitation of that sort was but a sorry substitute for the ungrudging generosity that did not stay to reckon. One would hardly think, too, that repeated excavation, for the purpose of laying bare and measuring the foundations of an edifice, was an operation eminently conducive to its stability; and, in like manner, it appeared to him that institutions were not strengthened by acts necessarily suggesting Motions like that of his hon. Friend. He said "necessarily suggesting such Motions," for the House of Commons was nothing if it were not the embodiment of the national feeling and the national will in things political; and, at the present time, two well-defined characteristics of public opinion might be distinctly made out. There was, first, a wide-spread conviction that personal authority, Monarchical or Ministerial, or both—it being a hardship in the case that the two had been purposely confused, so as to be made indistinguishable—was encroaching on representative function and privilege. Secondly, there was a decided opinion that this encroachment ought to be resisted and checked. If displacement of the Constitutional balance there was to be, that was not quite the direction in which they were likely to move willingly. The process of evolution and development, which had gradually transferred power from the few to the many, would hardly be arrested by a new revolutionary, or, if that phrase were thought offensive, a new re-actionary plan, whereby concentration was to be substituted for diffusion. Most certainly such a change would not be acquiesced in silently. Hence the Motion of his hon. Friend. Naturally enough, he had been expected to adduce the evidence on which he founded it, and both he and the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had shown that there was no lack of pièces justificatives. But they all knew there was such a thing as moral certitude, even in cases where demonstration or legal proof might be unattainable. The Scotch verdict of “not proven” implied a deficiency in the evidence, rather complete absolution of the culprit. There was even such a thing conceivable as a verdict of “not guilty,” coupled with a warning not to do it any more. This latter was the disposition of his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, who was willing to let bygones be bygones if the offence were not repeated. Now, the strength of this case did not lie altogether in the specific instances brought forward, as in a series of words and actions, each comparatively insignificant did it stand alone, but, taken together, constituting a rather formidable aggregate, all pointing in one and the same direction. What was the consequence? Why, a general belief that the influence of which the Motion spoke was improperly increasing. Such beliefs did not arise out of nothing. Carlyle’s notion of a whole nation going mad together had not yet been realized among us. A famous politician once said that he knew not how to frame an indictment against an entire people; but to say there was no cause for the apprehension referred to in the Motion was to impugn the common sense of a large portion of this nation. Such a belief in itself justified the course taken by his hon. Friend; whenever they were widely entertained, they ought to find expression in that House. He knew it would be argued that what had been done was innocent or unimportant. [“Hear, hear!”] Yes; but Parliament had always been wisely tenacious of privilege and jealous of novelty. It had felt the necessity of resisting the beginnings of things, because our whole system was built up on precedents, the innovation of to-day tending to mature into the established custom of to-morrow. Besides, what might be perfectly safe at one time might be fraught with serious peril at another. National interests were far too precious to be left at the mercy of Monarchical or Ministerial caprice. They could not guarantee to posterity an un-failing succession of Premiers endowed with infallible wisdom, nor an uninterrupted series of Sovereigns blessed with perfect political discretion. Therefore must they hand down the safeguards they themselves had received. The authority of the Government and the interference of the Sovereign must be kept within the strict limits prescribed by usage, and by usage as modified during these latter days, when the bounds of freedom had been made broader yet. This was not now done. It was a new thing, so far as he knew, for the Sovereign to be in confidential correspondence with the Viceroy of India, and for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Leader of that House, on being interrogated respecting the matter, to say that he and his Colleagues had nothing to do with it. The answer of the right hon. Gentleman was courteous, as were all his replies; but was not on that account the less unsatisfactory. It was also something of a novelty for a Colonial Secretary to inform the House that he knew nothing about the point whether the Sovereign had expressed confidence in Sir Bartle Frere, whom the said Colonial Secretary had censured. The answer of this right hon. Gentleman was equally unsatisfactory, but was not marked by an excess of courtesy. The question naturally arose whether anybody else—the Prime Minister, for example—was better informed on these matters than were his associates. If he were, what could they think of such a new development of personal government and of the submission of his Colleagues to be thus officially disrated? and if the Premier were equally in the dark with them, what had become of Ministerial responsibility, which of course implied Ministerial cognizance as its condition precedent and correlative? Look at the business as they might, it was an infringement of the rights of Representatives of the people in Parliament. This ought not to be, even in the interests of existing institutions. They were all thoroughly loyal; this ancient Monarchy, resting on the glorious tradition and historic splendour of 1,000 years, had no more attached subject than himself. But, in his judgment, it would be most effectually upheld by not becoming too obtrusive. Likewise, the control of a Ministerial Executive would be best maintained by their taking Parliament into their confidence, instead of snubbing it, keeping it at arm's length, and generally treating it disdainfully, as was now too much the supercilious mode. In this country any system which sought to extend the jurisdiction of Monarchs or Ministers at the expense of Parliament, increasing the authority of the one and eliminating the control of the other, would soon bring about consequences which he wished to avert. English politicians were sometimes accustomed to smile at the doctrinaire pedantry which thought that great nations could be ruled by written codes, or by cleverly constructed regulations, meant to map out Scientific Frontiers dividing the various forces composing the State. In this country, they preferred the applied experience of successive generations. But how, if, at the present moment, an attempt was being made to govern this Empire in accordance with the ideas contained in certain political novels? How, if to the realization of those new-fangled theories, the time-honoured privileges of Parliament were being sacrificed? Lord Beaconsfield recently declared, with all the magniloquence of a maxim maker, that the world was not governed by the hare-brained chatter of irresponsible frivolity. He was afraid, however, that the hare-brained chatter of certain frivolous, irresponsible, and fictitious personages in two or three very trashy novels, considering them from the literary point of view, did nevertheless actually set forth the principles on which the affairs of this Empire were now managed. His Lordship, in the very same sentence, went on to say that the world was governed by Sovereigns and statesmen. The House would notice that order of precedence, indicating, as it did, the domination of personal influences, rather than the free play of representative forces. With the utmost loyalty and respect, he affirmed that, in the last resort, the world was governed neither by Sovereigns nor by statesmen, but by the common sense of the whole community. Among themselves, at any rate, public opinion was the supreme authority, the final court from which there was no appeal. Its force, when exerted for a great Constitutional purpose, was, and ought to be, irresistible. He believed it would be found supporting the Motion of his hon. Friend.

Mr. Hutchinson

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he believed that the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) was before the House, and that the House would have to vote upon this in the first instance. Unlike a good many hon. Members, he had had sufficient patience to listen to the speech of the noble Lord; and he thought that hon. Members were guilty of some neglect, when they treated with indifference utterances which, however perverted was the view of Constitutional history they presented, and however dangerous the doctrines they advanced under the pretence of extreme loyalty and a desire to strengthen the position of the Crown, were, nevertheless, those of a well-informed Member of the House. The noble Lord had given an able exposition of his opinions. He had declared that the existence of a Cabinet was a modern innovation and an abuse—he described what he said once were, and what he hoped would again be, the functions of the Privy Council. According to the noble Lord, the Privy Council was to be a body independent of, and, in many respects, superior to, Parliament, especially with respect to the control which it should exercise over the Prerogative of the Crown; in other respects the Privy Council was, according to the noble Lord, to be equal to Parliament. The views enunciated by the noble Lord reminded him (Mr. Newdegate) of the only work in which he had seen such opinions fully advanced—the Memorial of the celebrated Jesuit, Father Parsons, which was discovered amongst the papers of James II. after his abdication. He did not think, however, that Parliament or the country would accept of the Privy Council as a body independent of, and, in some respects, superior to, itself. Such were the views upon which James II. acted, and by so acting he lost the Throne. It was strange, in this 19th century, to hear such views advanced in the British House of Commons, and that those who advanced them should claim an almost exclusive loyalty. The danger was none the less when these opinions were presented in their Conservative phase rather than in their democratic aspect. This policy was advocated in letters and communications which appeared in The Tablet and other Ultramontane journals. Let the House remember that there were now a great number of establishments in this country which were under the direction of those who entertained these opinions, and who were likely to obtain a hold upon a considerable section of the population. On the present occasion, those views had been expounded to the House by a noble Lord who avowed himself to be a Home Ruler. This, it now appeared, was another form in which the Home Rule Party proposed to trench upon the duties, functions, and position of that House. This was not a matter, therefore, which the House should treat with neglect, for the House had already had some experience of the power of obstruction and of the interference with its functions which the Home Rule section of the House was capable of exercising; and if these views were to be promulgated without contradiction throughout the country, the House of Commons might find itself compelled actively to defend its highest duties and the retention of some of its most important functions. They had now among them that dangerous school of re-action, whose support and influence had proved fatal to so many Princes. It was through this influence that the Thrones of Naples and of France had disappeared. He (Mr. Newdegate) believed that Her Majesty was incapable of lending an ear to such advice, though it might reach Her Majesty, as it might reach Her Successor, as it was certainly reaching a considerable section of the population. He held it to be the duty of the House of Commons to protect the Privileges which it had inherited and the functions they had performed for so long a period. In this proposal of the noble Lord to recognize the Privy Council as a body totally independent of, and, in many respects, a substitute for, Parliament, they had an embodiment of those re-actionary views which were sometimes associated with democratic movements, and which were not one whit less dangerous when entertained by nominal Conservatives. He should vote, then, without any hesitation, against the Amendment of the noble Lord. He regretted that he could not vote for the Resolution of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). He had voted for the maintenance of the legal restriction imposed upon the Prerogative by the Act for the Government of India, under which the authority of the Crown had superseded that of the East India Company—when the India Act had, in his opinion, been violated. He had voted against the extension of the Prerogative when the clause in that Bill which was intended to limit the Royal Prerogative, and of which the late Lord Derby was the author, was set at nought; but he could not vote with the hon. Member for Swansea in the present instance, for this reason—that the original form of the hon. Member's Notice had directly impugned the action of Her Most Gracious Majesty, whilst, in its altered shape, that of the Motion now before the House, the suspicion was revived that Her Majesty had exceeded the functions which, under the law and by the law, were confided in her. He had not heard one word, either from the hon. Member for Swansea, or in the able speech with which the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had seconded the Motion, by which even an attempt was made to prove the justice of this imputation upon Her Majesty; and he should deem himself unworthy of a seat in that House if he were to record his vote in condemnation of the conduct of Her Majesty, without the clearest proof, upon mere unsupported suspicion. He should be no less unworthy, in his own opinion, were he, when clear evidence of excess on the part of the Crown was adduced, to shrink from voting in restraint of that excess on the part of the Sovereign in the exercise of the Prerogative of the Crown.

Mr. Newdegate

MR. E. JENKINS thought it very likely that the opinion of the House on this debate might not turn out to be the opinion of the country; and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer supposed that the few words uttered by him, and the deprecatory observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), would satisfy the country that an answer had been made to the speeches of the Mover and Seconded of the Resolution, he was much mistaken. He said this, because he was certain that, whatever the issue of the debate might be, he and his Friends were speaking the opinion of a vast number of people in this country, when they asserted that the Motion on the Paper demanded the serious attention of Parliament. He could not but remark on the criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich upon those who had brought forward a Motion embracing a series of things, the responsibility for which had already been accepted by the House, that, as far as he understood it, the reflection of the right hon. Gentleman meant that whenever anyone found himself in a minority in that House he was not justified in making repeated endeavours to press forward a particular question. If, however, they looked back to the right hon. Gentleman's own history, they would see that on occasions when he was right, and when he was wrong, he had stood out amid miserable minorities. He had made 73 speeches in opposition to the Divorce Bill; and had he not, against the feeling of the House, led the Opposition to the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill?—in which, no doubt, he was right; and surely, therefore, he could not blame those who, feeling the Constitution in danger of invasion, entered a protest against the action of the Government. The best way of putting the grounds on which that protest was entered would be to quote from Sir Erskine May what were supposed to be the results of the Constitutional struggles of a century. Speaking of a time when the Constitution was supposed to have been settled, Sir Erskine May stated that from that time no question had arisen concerning the exercise of the Prerogative or influence of the Crown; that both had been exercised wisely, justly, and in the true spirit of the Constitution; that Ministers enjoying the confidence of Parliament had never claimed in vain the confidence of the Crown; that their measures had not been thwarted by secret influence and irresponsible advice; that their policy had been directed by Parliament and public opinion, and not by the will of the Sovereign or the intrigues of the Court; and that vast as was the power of the Crown, it had been exercised throughout the present Reign with the advice of responsible Ministers in a Constitutional manner and for legitimate objects; that it had been held in trust, as it were, for the benefit of the people, and hence it had ceased to excite the jealousy of rival Parties or popular discontent; that the judicious exercise of the Royal authority, while it had conducted to the good government of the State, and sustained the moral influence of the Crown and the devoted loyalty of a free people which Her Majesty's personal virtues had merited, had never been disturbed. It was impossible to read this description without feeling that the country was now falling back on the system of secret influence, when the name of the Crown was misused for the purposes of Party government, and when, in consequence, as shown in the public organs of the day in Scotland and the Northern and Midland Counties, there was a widespread feeling of jealousy with regard to the manner in which the Crown was influenced. In consequence of the course which this debate had taken, it fell upon a few shoulders to maintain the proposition which had been put forward, and he hoped the House would permit him to add some observations to those which already had been made in support of the Motion. ["Oh, oh!"] He could assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Admiral Sir William Edmonstone) that it would not conduce to shorten his observations if he continued his interruptions. Let him for one moment refer, in the first place, to one or two facts which had been adduced by his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) to prove the grounds on which the feeling to which he had alluded existed in the country. He did not think it was unimportant to-night, when they were gathered together for the purpose of establishing their propositions, to take an historical view of the actions of Her Majesty's Government, although it had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich that it was irrelevant to go back to discussions which had taken place in this House. He did not intend to trouble the House with a discussion upon the meaning of the word Crown or Prerogative; but only wished to point out that the Crown, in the sense in which it was used in this

Resolution, meant the Sovereign as advised by Her Ministers—the repository of the Executive power, the repository of the Prerogative. Many hon. Members seemed to think that the Prerogative was a sort of Divine institution, or something which originally belonged to the Monarchy or Sovereign whereas if they would look into the matter fully, they would find that even the most theoretical lawyers would admit that the Prerogative was nothing more nor less than that which was granted to the Sovereign to be used as a trust for the benefit of the people. The struggle between Prerogative on the one hand, and liberty on the other, had been constant, and this House had been the scene of the struggle; and it was only the following up of the traditions on the side of liberty in the past that justified his hon. Friend in making his present Motion. They need not recall the incidents connected with the commencement of the Afghan War, or of the removal of the troops to Malta, or the purchase of the Suez Canal Shares, or other matters of that sort; but he did ask the House to consider whether or not there did not seem to be on the part of both the front Benches a certain indifference to deal with the gradual infringement of the Crown by the advice of the Ministers on what he regarded as the Constitutional rights and privileges of this House? At this moment there were going on in Egypt negotiations of a delicate and important character to this country; but they had no Papers and no information respecting negotiations. Her Majesty's Government refused to give them any information later than the end of last year; but some day the Chancellor of the Exchequer would come over to the House, and they would suddenly learn that they had been committed to some new Guarantee, or that they had entered into some Treaty with France. He asked if it was possible long to maintain the right of the Crown to act in that way behind the back of this House and of the country, to commit the country to a large expenditure, and involve it in serious guarantees? How long was it likely that the country would stand a Prerogative so extensive? The effect of the proposition was that the mode and limits of the exercise of the Prerogative should be more strictly observed. That proposition was not disputed by the front

Bench, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich was unable to say that he disputed the proposition that the Prerogative, as assumed by the Government at the present moment, ought to be allowed to remain in its present position. He did not wonder that the right hon. Gentleman was indisposed to make a long speech on this question. He remembered that when the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Rylands) called attention to the treaty-making power of the Crown, the right hon. Gentleman jumped up to defend the Crown, as if the Treasury Bench were not sufficiently capable of doing that. In a few weeks afterwards, the right hon. Gentleman had occasion to retract his words; for, in the meantime, the Turkish Convention had been concluded. It was then found that his doctrines had become inconvenient. It was found that this country had entered into serious guarantees, and that the broad propositions laid down from the front Opposition Bench were no longer to be maintained with their full force and authority. The country would consider the unwillingness of the front Benches to deal with this question as significant. They would see that there was a change in the influence of the Crown which not only affected Ministers in power, but Members who were looking forward to power, and they would learn with satisfaction the protest which came from Members below the Gangway against this unjust assumption of the Prerogative on the part of the Crown acting on the advice of its Ministers. He felt that this occasion had not been a sufficient one to hammer out the question; but he would say that it was the duty of the Government to take care that incidents such as had recently occurred should not occur again. If it was true that a large sum of money had been paid for telegrams from the Viceroy of India to the Queen, it could not be that those telegrams were on matters of private business. They must have conveyed information concerning the political condition of the country. But a more serious thing than that was the fact that the telegrams sent with reference to Lord Chelmsford—sent by the Crown on the responsibility of a single Cabinet Minister—had had the practical effect of withdrawing from the consideration of the House the competency of Lord Chelmsford. He admitted it was dictated by a generous sentiment; but it exercised an unconstitutional influence, and in a former age the Minister who sent it would have been impeached, and he certainly thought he would have deserved it. There could be no harm from this inoffensive discussion, and the opinions which had been expressed might have a good effect. The matter rested upon two grounds, the policy pursued by Ministers and the little evidences of personal influence. He believed that the time was not far distant when the Crown would be relieved of any suspicion of the exercise of this illegitimate influence, because public opinion would remove from the entourage of the Crown the present dubious Advisers of Her Majesty, and put in their places others who would possess the confidence of the country.

Mr. E. Jenkins

MR. FAWCETT, who had on the Paper the following Amendment to the Motion of the hon. Member for Swansea:—

"That this House, while at all times anxious to protect the privileges of Parliament against any encroachment on the part of the Crown, is of opinion that there is no evidence to show that in the Indian and foreign policy of the Country the Sovereign has acted without the advice of Her Ministers, who are directly responsible to Parliament," said, that early in the evening his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had misunderstood his motive in asking that the Motion might be postponed. He (Mr. Fawcett) now wished to explain to the House what he intended to do. This was not a question of Order, but of fairness in their Parliamentary conduct of proceedings. Six weeks ago, the Chancellor of the Exchequer answered a Question put to him by his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) in reference to the telegram sent by Lord Lytton to the Queen; but what course had his hon. Friend taken? Why, he gave Notice of a Motion which remained on the Paper till last night. He felt that that Motion bore but one interpretation according to common sense—that it was a Vote of Censure upon the Sovereign; and, therefore, he put down his Amendment, as no evidence had been offered in proof of the charge. The hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) appeared to be under the impression that everyone who differed from him was under Court influence. As he might come within the category alluded to by his hon. Friend, he wished it to be understood that he was actuated in this, as in other questions which came before the House, solely by a wish to see equal justice done by and between all persons, whether they belonged to the highest or the lowest classes in the Realm. That might be called Court influence; but that was his sole motive for bringing forward his Amendment. It seemed to him that a charge by inference was far worse than when made direct; and what could words convey more than in the Motion of his hon. Friend that the Sovereign had done something that ought not constitutionally to have been done? He withheld his Amendment as long as he could do so. It was not until late last night that the hon. Member for Swansea, at the suggestion of the hon. Member for Dundee, altered his Resolution; and it was contrary to the usage of the House that a Motion conveying Censure should be only given Notice of at a period so late that it was not possible for any hon. Member to frame an Amendment which could be placed on the Paper so that hon. Members could express an opinion upon it. He was not the one to shrink from expressing his disapproval of the conduct of the Government; but when a Censure on any Government was proposed, it was only fair that Notice should be given of it. As to his own Amendment, he felt that it was no longer relevant to the Motion now on the Paper, and he should withdraw the Amendment, taking no part in the Division. It seemed to him that it was the very essence of Liberalism to maintain the great principle of Ministerial responsibility. Some hon. Members spoke as if the English people were not a self-governed nation, and as if, at the present time, there were some influences which the House could not reach, and some power which it could not attack. He believed that with an extended suffrage England was as much a self-governed nation as she ever was, and that it was just as impossible now as it ever had been in the past for any Monarch or Minister to contravene the wishes of the people. It might be said, how did he account for the policy of the last four or five years? The Government had been pursuing a policy in every part of the world fraught with danger to the best interests of the Empire. Do not let the Government, now that the people were beginning to pay some of the penalties of that policy, shelter themselves behind "Court influence and personal government." The people who were responsible for this policy were the people of England themselves. If the Government had not been supported by the people, the policy which had been carried out could never have been persisted in. [Ministerial cheers.] That statement was cheered from the Conservative Benches, and he should repeat it again and again in the country, because up to the present time thousands of lives were sacrificed and millions of treasure were being wasted. Do not let the people of this country, like the people of France, attempt to shift the responsibility from themselves. If they had not been in favour of this so-called Imperial aggressive policy, that policy would never have been carried out. It was said that this Ministry was supported by the Court as against the wishes of the people. Nothing of the kind. When the Government found their policy resisted by the opinion of the country, the Government yielded at once. What did they see last autumn? The Government was then at the height of its power. The Government announced that they were going to give some English money to the people of Turkey; but within a few hours they withdrew that announcement. Why did they do so? Because they, like any other English Government, knew that they must submit to the popular view. Therefore, he thought there was a great deal of exaggeration about this Court influence. Let them encourage in the people this belief, which was, he believed, a true belief, that in them was centred all political power; and if the Government acted wrongly, it was their fault if those wrong acts were committed. He should have been delighted to express his opinion on some of the questions raised in this debate. That he hoped to be able to do on some future occasion. His hon. Friends who sat around him must not suppose that he differed from them in principle; but, whether right or wrong, he could not come to any other conclusion than that, as the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea had been suddenly changed, it was better that he should not intrude upon the House the Amendment he had intended to move, or take any part in the Division.

Mr. Fawcett

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I regret very much to stand between the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) and the House, and I regret it still more because I gather from some voices behind me that an impression prevails that there is something irregular in my addressing the House a second time to-night. In point of fact, I have only said a few words, and those not upon the present Motion, but upon the original Motion presented to the House by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), and those few words were only used in order to explain why at that time I did not think it my duty or convenient to enter upon the question. I feel that it is now full late for a speech to be delivered from this Bench in answer to the charges which have been made, and as to which we are peculiarly responsible; and I think I should not be doing my duty if, after what has recently been said, I should any longer delay in addressing the House. I waited until I should hear the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), because I felt, under the peculiar circumstances of the debate, that he was the real author of the Motion now before the House. The hon. Member for Swansea, as we have been reminded, gave Notice of his Resolution some weeks ago; and it was not until the hon. Member for Dundee gave Notice last night of an Amendment of an important character upon that Resolution that the hon. Member for Swansea changed the wording of his Motion. Well, Sir, it is not convenient that the wording of a Motion should be changed suddenly; but it is still less convenient if a change is made for the reason assigned by the hon. Member for Swansea. The reason put forward by him was that he found that the Motion of which he had given Notice was misconstrued, and that it was understood to bear a meaning which he never intended it should bear—namely, that he was intending to move a Resolution conveying a Censure upon Her Majesty the Queen, and that it was in order to get rid of that unfortunate misunderstanding that he agreed to change the wording of his Resolution. I fully accept, and everyone who knows the hon. Gentleman would be prepared to accept in the largest measure, his disclaimer of the intention to make any charge of a personal character upon Her

Majesty the Queen. But I think no one can have watched the course even of this debate, and that no one can have observed the language which has been held out-of-doors during the time that the Motion has been upon the Paper, without seeing that whatever was the intention of the Mover, at all events the impression conveyed to many minds and to the public was that the conduct of the Queen was charged as unconstitutional by the Motion; and I rejoice to find, and we all rejoice to find, that such was not the intention of the hon. Member for Swansea or the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney). Still, we feel it is indispensably necessary that we should, in the most distinct and most emphatic manner, repudiate and rebut the charge which has been brought against Her Majesty. The Amendment of which the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had given Notice was an Amendment which seemed to me of the kind that we might have accepted; because, whether we were fully satisfied with it or not, it in substance appeared fairly to traverse the Motion originally intended to be made by the hon. Member for Swansea. His Motion was understood to raise the question as to whether Her Majesty had interfered in the foreign or in the Indian policy of the country without proper Constitutional resort to the advice of her Ministers, and the hon. Member for Hackney had proposed to say that there was no evidence of her having so acted. That Motion has been changed, and the Mover disclaims an intention to make a charge against the Sovereign; but still he does not, as it seems to me, withdraw the imputation, neither does the amended Motion lead at all to the satisfactory conclusion that there is no charge of interference on the part of the Crown in the State policy of the country; while it does import into the question another element, and one which it is impossible we should altogether pass over and ignore. It imports into this Resolution that which was hardly in the original Resolution—a distinct Vote of Censure upon the Government. That undoubtedly places us in a position of embarrassment, because, on the one hand, we desire to adopt such a course as may most distinctly mark the sense of the House of the inadequacy, nullity, and utter futility of the charges brought against the Queen; and, on the other hand, we cannot accept any Resolution that gives the go-by to the charge now made against the Government of having made an improper use of the Prerogative of the Crown. Therefore, after thinking the matter over, we have come to the conclusion that there is no course open to us but to meet the Motion of the hon. Member for Swansea with a direct negative. The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) has moved an Amendment, which he supported in a speech of great research, learning, ingenuity, and of some length. But whatever may be the merits of that Amendment; it distinctly avoids the question, and we cannot accept it. The hon. Member for Hackney does not move his Amendment, and it is, therefore, clearly inappreciable. For that reason, I think we have no course open to us but to meet the Motion with a direct negative. But, Sir, in doing this, I wish to draw a distinction between the two parts of the censure which is, either directly or indirectly, conveyed. As regards the censure cast upon Her Majesty's Government, we are now, I think, become tolerably well hardened to attacks of this kind; and so far as the speeches of the Mover and Seconder traverse the old ground of the iniquities of the Government in respect of their conduct at the various stages of the critical events of last year, so far as they relate to the movement of the Indian troops, the Vote of Credit, or the various other subjects to which reference has been made, we are perfectly content to say that those questions have been brought forward in this House one by one, they have been debated one by one, and the judgment of the House has been passed upon them all singly. And if it is desired now to take them again in the lump, we are perfectly prepared to meet them in that form also. But, Sir, the case is totally different when the revered name of the Sovereign of this country is brought in question in any shape or form; and whether it be in the shape of a direct charge against Her Majesty, or of a charge against her Advisers, that they have made use of and sheltered themselves behind her name, we find it necessary to give it a distinct and emphatic contradiction. The hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Hutchinson) said just now that there was in the country an impression that encroachments were being made by Monarchical or Ministerial authority, or both; and the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) echoed very much the same sentiments. He said there was a feeling of jealousy with regard to the influence of the Crown, and that if we read the newspapers, we should see that such impression was abroad. I am upon this point happy to be able to confirm the opinion which he has expressed; for it has happened that, in reading a newspaper this evening, I found the following words—I am quoting from The Echo:—

“But occasionally we have significant indications that the Crown is acting as permanent head of the Cabinet, or rather of the small Cabinet inside the larger one. Her Majesty sent a despatch to Lord Lytton, so lengthy that the cost of telegraphing it was 1,400 rupees. Then we have the elaborate message to Lord Chelmsford, and the still more recent one to Lady Frere.”

Now, this is the sort of statement which goes forth in columns widely circulated for the instruction of the public. If hon. Members will consider it for a moment, they will see that, even assuming the correctness of the charges brought against us here, these charges thus made in the Press are totally unfounded. The charge made in the Question put by the hon. Member for Swansea some weeks ago, upon which this Motion was raised, did not relate to any telegraphic despatch sent by Her Majesty to Lord Lytton, but related to a telegraphic communication said to have been despatched from Lord Lytton to Her Majesty. That is a very different case, because it is quite possible and highly probable that there may have been communications as to matters of fact made by the Viceroy to the Queen; while, on the other hand, telegrams from the Queen to Lord Lytton might bear a different construction. But this is a matter upon which I shall trouble the House for a few moments, because it is the only serious one brought forward in this discussion. We have heard a good deal about the telegrams to Lord Chelmsford and to Lady Frere, and this is a matter as to which I think the answer commends itself to the common sense of the House. At a moment of great anxiety; at a moment when Her Majesty's troops had met with an unfortunate reverse; when there had been great loss of life, and great concern was naturally felt on the part of Her Majesty; at a time, too, when the Government were so far from expressing their censure or their want of confidence in their Agents or Ministers in South Africa, that they felt it to be their duty to defend them, and retain them in the responsible positions which they filled; Her Majesty, always ready with a kind word, sent a message in the most general terms of sympathy, and at the same time conveyed an expression of confidence that her troops would redeem themselves from the difficulties in which they were placed, and that her Administrator and Governor would be able to bring them out of the difficulties of their situation. There is really nothing in that which can in any way whatever be found fault with, nor do I believe that anybody has made it the subject of a serious charge. But with regard to the case of the Indian telegram, I am bound to say that it is a matter which requires a moment's consideration. This charge originates in a very remarkable article contributed to one of the numerous periodicals of the day by a gentleman whose name is very well known to us all as a special correspondent of one of the newspapers, and an admirable writer, whose descriptions we all read with interest and pleasure—Mr. Archibald Forbes. Whether he is an equally great Constitutional authority is, of course, another question. He is a gentleman with whose name we all are familiar, but of whom I have no personal knowledge. The article is entitled “Some Plain Words about the Afghanistan Question,” and gives an account of what he has gathered to be the history and origin of that war. He says that Lord Lytton was desirous of bringing about a quarrel with the Ameer Shere Ali, and, of course, of pressing his view upon the Home Government, who, according to Mr. Archibald Forbes, were unable to see the necessity for hostilities with Afghanistan. Mr. Forbes proceeds to say—

“While working in this fashion on his own account, Lord Lytton was pleading with Lord Cranbrook for his sanction to an immediate Declaration of War.”

And after a few more sentences he adds—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

"Nor did he confine his communications to the Constitutional channel. It is not generally known, but it is nevertheless true, that the Viceroy of India has maintained direct communication in the Anglo-Afghan affair with Her Majesty the Queen. How copious this must have been may be judged from the fact that the telegram sent upon this great and difficult case was so long that the cost was 11,000 rupees."

These words are in italics, and a great writer does not usually make use of italics unless he wishes to direct particular attention to that about which he is writing. It is obvious that the meaning of the paragraph is this—that Lord Lytton, desiring to bring about the acceptance of a certain policy with Her Majesty's Ministers at home, and finding himself unable to persuade them by his arguments, addressed himself directly to the Queen, that he might obtain Her Majesty's support in order to carry his object. Now, that, if true, is a serious charge, and one which undoubtedly trenches upon the Privileges of Parliament and the Constitution of the country. But, Sir, there is no foundation whatever for such a statement. It is perfectly true that a long telegram was sent by Lord Lytton to Her Majesty; but what was the date of that message, and to what circumstances did it refer? I have been favoured by Her Majesty with a sight of that telegram, and am perfectly acquainted with it, and it is at this moment in my possession. I will describe its nature and purport. In the first place, its date is the 26th of November; the advance of the Forces had begun five days previously—that is, on the 21st of November—and the telegram which Lord Lytton addressed to Her Majesty described in tolerably succinct phrases the advance of the various columns of Her Majesty's Forces. He begins by saying that they advanced on the morning of the 21st of November, under Generals Biddulph and Roberts, and the nature of their instructions is mentioned for the information of Her Majesty. There is not one word upon the causes of the war; there is not one word with regard to political matters; it is only a telegram sent by the Viceroy at the moment when the movement took place, in order that Her Majesty might receive early and authentic intelligence of that which had taken place. That is the whole explanation of this mysterious telegram, in reply to which Her Majesty simply expressed her gratification at hearing of the success which had attended her troops. The telegram was not sent by Her Majesty without being first submitted to, and approved by her Minister. I ask what does the House consider to be the position—what does it consider to be the rights and duties of the Sovereign? Is the House of opinion that it is improper that Her Majesty should be in any way in the receipt of intelligence as to important and interesting events which are going on? Is the House of opinion that Her Majesty should not write a private letter, or express any opinion of her own upon any matter which seems to call for the expression of sympathy with those who are in trouble? Is it possible to suppose that one who has held, and continues to hold, so important a position as the Queen of England; one who has had her experience; one who is called upon from time to time to admonish and to advise; whose right it is, as the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) has said, "to be consulted, to encourage, and to warn," are we to be told that she is to be deprived of all information as to the real state of affairs, or as to the real state of feeling in this country or anywhere else? Sir, I maintain this position to be utterly untenable. We have, in some of the language used to-night, heard to what absurd and ridiculous lengths this case has been carried. It would appear that Her Majesty ought not to be informed as to the details of what passes in this House, or what passes in the Cabinet; and other like doctrines have been advanced in a way which makes us really wonder at the views which hon. Members opposite entertain. But I think we may say, in answer to all these charges, that the character and the history of the present Reign and of the present Sovereign are in themselves a sufficient refutation. We need not appeal to any evidence but that which we ourselves possess; but if it were necessary to do so, I would say—Go to what country you please, to France, Italy, America, or where you may, and listen to the language in which the Sovereign of Great Britain is spoken of. Everywhere you will hear the same uniform eulogium upon the private virtues and conduct of the Queen and upon her high Constitutional character. I venture to say there has never been in the annals of this country a Sovereign who has more loyally justified the position which Her Majesty occupies as a Constitutional Sovereign. The hon. Member for Swansea, in his original Motion, told us that certain action was not in accordance with Constitutional usage "as now understood and settled." But how, and by whom, has the Constitutional usage of this country come to be so understood and settled? It has been so, at least as much by the perfect influence of our gracious Sovereign, as by the wisdom and firmness of Parliament, and by the expression of public opinion throughout the country. In all these matters the Queen has not only borne her part, but she has taken the lead in confirming and observing the Constitutional rules by which she should be guided; and it is owing to this that we are blessed with a Constitution in which the Sovereign is neither a mere dummy, nor, on the other hand, overshadows or takes an undue part in governing the affairs of the country. I do not know whether it may be the wish or the idea of some persons in this House, or out of it, that the Constitution of this country should be changed. It may be that in some places there are ideas abroad that a Constitutional Monarchy is not the best form of government, and that some form of Republic, or some powers given to a Parliamentary body or a Senate analogous to those in other countries, would be preferable. If such opinions are entertained, let them be discussed, and let us see what is the real feeling of the country. But, Sir, I act upon the assumption that we adhere to the Monarchical form of Government; and I maintain, with the utmost confidence, and with no qualification whatever, that Her Majesty fulfils in every particular the duties of a Constitutional Sovereign, such as we understand by that term. We have, as I have already pointed out, a safeguard in the character of the Sovereign; we have another safeguard, and it is one which ought not to be underrated—in the determination which, I am sure, will always animate the Parliaments of this country to maintain their just rights and Privileges. But it is not because we respect the Prerogatives and Privileges of the Queen, that we are, therefore, willing to tamper with the rights and Privileges of Parliament. It is not the way to show ourselves strong in defending our own

Privileges to be ready to catch at every word of gossip and at every insinuation of malice, from wheresoever it may come, and to put constructions of the worst character upon acts which in themselves are both innocent and Constitutional. I do not think that is the way in which the liberties of the country and the Privileges of Parliament are to be defended. I say we are to defend these Privileges by making ourselves respected in the country, by making ourselves strong, and the guardians of that Constitution of which we are no unimportant part. We were told just now that "there are no guardians of the public liberties; that the Cabinet is no guardian; that the Ministry is no guardian; that the House itself, overpowered as it is by a majority, is no guardian of them." I do not understand language of that sort. I do not understand why the minority of the House should be allowed to come forward to say that the majority cannot be regarded as the guardians of the public liberties, merely because they differ from the minority on particular questions. But I say that it is the duty of the minority, whenever they believe that the Prerogatives of the Crown are being unduly strained, or that the Privileges of Parliament are being encroached upon, it is their duty to come forward to state their views, and to press them publicly against the largest numerical majority, and trust to the progress of public opinion to enforce those views which they believe to be sound. That is what has been done, and what will continue to be done by the minority, if, upon any future occasion, they have specific grounds of complaint to go upon. But, Sir, I say that the sort of Motion which we have had submitted to-night—vague and uncertain—such a Motion as we are unable to grapple with—a very Proteus, changing its form as often as we come to close quarters with it—is neither likely to increase the respect in which this House is held by the country, nor to be of advantage to the Constitution under which we have the happiness to live.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I must confess that I have never been more perplexed since I have been in this House than by the proceedings in this House which have preceded and accompanied the moving of this Resolution. When I first read the Resolution of the hon. Member for Swansea, it did not appear to me to be particularly well framed, or particularly clear in the proposition which it was designed to enunciate. But having, as I thought, mastered the meaning of that Resolution, I was yesterday certainly astonished when my hon. Friend declared that it had taken him entirely by surprise to find that the Resolution of which he had given Notice was in any way supposed to be a Vote of Censure upon Her Majesty. It is extremely possible, and it has been contended by the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), that technically the Motion was not a Vote of Censure upon Her Majesty, because Her Majesty cannot be held responsible for any action whatever; and that, if it was a Vote of Censure at all, it would have been a censure upon the Advisers of the Crown. But certainly the impression conveyed by the terms of the Resolution imported censure upon certain proceedings of Her Majesty in her personal capacity, which, by some evil advice, she had been induced to take; and, therefore, I cannot understand how it can have so much astonished my hon. Friend to learn that it was regarded as a direct Vote of Censure upon the Queen. My perplexity was still further increased when I heard him say that he was prepared to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), and when I found the effect of that Amendment to be not a very considerable alteration from the terms of the original Resolution. Sir, that Resolution has now become a sort of vague Vote of Censure upon the Government in respect of several matters which have already been under the consideration of the House; and that which yesterday was the principal allegation of the Resolution—namely, that there had been personal interference on the part of the Sovereign—has now been remitted to a secondary and comparatively insignificant position. I cannot think that these proceedings are at all convenient to the House, because I think that when matters of this importance are dealt with by the House, they ought to be dealt with after due consideration, and after the bearings of the Resolution affecting them have been fully considered, and that time should be given to the House for fully considering the bearings of the Resolution, as well as for making Amendments. No one can doubt for a moment the importance of the issue raised by the Motion of the hon. Member; but I am still in some perplexity as to what that issue is. But while there is no doubt as to the importance of the subject, there will be much difference of opinion as to the expediency of its being made at all, either in the form proposed yesterday or in that which it has assumed to-day. Our Constitution contains a great variety of forces, not necessarily opposing forces, but which may occasionally find themselves in opposition to each other, and which are kept in balance by a variety of checks, not the result of any preconceived theories, but of the practice and experience of generations, a great many of which are the outcome of prolonged, severe, and hazardous struggles. The relations of the two Houses of Parliament to each other, the relations of Parliament and the Executive Government to the Crown, all these points have been settled in a manner which it would be very easy to show is not theoretically perfect, but yet, after various adjustments, have been found in practice to work sufficiently well. In my opinion, it is not expedient, without adequate cause, that Parliament should be excited to examine the mechanism of the Constitution, and to raise, by calling attention to them, difficulties in the friction which would not otherwise be found out. Reference has been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard, in his speech to-night, to that prolonged contest which took place between George III. and the political Parties in Parliament—a contest which was waged in support, on the one hand, of the claim of personal government, and, on the other, in support of the Privileges of Parliament. That was one of the most prolonged and one of the most severe struggles through which our Constitution has passed. It would be, perhaps, rash to say that no similar struggle can ever, under any circumstances, be waged again between the different powers of the Constitution; but I think it is safe to say that that contest can never be waged again under the same or under similar circumstances. That was at the time of nomination boroughs and of other constituencies which were extremely small, when the Crown was in possession of almost unlimited patronage. It was possible for the Sovereign, as George III. did, to dictate his own policy to his Ministers, to dismiss his Ministry when he objected to their policy, and sometimes to defeat his own Ministers in Parliament by means of his own personal influence. But the circumstances under which that action of the Sovereign was exercised are entirely gone, the position is entirely changed; and no conflict between the Crown and Parliament can ever be waged at the present time in circumstances even remotely similar to those to which my hon. Friend referred. But even at the time when the conflicts between the Crown and the political Parties were constant, I think it will be found, upon examination, that no Parliamentary action was ever taken, except on grounds most distinctly stated, or except on grounds the existence of which was perfectly notorious. Now, Sir, have any such grounds for Parliamentary action been alleged in the present case, or is there any such notorious interposition of the Sovereign in matters of policy as would warrant the absence of specific statements in the Motion which has been made? In my opinion, my hon. Friends who moved and seconded this Resolution have confused two issues which are altogether and totally distinct. They have confused the charges which have been brought from this side of the House from time to time against Her Majesty's Government of an abuse of the powers of the Crown with charges of a different, of an altogether different description. We, on this side of the House, have thought it necessary, and I have myself been a party to it on every occasion, to challenge the exercise of the Prerogative of the Crown by Her Majesty's present Advisers in the case of the removal of the Indian troops; again, in the case of Anglo-Turkish Convention; and, again, in the proceedings, without the knowledge of Parliament, which led to the Afghan War. We have contended that in every one of these cases the Prerogative and the powers of the Crown have been abused by Her Majesty's Government. I think that we took a right course in raising every one of those issues in detail and separately. I think we should have failed in our duty to the House and the country if we had acted otherwise. But, as has been pointed out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich

(Mr. Gladstone), these issues have been decided in every instance against us by this House. Although we are not content to consider that decision as a final one, there is but one tribunal to which it is possible for us to make an appeal. It is competent for us, and we shall, I hope, appeal from the judgment of the House to the judgment of the constituencies whenever we have the opportunity. But, on the other hand, I must agree with my right hon. Friend that there is no practical object to be attained in raising again collectively in this House charges which have been heard in detail, and which, so far as this House was competent to decide them, have been decided against us. But with these issues which we have raised, and which my hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) and I have together been parties to raising, my hon. Friend has mixed up the question which has excited—I do not say unnecessarily excited—considerable attention in the mind of the country generally, the question which goes, for want of a better name, by the name of the revival of personal government. What instances have been brought forward by my hon. Friend in support of the allegation which was conveyed in the Resolution, as it stood on the Paper yesterday, that there has been a direct interposition on the part of the Crown in matters of Indian and foreign policy, or in support of the insinuation contained in the Resolution moved to-day, that there has been a supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign? I listened carefully to the speeches; but I must say that in the historical narrative of recent events which was given by my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), and in the historical disquisition of my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), I was only able to detect two allegations brought forward in support of this supposed personal interposition. One of them has been very fully dealt with, and I think, on the whole, very satisfactorily dealt with, by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, in the speech which he has just made. I am not here to defend the answer given in the first instance when the question was first put. I think, on further consideration, it should have occurred to the Government that it was not altogether right that they should say that they had no knowledge of correspondence between the Sovereign and the Viceroy, and should appear to treat the question as a matter which could have no concern either for them or for Parliament. I think, if the full explanation given to-night had been given at the time, we might probably have avoided a great deal of misapprehension. I wish the right hon. Gentleman had entered as fully into an explanation of what has taken place in the matter of the alleged correspondence with Sir Bartle Frere and with Lady Frere. I cannot say, with the facts before us, that I see anything which need necessarily excite Constitutional jealousy in that correspondence. We have not seen the letter which, it is said, has been written to Lady Frere. If a letter has been written, I think it is extremely probable that it is due to those causes which have been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, and that it is a letter of sympathy, not at all expressing an opinion of Her Majesty, or of Her Majesty's Government, upon any of the difficult questions to be settled in the Colony. I must say I think if such a letter has been written that great blame is due, not to Her Majesty for having written it—for I have no doubt, if we knew its contents, that it would do her nothing but honour—but great blame is due to someone in Africa for the use to which that letter has been put; and that that letter, whatever its contents, should be allowed to be spoken of by the Colonial Press as a letter which had stimulated the opinions of political combatants in the Colony is, I think, a use of that letter extremely to be deprecated, and extremely wrong to have allowed. But, Sir, I cannot say, in either of these cases to which reference has been made, do I see the slightest ground for affirming that Her Majesty has departed from the Constitutional practice which she has almost throughout the whole of her Reign observed. While I entirely agree that no sufficient proof has been brought forward of the alleged personal exercise of Prerogative by Her Majesty, I cannot sit down without stating my conviction that if stronger proof had been forthcoming, and any exercise of Prerogative had been proved, it would have been matter calling for very grave and very serious notice. I do not think that we can, either in the interests of our own Privileges or in the interests of the Crown itself, afford to abate one jot of our Constitutional jealousy, or one jot of the doctrine that for every act of the Sovereign some Adviser of the Crown must be held responsible. It is useless to deny that there does exist in the country some vague uneasiness as to impending changes in our Constitutional relations. The right hon. Gentleman asked us just now whether anybody desired that the Constitution should be changed, and I thought that he spoke with almost too great an alacrity of his willingness to enter into discussion of any propositions which might be brought forward. But, Sir, there is no doubt that there is some, though, I grant, a vague uneasiness as to the possibility of impending changes. I will not, at this hour, go into what I believe to be the causes of that uneasiness—the subject, if discussed here, should be fully discussed, and it is useless to go into it at this hour. But, Sir, there is no doubt that men of great ability, in periodicals of much political influence, have put forward doctrines respecting the relations of the Executive to Parliament and the Crown which are altogether contrary to the doctrines which have been generally held on both sides of this House. Those doctrines, so put forward, have been met as I think they ought to have been met. They have been very fully discussed in the Press and out-of-doors. I do not think it is incumbent upon this House to discuss abstract theories about our Constitution, or about changes in our Constitution, however influential may be the exponents of such theories, or however much ability may be shown in supporting them. This House is only called upon, in my opinion, to act, and can only act with effect, to put such theories into action. Some attempt has been made to-night to show that a commencement has already been made in the policy which I have indicated. In my opinion, my hon. Friend has been led away by false and unnecessary alarm. I think the House, by agreeing to the Resolution which he has moved, and by showing unnecessary anxiety and want of confidence in its own position and in its own powers, would rather impair than strengthen the Privileges which it is the duty of this House to guard, and would, at the same time, imperil those relations with the Crown which, next to its own Privileges, it is its duty and its main object to maintain. As to the vote that I intend to give, I am sorry that, on account of the unexpected change in the Resolution, it is impossible for my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) to move his Amendment. That Amendment, in my opinion, very distinctly and very sufficiently met the allegations which were contained in the original Resolution. It is, I think, to be regretted, when a Constitutional question of this kind has been raised, that it should be met by a direct negative, and that nothing should be left upon the Records of the House to show the view the House takes upon the subject. I regret, for the same reason, that the Government have not thought it possible for them to meet it with a Resolution which would have expressed the opinion of the House on the point raised. I think, when a Constitutional question of this sort is raised, it is right to have some expression of the opinion of this House. But I entirely agree with all that was said by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) as to why it was impossible for him to support the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea. I will not repeat his arguments; but I must say that, although on the grounds of the inexpediency of the Motion, and of its being ill-timed, I might, under ordinary circumstances, have been disposed to take no part in the issue so raised, yet that there are still in this Resolution words which make it impossible for me to refrain from expressing by my vote the opinion I hold on the question at issue. The Resolution still contains, although in a secondary position, the words "the supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign." Now, as the Resolution cannot be amended, I cannot refrain from expressing by my vote the opinion which I hold, that no proof has been forthcoming to-night to justify the assent of this House, either directly or indirectly, to the assertion that there has been any such personal interposition on the part of the Sovereign; and as there is no Amendment which more clearly expresses the opinion I hold on the question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), I have no alternative but to vote with Her Majesty's Government against the Motion.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I shall not intervene for more than two minutes between the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) and this House; but one remark fell from the noble Lord which, I think, I am bound to answer. The noble Lord has observed that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made no allusion to the letter which is supposed to have been written by Her Majesty to Lady Frere, nor to the message sent to Lady Frere. I have to say, on behalf of my right hon. Friend, that the only reason why he did not allude to it was because he thought, after what had taken place, that there really was no serious suggestion made with regard to what was said in the message which went from the Crown to Lady Frere. Therefore, he did not allude to it, or make the statement which he had received authority to make. But as the noble Lord has pointed out that no allusion has been made to it, I think it only right that I should state at once to the House the information which I have received the authority of Her Majesty to-day to state. In that communication to Lady Frere—although, as I think Her Majesty was bound to do, she did express the deepest sympathy for Sir Bartle Frere in all the difficulties and dangers and troubles with which he had to contend, her letter of sympathy was couched in the most general terms; and there was nothing in it, either one way or the other, which should lead him to believe that Her Majesty wished to recommend any line of policy. I think it is only right to say that, and I think my noble Friend will agree with me that it is due alike to Her Majesty, and the House and the country, that that should be openly stated.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, at this late hour, after the apologies of the Home Secretary, and the perplexities of the noble Lord, and the statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he is ready to consider any proposal for the amendment of the Constitution, it is impossible that this question should be properly discussed, and, therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER seconded the Motion.

The Marquess of Hartington

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir Robert Peel.)

The House divided:—Ayes 46; Noes 347: Majority 301.—(Div. List, No. 91.)

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MAJOR NOLAN said, that his hon. Friend the Member for County Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), who had seconded the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, represented a county which contained a very large number of inhabitants. As he (Major Nolan) represented a neighbouring county with a similar population, he ventured again to urge the necessity for adjourning the debate. In the first place, this was a most important question; and, secondly, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) wished to address the House upon it. The right hon. Baronet had only given way to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had insisted upon speaking when he rose. For these reasons, and as the right hon. Baronet had been precluded up to that time from taking any part in the debate, he thought it should be adjourned. The right hon. Baronet was one of those Members who were listened to by the House with the greatest attention, and the fact of his being precluded from speaking constituted a reasonable cause for the adjournment of the debate. He therefore begged to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Major Nolan.)

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) having referred to him, he felt bound to offer some observations upon this subject, which he considered to be one of absolute importance to the country. The House had heard apologies from the Secretary of State, and expressions of bewilderment from the noble Lord who led a section of the Liberal Party in that House, with regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). Nothing definite had, however, been arrived at, although the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that Her Majesty's Government were quite prepared to entertain any proposition which might be started concerning it. This being the case, he thought that it would become a very serious question if this matter of the Prerogative of the Crown were raised out-of-doors, for a feeling was growing up that something was going on which the people did not understand. It was all very well to lay stress upon what were called letters of condolence from Her Majesty to Lady Frere. No one in that House questioned the character or the qualities of the Sovereign, or her right to express her feelings of condolence to Lady Frere in the position in which she had been placed. But there was something behind—and it was a question of confidence in the policy which this country pursued. He had no hesitation in saying that the policy followed in South Africa at this moment was one which would meet with the reprobation of the country. The Government had admitted that the war was both unjust and unnecessary. The question which had been raised by the hon. Member for Swansea was one which had been more than once previously raised in this country, and had met its reprobation. It was not met with sneers when Mr. Dunning raised it in 1780, but it was carried by a majority; and, again, in 1820, when Mr. Brougham raised the question, it was not met in the way which it had now been. Mr. Fox, speaking early in the century of the Prerogatives of the Crown, said—

"You talk about bringing proof of that which is an intangible thing; but, nevertheless, is a thing which may work invisible, but incalculable, mischief to this country."

That was precisely what many people in the country and in that House felt at the present moment. There was, undoubtedly, an uneasy feeling abroad—it was impossible to deny it—and he considered that, for the purpose of freely and fully discussing the matter, they ought more fully to debate the question raised by the hon. Member for Swansea. The speech that he had heard that night from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had fairly astonished him. He would have given anything to have risen after that right hon. Gentleman. When he recalled to his recollection what the right hon. Gentleman said in the country last autumn—how, over and over again, he reiterated that the Government had put the Sovereign above and beyond the Constitution—and then, when he saw the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich get up and make that shabby, flabby speech to-night, pretending that he had not had time to consider the Motion, he was astonished. Time to consider the Motion by the right hon. Gentleman, who could speak by the yard, without notice or hesitation! It was idle to bring forward such a pretence as that. Then, as to the noble Lord, he might tell him that there was no chance of “squelching” that debate, for the subject only excited too much feeling in the country. If a meeting were got up in London, as it might be, in Exeter Hall, or in any of those places, and a half-dozen Members of Parliament were present, they could readily raise a feeling which would show that this debate was not to be squelched. He approved of the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway, and agreed with the necessity of postponing the discussion of a question which was regarded of the utmost importance out-of-doors.

MR. O’CONNOR POWER supported the Motion for adjournment. With regard to the explanation of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies with reference to the letter to Lady Frere, he would point out that when the Question was originally asked about that letter it was scarcely noticed by the right hon. Baronet. If the Government had stated at an early day that this letter was not intended to endorse any line of policy, he ventured to say that the public feeling would not have been excited on the matter. In his answer to that Question, the right hon. Baronet only stated that the Government had no knowledge of the existence of such a letter. But he must remind him that it was his business, as a Member of the Cabinet, to have such knowledge. It was his business, when a Question was put upon the Paper of that House, to ascertain all the circumstances of the matter. From the Question being put down upon the Paper, the Government would know that they were likely to be challenged upon the subject, and it was the duty of the Secretary of State for the Colonies to have knowledge of the existence of the document,

Sir Robert Peel

Instead of that, the right hon. Gentleman had disposed of the matter in a very summary manner; but when the subject came to be debated in the House, the Home Secretary got up and made an apology, which he would venture to say would sway the votes of 40 or 50 hon. Members. He did not think that that was a business-like way of dealing with the question, nor that the public, who took a great interest in this subject, would consider it a right course. Under these circumstances, he trusted that the House would say that the Motion for the adjournment was one which only showed a proper desire for the discussion of this question, and that it was one that ought to be acceded to.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK observed, that at the time right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth rose to move the adjournment of the House the clock stood at 5 minutes past 1, and there was ample time for him to express his views. The right hon. Baronet had used terms with reference to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich which he thought everyone must consider would be more properly applied to the speech of the right hon. Baronet himself. On this occasion, he had taken the opportunity of escaping from the embarrassment in which he found himself by moving the adjournment of the House. But the House was perfectly willing to hear the right hon. Baronet, if he had thought to address it, after the right hon. Member for Greenwich. He thought that the patience and consideration with which the speech of the right hon. Baronet had just been listened to showed that the House would have been willing to have heard him at any hour. It seemed to him that both the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, had discharged themselves of the utterances with which they were charged, and that, therefore, there was no occasion whatever for the adjournment of the debate. He trusted that the House would not accede to the Motion.

Question put.

The House divided.—Ayes 43; Noes 307: Majority 264.—(Div. List, No. 92.)

Question again proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

Mr. O'SULLIVAN begged to move the adjournment of the debate. He said, that however willing the House was to listen to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, the country was also anxious to know what he said, and at that hour it would be impossible for anything that he uttered to go beyond the walls of that House. He hoped the House would see the futility of protracting this matter, because at 7 o'clock in the morning hon. Members would be found as fresh to move the adjournment of this debate as they were at the present time, and the matter would only result in the same way as the debate on the Sunday Closing Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. O'Sullivan.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The House has now, by two Divisions, expressed its opinion that it is desirable to continue this debate. When the House, by such majorities, affirms its desire, it is to be taken for granted that the House will be patient enough to listen to any hon. Gentleman who wishes to address it on this Motion. But, seeing that the promoters of the Motion are most anxious for the adjournment of the debate, I do not know why we should not be justified in putting this construction upon their conduct—that they shrink from challenging the opinion of the House upon the question that they have submitted to it. Whether that be so or not, it is quite clear that it would be only a waste of time to divide the House upon repeated Motions for adjournment; and, therefore, I shall offer no opposition to the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Tuesday next.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that he had a Motion on the Paper with reference to this subject, and as it was impossible now to bring it on, he had to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it might be again postponed. He now found himself in a worse position than he was last week when the matter came on; and he, therefore, ventured to repeat his appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give him another opportunity for bringing on the Motion. If the right hon. Gentleman would permit him to offer a suggestion, he would ask whether it would be possible for him to bring forward this Bill upon Thursday next? If the right hon. Gentleman could allow him to bring forward the Motion about 11, or half-past, it would be a great convenience, as the Motion was not one which it was desirable to have hanging over, inasmuch as there was a great amount of misrepresentation with regard to the Bill being circulated about the country. It was, therefore, desirable that it should be taken on as early a day as possible.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he should be happy to give the hon. Member another opportunity of bringing forward his Bill, and that he thought he could promise him either Thursday or Monday next. He gathered from his observations that Thursday would suit him, and, if possible, he should have that day, and if not, Monday.

THE O'CONOR DON moved that his Motion be postponed till Thursday.

Motion agreed to.

WORMWOOD SCRUBS REGULATION

BILL.—[BILL 96.]

(Colonel Lindsay, Mr. Secretary Stanley, Lord Eustace Cecil.)

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Shaw Lefevre be a Member of the Select Committee on the Bill."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that he was surprised that the Motion should be brought on. No one had been consulted with regard to this matter; and it was without parallel, in so far as he knew, for a Committee to be nominated consisting of three Members from one side and only one from the other. Under these circumstances, he moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY did not know that there was any opposition to the Motion, but it was understood that everyone was agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

country an impression that encroachments were being made by Monarchical or Ministerial authority, or both; and the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) echoed very much the same sentiments. He said there was a feeling of jealousy with regard to the influence of the Crown, and that if we read the newspapers, we should see that such impression was abroad. I am upon this point happy to be able to confirm the opinion which he has expressed; for it has happened that, in reading a newspaper this evening, I found the following words—I am quoting from The Echo:—

“But occasionally we have significant indications that the Crown is acting as permanent head of the Cabinet, or rather of the small Cabinet inside the larger one. Her Majesty sent a despatch to Lord Lytton, so lengthy that the cost of telegraphing it was 1,400 rupees. Then we have the elaborate message to Lord Chelmsford, and the still more recent one to Lady Frere.”

Now, this is the sort of statement which goes forth in columns widely circulated for the instruction of the public. If hon. Members will consider it for a moment, they will see that, even assuming the correctness of the charges brought against us here, these charges thus made in the Press are totally unfounded. The charge made in the Question put by the hon. Member for Swansea some weeks ago, upon which this Motion was raised, did not relate to any telegraphic despatch sent by Her Majesty to Lord Lytton, but related to a telegraphic communication said to have been despatched from Lord Lytton to Her Majesty. That is a very different case, because it is quite possible and highly probable that there may have been communications as to matters of fact made by the Viceroy to the Queen; while, on the other hand, telegrams from the Queen to Lord Lytton might bear a different construction. But this is a matter upon which I shall trouble the House for a few moments, because it is the only serious one brought forward in this discussion. We have heard a good deal about the telegrams to Lord Chelmsford and to Lady Frere, and this is a matter as to which I think the answer commends itself to the common sense of the House. At a moment of great anxiety; at a moment when Her Majesty's troops had met with an unfortunate reverse; when there had been great loss of life, and great concern was naturally felt on the part of Her Majesty; at a time, too, when the Government were so far from expressing their censure or their want of confidence in their Agents or Ministers in South Africa, that they felt it to be their duty to defend them, and retain them in the responsible positions which they filled; Her Majesty, always ready with a kind word, sent a message in the most general terms of sympathy, and at the same time conveyed an expression of confidence that her troops would redeem themselves from the difficulties in which they were placed, and that her Administrator and Governor would be able to bring them out of the difficulties of their situation. There is really nothing in that which can in any way whatever be found fault with, nor do I believe that anybody has made it the subject of a serious charge. But with regard to the case of the Indian telegram, I am bound to say that it is a matter which requires a moment's consideration. This charge originates in a very remarkable article contributed to one of the numerous periodicals of the day by a gentleman whose name is very well known to us all as a special correspondent of one of the newspapers, and an admirable writer, whose descriptions we all read with interest and pleasure—Mr. Archibald Forbes. Whether he is an equally great Constitutional authority is, of course, another question. He is a gentleman with whose name we all are familiar, but of whom I have no personal knowledge. The article is entitled “Some Plain Words about the Afghanistan Question,” and gives an account of what he has gathered to be the history and origin of that war. He says that Lord Lytton was desirous of bringing about a quarrel with the Ameer Shere Ali, and, of course, of pressing his view upon the Home Government, who, according to Mr. Archibald Forbes, were unable to see the necessity for hostilities with Afghanistan. Mr. Forbes proceeds to say—

“While working in this fashion on his own account, Lord Lytton was pleading with Lord Cranbrook for his sanction to an immediate Declaration of War.”

And after a few more sentences he adds—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

(May 13, 1879)

"Nor did he confine his communications to the Constitutional channel. It is not generally known, but it is nevertheless true, that the Viceroy of India has maintained direct communication in the Anglo-Afghan affair with Her Majesty the Queen. How copious this must have been may be judged from the fact that the telegram sent upon this great and difficult case was so long that the cost was 11,000 rupees."

These words are in italics, and a great writer does not usually make use of italics unless he wishes to direct particular attention to that about which he is writing. It is obvious that the meaning of the paragraph is this—that Lord Lytton, desiring to bring about the acceptance of a certain policy with Her Majesty's Ministers at home, and finding himself unable to persuade them by his arguments, addressed himself directly to the Queen, that he might obtain Her Majesty's support in order to carry his object. Now, that, if true, is a serious charge, and one which undoubtedly trenches upon the Privileges of Parliament and the Constitution of the country. But, Sir, there is no foundation whatever for such a statement. It is perfectly true that a long telegram was sent by Lord Lytton to Her Majesty; but what was the date of that message, and to what circumstances did it refer? I have been favoured by Her Majesty with a sight of that telegram, and am perfectly acquainted with it, and it is at this moment in my possession. I will describe its nature and purport. In the first place, its date is the 26th of November; the advance of the Forces had begun five days previously—that is, on the 21st of November—and the telegram which Lord Lytton addressed to Her Majesty described in tolerably succinct phrases the advance of the various columns of Her Majesty's Forces. He begins by saying that they advanced on the morning of the 21st of November, under Generals Biddulph and Roberts, and the nature of their instructions is mentioned for the information of Her Majesty. There is not one word upon the causes of the war; there is not one word with regard to political matters; it is only a telegram sent by the Viceroy at the moment when the movement took place, in order that Her Majesty might receive early and authentic intelligence of that which had taken place. That is the whole explanation of this mysterious telegram, in reply to which Her Majesty simply expressed her gratification at hearing of the success which had attended her troops. The telegram was not sent by Her Majesty without being first submitted to, and approved by her Minister. I ask what does the House consider to be the position—what does it consider to be the rights and duties of the Sovereign? Is the House of opinion that it is improper that Her Majesty should be in any way in the receipt of intelligence as to important and interesting events which are going on? Is the House of opinion that Her Majesty should not write a private letter, or express any opinion of her own upon any matter which seems to call for the expression of sympathy with those who are in trouble? Is it possible to suppose that one who has held, and continues to hold, so important a position as the Queen of England; one who has had her experience; one who is called upon from time to time to admonish and to advise; whose right it is, as the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) has said, "to be consulted, to encourage, and to warn," are we to be told that she is to be deprived of all information as to the real state of affairs, or as to the real state of feeling in this country or anywhere else? Sir, I maintain this position to be utterly untenable. We have, in some of the language used to-night, heard to what absurd and ridiculous lengths this case has been carried. It would appear that Her Majesty ought not to be informed as to the details of what passes in this House, or what passes in the Cabinet; and other like doctrines have been advanced in a way which makes us really wonder at the views which hon. Members opposite entertain. But I think we may say, in answer to all these charges, that the character and the history of the present Reign and of the present Sovereign are in themselves a sufficient refutation. We need not appeal to any evidence but that which we ourselves possess; but if it were necessary to do so, I would say—Go to what country you please, to France, Italy, America, or where you may, and listen to the language in which the Sovereign of Great Britain is spoken of. Everywhere you will hear the same uniform eulogium upon the private virtues and conduct of the Queen and upon her high Constitutional character. I venture to say there has never been in the annals

Crown.—Resolution.

310

naking for a issue em-city ile re
:

of this country a Sovereign who has more loyally justified the position which Her Majesty occupies as a Constitutional Sovereign. The hon. Member for Swansea, in his original Motion, told us that certain action was not in accordance with Constitutional usage "as now understood and settled." But how, and by whom, has the Constitutional usage of this country come to be so understood and settled? It has been so, at least as much by the perfect influence of our gracious Sovereign, as by the wisdom and firmness of Parliament, and by the expression of public opinion throughout the country. In all these matters the Queen has not only borne her part, but she has taken the lead in confirming and observing the Constitutional rules by which she should be guided; and it is owing to this that we are blessed with a Constitution in which the Sovereign is neither a mere dummy, nor, on the other hand, overshadows or takes an undue part in governing the affairs of the country. I do not know whether it may be the wish or the idea of some persons in this House, or out of it, that the Constitution of this country should be changed. It may be that in some places there are ideas abroad that a Constitutional Monarchy is not the best form of government, and that some form of Republic, or some powers given to a Parliamentary body or a Senate analogous to those in other countries, would be preferable. If such opinions are entertained, let them be discussed, and let us see what is the real feeling of the country. But, Sir, I act upon the assumption that we adhere to the Monarchical form of Government; and I maintain, with the utmost confidence, and with no qualification whatever, that Her Majesty fulfils in every particular the duties of a Constitutional Sovereign, such as we understand by that term. We have, as I have already pointed out, a safeguard in the character of the Sovereign; we have another safeguard, and it is one which ought not to be underrated—in the determination which, I am sure, will always animate the Parliaments of this country to maintain their just rights and Privileges. But it is not because we respect the Prerogatives and Privileges of the Queen, that we are, therefore, willing to tamper with the rights and Privileges of Parliament. It is not the way to show ourselves strong in defending our own

Privileges to be ready to catch at every word of gossip and at every insinuation of malice, from wheresoever it may come, and to put constructions of the worst character upon acts which in themselves are both innocent and Constitutional. I do not think that is the way in which the liberties of the country and the Privileges of Parliament are to be defended. I say we are to defend these Privileges by making ourselves respected in the country, by making ourselves strong, and the guardians of that Constitution of which we are no unimportant part. We were told just now that "there are no guardians of the public liberties; that the Cabinet is no guardian; that the Ministry is no guardian; that the House itself, overpowered as it is by a majority, is no guardian of them." I do not understand language of that sort. I do not understand why the minority of the House should be allowed to come forward to say that the majority cannot be regarded as the guardians of the public liberties, merely because they differ from the minority on particular questions. But I say that it is the duty of the minority, whenever they believe that the Prerogatives of the Crown are being unduly strained, or that the Privileges of Parliament are being encroached upon, it is their duty to come forward to state their views, and to press them publicly against the largest numerical majority, and trust to the progress of public opinion to enforce those views which they believe to be sound. That is what has been done, and what will continue to be done by the minority, if, upon any future occasion, they have specific grounds of complaint to go upon. But, Sir, I say that the sort of Motion which we have had submitted to-night—vague and uncertain—such a Motion as we are unable to grapple with—a very Proteus, changing its form as often as we come to close quarters with it—is neither likely to increase the respect in which this House is held by the country, nor to be of advantage to the Constitution under which we have the happiness to live.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I must confess that I have never been more perplexed since I have been in this House than by the proceedings in this House which have preceded and accompanied the moving of this Resolution. When I first read the Resolution of the hon. Member for Swansea, it did not appear to me to be particularly well framed, or particularly clear in the proposition which it was designed to enunciate. But having, as I thought, mastered the meaning of that Resolution, I was yesterday certainly astonished when my hon. Friend declared that it had taken him entirely by surprise to find that the Resolution of which he had given Notice was in any way supposed to be a Vote of Censure upon Her Majesty. It is extremely possible, and it has been contended by the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), that technically the Motion was not a Vote of Censure upon Her Majesty, because Her Majesty cannot be held responsible for any action whatever; and that, if it was a Vote of Censure at all, it would have been a censure upon the Advisers of the Crown. But certainly the impression conveyed by the terms of the Resolution imported censure upon certain proceedings of Her Majesty in her personal capacity, which, by some evil advice, she had been induced to take; and, therefore, I cannot understand how it can have so much astonished my hon. Friend to learn that it was regarded as a direct Vote of Censure upon the Queen. My perplexity was still further increased when I heard him say that he was prepared to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), and when I found the effect of that Amendment to be not a very considerable alteration from the terms of the original Resolution. Sir, that Resolution has now become a sort of vague Vote of Censure upon the Government in respect of several matters which have already been under the consideration of the House; and that which yesterday was the principal allegation of the Resolution—namely, that there had been personal interference on the part of the Sovereign—has now been remitted to a secondary and comparatively insignificant position. I cannot think that these proceedings are at all convenient to the House, because I think that when matters of this importance are dealt with by the House, they ought to be dealt with after due consideration, and after the bearings of the Resolution affecting them have been fully considered, and that time should be given to the House for fully considering the bearings of the Resolution, as well as for making Amendments. No one can doubt for a moment the importance of the issue raised by the Motion of the hon. Member; but I am still in some perplexity as to what that issue is. But while there is no doubt as to the importance of the subject, there will be much difference of opinion as to the expediency of its being made at all, either in the form proposed yesterday or in that which it has assumed to-day. Our Constitution contains a great variety of forces, not necessarily opposing forces, but which may occasionally find themselves in opposition to each other, and which are kept in balance by a variety of checks, not the result of any preconceived theories, but of the practice and experience of generations, a great many of which are the outcome of prolonged, severe, and hazardous struggles. The relations of the two Houses of Parliament to each other, the relations of Parliament and the Executive Government to the Crown, all these points have been settled in a manner which it would be very easy to show is not theoretically perfect, but yet, after various adjustments, have been found in practice to work sufficiently well. In my opinion, it is not expedient, without adequate cause, that Parliament should be excited to examine the mechanism of the Constitution, and to raise, by calling attention to them, difficulties in the friction which would not otherwise be found out. Reference has been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard, in his speech to-night, to that prolonged contest which took place between George III. and the political Parties in Parliament—a contest which was waged in support, on the one hand, of the claim of personal government, and, on the other, in support of the Privileges of Parliament. That was one of the most prolonged and one of the most severe struggles through which our Constitution has passed. It would be, perhaps, rash to say that no similar struggle can ever, under any circumstances, be waged again between the different powers of the Constitution; but I think it is safe to say that that contest can never be waged again under the same or under similar circumstances. That was at the time of nomination boroughs and of other constituencies which were extremely small, when the Crown was in possession of almost

Resolution, meant the Sovereign as advised by Her Ministers—the repository of the Executive power, the repository of the Prerogative. Many hon. Members seemed to think that the Prerogative was a sort of Divine institution, or something which originally belonged to the Monarchy or Sovereign whereas if they would look into the matter fully, they would find that even the most theoretical lawyers would admit that the Prerogative was nothing more nor less than that which was granted to the Sovereign to be used as a trust for the benefit of the people. The struggle between Prerogative on the one hand, and liberty on the other, had been constant, and this House had been the scene of the struggle; and it was only the following up of the traditions on the side of liberty in the past that justified his hon. Friend in making his present Motion. They need not recall the incidents connected with the commencement of the Afghan War, or of the removal of the troops to Malta, or the purchase of the Suez Canal Shares, or other matters of that sort; but he did ask the House to consider whether or not there did not seem to be on the part of both the front Benches a certain indifference to deal with the gradual infringement of the Crown by the advice of the Ministers on what he regarded as the Constitutional rights and privileges of this House? At this moment there were going on in Egypt negotiations of a delicate and important character to this country; but they had no Papers and no information respecting negotiations. Her Majesty's Government refused to give them any information later than the end of last year; but some day the Chancellor of the Exchequer would come over to the House, and they would suddenly learn that they had been committed to some new Guarantee, or that they had entered into some Treaty with France. He asked if it was possible long to maintain the right of the Crown to act in that way behind the back of this House and of the country, to commit the country to a large expenditure, and involve it in serious guarantees? How long was it likely that the country would stand a Prerogative so extensive? The effect of the proposition was that the mode and limits of the exercise of the Prerogative should be more strictly observed. That proposition was not disputed by the front

Bench, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich was unable to say that he disputed the proposition that the Prerogative, as assumed by the Government at the present moment, ought to be allowed to remain in its present position. He did not wonder that the right hon. Gentleman was indisposed to make a long speech on this question. He remembered that when the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Rylands) called attention to the treaty-making power of the Crown, the right hon. Gentleman jumped up to defend the Crown, as if the Treasury Bench were not sufficiently capable of doing that. In a few weeks afterwards, the right hon. Gentleman had occasion to retract his words; for, in the meantime, the Turkish Convention had been concluded. It was then found that his doctrines had become inconvenient. It was found that this country had entered into serious guarantees, and that the broad propositions laid down from the front Opposition Bench were no longer to be maintained with their full force and authority. The country would consider the unwillingness of the front Benches to deal with this question as significant. They would see that there was a change in the influence of the Crown which not only affected Ministers in power, but Members who were looking forward to power, and they would learn with satisfaction the protest which came from Members below the Gangway against this unjust assumption of the Prerogative on the part of the Crown acting on the advice of its Ministers. He felt that this occasion had not been a sufficient one to hammer out the question; but he would say that it was the duty of the Government to take care that incidents such as had recently occurred should not occur again. If it was true that a large sum of money had been paid for telegrams from the Viceroy of India to the Queen, it could not be that those telegrams were on matters of private business. They must have conveyed information concerning the political condition of the country. But a more serious thing than that was the fact that the telegrams sent with reference to Lord Chelmsford—sent by the Crown on the responsibility of a single Cabinet Minister—had had the practical effect of withdrawing from the consideration of the House the competency of Lord Chelmsford. He admitted it was dic-

Mr. E. Jenkins

between the Sovereign and the Viceroy, and should appear to treat the question as a matter which could have no concern either for them or for Parliament. I think, if the full explanation given to-night had been given at the time, we might probably have avoided a great deal of misapprehension. I wish the right hon. Gentleman had entered as fully into an explanation of what has taken place in the matter of the alleged correspondence with Sir Bartle Frere and with Lady Frere. I cannot say, with the facts before us, that I see anything which need necessarily excite Constitutional jealousy in that correspondence. We have not seen the letter which, it is said, has been written to Lady Frere. If a letter has been written, I think it is extremely probable that it is due to those causes which have been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, and that it is a letter of sympathy, not at all expressing an opinion of Her Majesty, or of Her Majesty's Government, upon any of the difficult questions to be settled in the Colony. I must say I think if such a letter has been written that great blame is due, not to Her Majesty for having written it—for I have no doubt, if we knew its contents, that it would do her nothing but honour—but great blame is due to someone in Africa for the use to which that letter has been put; and that that letter, whatever its contents, should be allowed to be spoken of by the Colonial Press as a letter which had stimulated the opinions of political combatants in the Colony is, I think, a use of that letter extremely to be deprecated, and extremely wrong to have allowed. But, Sir, I cannot say, in either of these cases to which reference has been made, do I see the slightest ground for affirming that Her Majesty has departed from the Constitutional practice which she has almost throughout the whole of her Reign observed. While I entirely agree that no sufficient proof has been brought forward of the alleged personal exercise of Prerogative by Her Majesty, I cannot sit down without stating my conviction that if stronger proof had been forthcoming, and any exercise of Prerogative had been proved, it would have been matter calling for very grave and very serious notice. I do not think that we can, either in the interests of our own Privileges or in the interests of the Crown itself, afford to abate one jot of our Constitutional jealousy, or one jot of the doctrine that for every act of the Sovereign some Adviser of the Crown must be held responsible. It is useless to deny that there does exist in the country some vague uneasiness as to impending changes in our Constitutional relations. The right hon. Gentleman asked us just now whether anybody desired that the Constitution should be changed, and I thought that he spoke with almost too great an alacrity of his willingness to enter into discussion of any propositions which might be brought forward. But, Sir, there is no doubt that there is some, though, I grant, a vague uneasiness as to the possibility of impending changes. I will not, at this hour, go into what I believe to be the causes of that uneasiness—the subject, if discussed here, should be fully discussed, and it is useless to go into it at this hour. But, Sir, there is no doubt that men of great ability, in periodicals of much political influence, have put forward doctrines respecting the relations of the Executive to Parliament and the Crown which are altogether contrary to the doctrines which have been generally held on both sides of this House. Those doctrines, so put forward, have been met as I think they ought to have been met. They have been very fully discussed in the Press and out-of-doors. I do not think it is incumbent upon this House to discuss abstract theories about our Constitution, or about changes in our Constitution, however influential may be the exponents of such theories, or however much ability may be shown in supporting them. This House is only called upon, in my opinion, to act, and can only act with effect, to put such theories into action. Some attempt has been made to-night to show that a commencement has already been made in the policy which I have indicated. In my opinion, my hon. Friend has been led away by false and unnecessary alarm. I think the House, by agreeing to the Resolution which he has moved, and by showing unnecessary anxiety and want of confidence in its own position and in its own powers, would rather impair than strengthen the Privileges which it is the duty of this House to guard, and would, at the now that the people were beginning to pay some of the penalties of that policy, shelter themselves behind "Court influence and personal government." The people who were responsible for this policy were the people of England themselves. If the Government had not been supported by the people, the policy which had been carried out could never have been persisted in. [Ministerial cheers.] That statement was cheered from the Conservative Benches, and he should repeat it again and again in the country, because up to the present time thousands of lives were sacrificed and millions of treasure were being wasted. Do not let the people of this country, like the people of France, attempt to shift the responsibility from themselves. If they had not been in favour of this so-called Imperial aggressive policy, that policy would never have been carried out. It was said that this Ministry was supported by the Court as against the wishes of the people. Nothing of the kind. When the Government found their policy resisted by the opinion of the country, the Government yielded at once. What did they see last autumn? The Government was then at the height of its power. The Government announced that they were going to give some English money to the people of Turkey; but within a few hours they withdrew that announcement. Why did they do so? Because they, like any other English Government, knew that they must submit to the popular view. Therefore, he thought there was a great deal of exaggeration about this Court influence. Let them encourage in the people this belief, which was, he believed, a true belief, that in them was centred all political power; and if the Government acted wrongly, it was their fault if those wrong acts were committed. He should have been delighted to express his opinion on some of the questions raised in this debate. That he hoped to be able to do on some future occasion. His hon. Friends who sat around him must not suppose that he differed from them in principle; but, whether right or wrong, he could not come to any other conclusion than that, as the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea had been suddenly changed, it was better that he should not intrude upon the House the Amendment he had intended to move, or take any part in the Division.

Mr. Fawcett

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I regret very much to stand between the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) and the House, and I regret it still more because I gather from some voices behind me that an impression prevails that there is something irregular in my addressing the House a second time to-night. In point of fact, I have only said a few words, and those not upon the present Motion, but upon the original Motion presented to the House by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), and those few words were only used in order to explain why at that time I did not think it my duty or convenient to enter upon the question. I feel that it is now full late for a speech to be delivered from this Bench in answer to the charges which have been made, and as to which we are peculiarly responsible; and I think I should not be doing my duty if, after what has recently been said, I should any longer delay in addressing the House. I waited until I should hear the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), because I felt, under the peculiar circumstances of the debate, that he was the real author of the Motion now before the House. The hon. Member for Swansea, as we have been reminded, gave Notice of his Resolution some weeks ago; and it was not until the hon. Member for Dundee gave Notice last night of an Amendment of an important character upon that Resolution that the hon. Member for Swansea changed the wording of his Motion. Well, Sir, it is not convenient that the wording of a Motion should be changed suddenly; but it is still less convenient if a change is made for the reason assigned by the hon. Member for Swansea. The reason put forward by him was that he found that the Motion of which he had given Notice was misconstrued, and that it was understood to bear a meaning which he never intended it should bear—namely, that he was intending to move a Resolution conveying a Censure upon Her Majesty the Queen, and that it was in order to get rid of that unfortunate misunderstanding that he agreed to change the wording of his Resolution. I fully accept, and everyone who knows the hon. Gentleman would be prepared to accept in the largest measure, his disclaimer of the intention to make any charge of a personal character upon Her

Majesty the Queen. But I think no one can have watched the course even of this debate, and that no one can have observed the language which has been held out-of-doors during the time that the Motion has been upon the Paper, without seeing that whatever was the intention of the Mover, at all events the impression conveyed to many minds and to the public was that the conduct of the Queen was charged as unconstitutional by the Motion; and I rejoice to find, and we all rejoice to find, that such was not the intention of the hon. Member for Swansea or the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney). Still, we feel it is indispensably necessary that we should, in the most distinct and most emphatic manner, repudiate and rebut the charge which has been brought against Her Majesty. The Amendment of which the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had given Notice was an Amendment which seemed to me of the kind that we might have accepted; because, whether we were fully satisfied with it or not, it in substance appeared fairly to traverse the Motion originally intended to be made by the hon. Member for Swansea. His Motion was understood to raise the question as to whether Her Majesty had interfered in the foreign or in the Indian policy of the country without proper Constitutional resort to the advice of her Ministers, and the hon. Member for Hackney had proposed to say that there was no evidence of her having so acted. That Motion has been changed, and the Mover disclaims an intention to make a charge against the Sovereign; but still he does not, as it seems to me, withdraw the imputation, neither does the amended Motion lead at all to the satisfactory conclusion that there is no charge of interference on the part of the Crown in the State policy of the country; while it does import into the question another element, and one which it is impossible we should altogether pass over and ignore. It imports into this Resolution that which was hardly in the original Resolution—a distinct Vote of Censure upon the Government. That undoubtedly places us in a position of embarrassment, because, on the one hand, we desire to adopt such a course as may most distinctly mark the sense of the House of the inadequacy, nullity, and utter futility of the charges brought against the Queen; and, on the other hand, we cannot accept any Resolution that gives the go-by to the charge now made against the Government of having made an improper use of the Prerogative of the Crown. Therefore, after thinking the matter over, we have come to the conclusion that there is no course open to us but to meet the Motion of the hon. Member for Swansea with a direct negative. The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) has moved an Amendment, which he supported in a speech of great research, learning, ingenuity, and of some length. But whatever may be the merits of that Amendment; it distinctly avoids the question, and we cannot accept it. The hon. Member for Hackney does not move his Amendment, and it is, therefore, clearly inappreciable. For that reason, I think we have no course open to us but to meet the Motion with a direct negative. But, Sir, in doing this, I wish to draw a distinction between the two parts of the censure which is, either directly or indirectly, conveyed. As regards the censure cast upon Her Majesty's Government, we are now, I think, become tolerably well hardened to attacks of this kind; and so far as the speeches of the Mover and Seconder traverse the old ground of the iniquities of the Government in respect of their conduct at the various stages of the critical events of last year, so far as they relate to the movement of the Indian troops, the Vote of Credit, or the various other subjects to which reference has been made, we are perfectly content to say that those questions have been brought forward in this House one by one, they have been debated one by one, and the judgment of the House has been passed upon them all singly. And if it is desired now to take them again in the lump, we are perfectly prepared to meet them in that form also. But, Sir, the case is totally different when the revered name of the Sovereign of this country is brought in question in any shape or form; and whether it be in the shape of a direct charge against Her Majesty, or of a charge against her Advisers, that they have made use of and sheltered themselves behind her name, we find it necessary to give it a distinct and emphatic contradiction. The hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Hutchinson) said just now that there was in the country an impression that encroachments were being made by Monarchical or Ministerial authority, or both; and the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) echoed very much the same sentiments. He said there was a feeling of jealousy with regard to the influence of the Crown, and that if we read the newspapers, we should see that such impression was abroad. I am upon this point happy to be able to confirm the opinion which he has expressed; for it has happened that, in reading a newspaper this evening, I found the following words—I am quoting from The Echo:—

“But occasionally we have significant indications that the Crown is acting as permanent head of the Cabinet, or rather of the small Cabinet inside the larger one. Her Majesty sent a despatch to Lord Lytton, so lengthy that the cost of telegraphing it was 1,400 rupees. Then we have the elaborate message to Lord Chelmsford, and the still more recent one to Lady Frere.”

Now, this is the sort of statement which goes forth in columns widely circulated for the instruction of the public. If hon. Members will consider it for a moment, they will see that, even assuming the correctness of the charges brought against us here, these charges thus made in the Press are totally unfounded. The charge made in the Question put by the hon. Member for Swansea some weeks ago, upon which this Motion was raised, did not relate to any telegraphic despatch sent by Her Majesty to Lord Lytton, but related to a telegraphic communication said to have been despatched from Lord Lytton to Her Majesty. That is a very different case, because it is quite possible and highly probable that there may have been communications as to matters of fact made by the Viceroy to the Queen; while, on the other hand, telegrams from the Queen to Lord Lytton might bear a different construction. But this is a matter upon which I shall trouble the House for a few moments, because it is the only serious one brought forward in this discussion. We have heard a good deal about the telegrams to Lord Chelmsford and to Lady Frere, and this is a matter as to which I think the answer commends itself to the common sense of the House. At a moment of great anxiety; at a moment when Her Majesty's troops had met with an unfortunate reverse; when there had been great loss of life, and great concern was naturally felt on the part of Her Majesty; at a time, too, when the Government were so far from expressing their censure or their want of confidence in their Agents or Ministers in South Africa, that they felt it to be their duty to defend them, and retain them in the responsible positions which they filled; Her Majesty, always ready with a kind word, sent a message in the most general terms of sympathy, and at the same time conveyed an expression of confidence that her troops would redeem themselves from the difficulties in which they were placed, and that her Administrator and Governor would be able to bring them out of the difficulties of their situation. There is really nothing in that which can in any way whatever be found fault with, nor do I believe that anybody has made it the subject of a serious charge. But with regard to the case of the Indian telegram, I am bound to say that it is a matter which requires a moment's consideration. This charge originates in a very remarkable article contributed to one of the numerous periodicals of the day by a gentleman whose name is very well known to us all as a special correspondent of one of the newspapers, and an admirable writer, whose descriptions we all read with interest and pleasure—Mr. Archibald Forbes. Whether he is an equally great Constitutional authority is, of course, another question. He is a gentleman with whose name we all are familiar, but of whom I have no personal knowledge. The article is entitled “Some Plain Words about the Afghanistan Question,” and gives an account of what he has gathered to be the history and origin of that war. He says that Lord Lytton was desirous of bringing about a quarrel with the Ameer Shere Ali, and, of course, of pressing his view upon the Home Government, who, according to Mr. Archibald Forbes, were unable to see the necessity for hostilities with Afghanistan. Mr. Forbes proceeds to say—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

“While working in this fashion on his own account, Lord Lytton was pleading with Lord Cranbrook for his sanction to an immediate Declaration of War.”

And after a few more sentences he adds—

"Nor did he confine his communications to the Constitutional channel. It is not generally known, but it is nevertheless true, that the Viceroy of India has maintained direct communication in the Anglo-Afghan affair with Her Majesty the Queen. How copious this must have been may be judged from the fact that the telegram sent upon this great and difficult case was so long that the cost was 11,000 rupees."

These words are in italics, and a great writer does not usually make use of italics unless he wishes to direct particular attention to that about which he is writing. It is obvious that the meaning of the paragraph is this—that Lord Lytton, desiring to bring about the acceptance of a certain policy with Her Majesty's Ministers at home, and finding himself unable to persuade them by his arguments, addressed himself directly to the Queen, that he might obtain Her Majesty's support in order to carry his object. Now, that, if true, is a serious charge, and one which undoubtedly trenches upon the Privileges of Parliament and the Constitution of the country. But, Sir, there is no foundation whatever for such a statement. It is perfectly true that a long telegram was sent by Lord Lytton to Her Majesty; but what was the date of that message, and to what circumstances did it refer? I have been favoured by Her Majesty with a sight of that telegram, and am perfectly acquainted with it, and it is at this moment in my possession. I will describe its nature and purport. In the first place, its date is the 26th of November; the advance of the Forces had begun five days previously—that is, on the 21st of November—and the telegram which Lord Lytton addressed to Her Majesty described in tolerably succinct phrases the advance of the various columns of Her Majesty's Forces. He begins by saying that they advanced on the morning of the 21st of November, under Generals Biddulph and Roberts, and the nature of their instructions is mentioned for the information of Her Majesty. There is not one word upon the causes of the war; there is not one word with regard to political matters; it is only a telegram sent by the Viceroy at the moment when the movement took place, in order that Her Majesty might receive early and authentic intelligence of that which had taken place. That is the whole explanation of this mysterious telegram, in reply to which Her Majesty simply expressed her gratification at hearing of the success which had attended her troops. The telegram was not sent by Her Majesty without being first submitted to, and approved by her Minister. I ask what does the House consider to be the position—what does it consider to be the rights and duties of the Sovereign? Is the House of opinion that it is improper that Her Majesty should be in any way in the receipt of intelligence as to important and interesting events which are going on? Is the House of opinion that Her Majesty should not write a private letter, or express any opinion of her own upon any matter which seems to call for the expression of sympathy with those who are in trouble? Is it possible to suppose that one who has held, and continues to hold, so important a position as the Queen of England; one who has had her experience; one who is called upon from time to time to admonish and to advise; whose right it is, as the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) has said, "to be consulted, to encourage, and to warn," are we to be told that she is to be deprived of all information as to the real state of affairs, or as to the real state of feeling in this country or anywhere else? Sir, I maintain this position to be utterly untenable. We have, in some of the language used to-night, heard to what absurd and ridiculous lengths this case has been carried. It would appear that Her Majesty ought not to be informed as to the details of what passes in this House, or what passes in the Cabinet; and other like doctrines have been advanced in a way which makes us really wonder at the views which hon. Members opposite entertain. But I think we may say, in answer to all these charges, that the character and the history of the present Reign and of the present Sovereign are in themselves a sufficient refutation. We need not appeal to any evidence but that which we ourselves possess; but if it were necessary to do so, I would say—Go to what country you please, to France, Italy, America, or where you may, and listen to the language in which the Sovereign of Great Britain is spoken of. Everywhere you will hear the same uniform eulogium upon the private virtues and conduct of the Queen and upon her high Constitutional character. I venture to say there has never been in the annals of this country a Sovereign who has more loyally justified the position which Her Majesty occupies as a Constitutional Sovereign. The hon. Member for Swansea, in his original Motion, told us that certain action was not in accordance with Constitutional usage "as now understood and settled." But how, and by whom, has the Constitutional usage of this country come to be so understood and settled? It has been so, at least as much by the perfect influence of our gracious Sovereign, as by the wisdom and firmness of Parliament, and by the expression of public opinion throughout the country. In all these matters the Queen has not only borne her part, but she has taken the lead in confirming and observing the Constitutional rules by which she should be guided; and it is owing to this that we are blessed with a Constitution in which the Sovereign is neither a mere dummy, nor, on the other hand, overshadows or takes an undue part in governing the affairs of the country. I do not know whether it may be the wish or the idea of some persons in this House, or out of it, that the Constitution of this country should be changed. It may be that in some places there are ideas abroad that a Constitutional Monarchy is not the best form of government, and that some form of Republic, or some powers given to a Parliamentary body or a Senate analogous to those in other countries, would be preferable. If such opinions are entertained, let them be discussed, and let us see what is the real feeling of the country. But, Sir, I act upon the assumption that we adhere to the Monarchical form of Government; and I maintain, with the utmost confidence, and with no qualification whatever, that Her Majesty fulfils in every particular the duties of a Constitutional Sovereign, such as we understand by that term. We have, as I have already pointed out, a safeguard in the character of the Sovereign; we have another safeguard, and it is one which ought not to be underrated—in the determination which, I am sure, will always animate the Parliaments of this country to maintain their just rights and Privileges. But it is not because we respect the Prerogatives and Privileges of the Queen, that we are, therefore, willing to tamper with the rights and Privileges of Parliament. It is not the way to show ourselves strong in defending our own

Privileges to be ready to catch at every word of gossip and at every insinuation of malice, from wheresoever it may come, and to put constructions of the worst character upon acts which in themselves are both innocent and Constitutional. I do not think that is the way in which the liberties of the country and the Privileges of Parliament are to be defended. I say we are to defend these Privileges by making ourselves respected in the country, by making ourselves strong, and the guardians of that Constitution of which we are no unimportant part. We were told just now that "there are no guardians of the public liberties; that the Cabinet is no guardian; that the Ministry is no guardian; that the House itself, overpowered as it is by a majority, is no guardian of them." I do not understand language of that sort. I do not understand why the minority of the House should be allowed to come forward to say that the majority cannot be regarded as the guardians of the public liberties, merely because they differ from the minority on particular questions. But I say that it is the duty of the minority, whenever they believe that the Prerogatives of the Crown are being unduly strained, or that the Privileges of Parliament are being encroached upon, it is their duty to come forward to state their views, and to press them publicly against the largest numerical majority, and trust to the progress of public opinion to enforce those views which they believe to be sound. That is what has been done, and what will continue to be done by the minority, if, upon any future occasion, they have specific grounds of complaint to go upon. But, Sir, I say that the sort of Motion which we have had submitted to-night—vague and uncertain—such a Motion as we are unable to grapple with—a very Proteus, changing its form as often as we come to close quarters with it—is neither likely to increase the respect in which this House is held by the country, nor to be of advantage to the Constitution under which we have the happiness to live.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I must confess that I have never been more perplexed since I have been in this House than by the proceedings in this House which have preceded and accompanied the moving of this Resolution. When I first read the Resolution of the hon. Member for Swansea, it did not appear to me to be particularly well framed, or particularly clear in the proposition which it was designed to enunciate. But having, as I thought, mastered the meaning of that Resolution, I was yesterday certainly astonished when my hon. Friend declared that it had taken him entirely by surprise to find that the Resolution of which he had given Notice was in any way supposed to be a Vote of Censure upon Her Majesty. It is extremely possible, and it has been contended by the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), that technically the Motion was not a Vote of Censure upon Her Majesty, because Her Majesty cannot be held responsible for any action whatever; and that, if it was a Vote of Censure at all, it would have been a censure upon the Advisers of the Crown. But certainly the impression conveyed by the terms of the Resolution imported censure upon certain proceedings of Her Majesty in her personal capacity, which, by some evil advice, she had been induced to take; and, therefore, I cannot understand how it can have so much astonished my hon. Friend to learn that it was regarded as a direct Vote of Censure upon the Queen. My perplexity was still further increased when I heard him say that he was prepared to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), and when I found the effect of that Amendment to be not a very considerable alteration from the terms of the original Resolution. Sir, that Resolution has now become a sort of vague Vote of Censure upon the Government in respect of several matters which have already been under the consideration of the House; and that which yesterday was the principal allegation of the Resolution—namely, that there had been personal interference on the part of the Sovereign—has now been remitted to a secondary and comparatively insignificant position. I cannot think that these proceedings are at all convenient to the House, because I think that when matters of this importance are dealt with by the House, they ought to be dealt with after due consideration, and after the bearings of the Resolution affecting them have been fully considered, and that time should be given to the House for fully considering the bearings of the Resolution, as well as for making Amendments. No one can doubt for a moment the importance of the issue raised by the Motion of the hon. Member; but I am still in some perplexity as to what that issue is. But while there is no doubt as to the importance of the subject, there will be much difference of opinion as to the expediency of its being made at all, either in the form proposed yesterday or in that which it has assumed to-day. Our Constitution contains a great variety of forces, not necessarily opposing forces, but which may occasionally find themselves in opposition to each other, and which are kept in balance by a variety of checks, not the result of any preconceived theories, but of the practice and experience of generations, a great many of which are the outcome of prolonged, severe, and hazardous struggles. The relations of the two Houses of Parliament to each other, the relations of Parliament and the Executive Government to the Crown, all these points have been settled in a manner which it would be very easy to show is not theoretically perfect, but yet, after various adjustments, have been found in practice to work sufficiently well. In my opinion, it is not expedient, without adequate cause, that Parliament should be excited to examine the mechanism of the Constitution, and to raise, by calling attention to them, difficulties in the friction which would not otherwise be found out. Reference has been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard, in his speech to-night, to that prolonged contest which took place between George III. and the political Parties in Parliament—a contest which was waged in support, on the one hand, of the claim of personal government, and, on the other, in support of the Privileges of Parliament. That was one of the most prolonged and one of the most severe struggles through which our Constitution has passed. It would be, perhaps, rash to say that no similar struggle can ever, under any circumstances, be waged again between the different powers of the Constitution; but I think it is safe to say that that contest can never be waged again under the same or under similar circumstances. That was at the time of nomination boroughs and of other constituencies which were extremely small, when the Crown was in possession of almost unlimited patronage. It was possible for the Sovereign, as George III. did, to dictate his own policy to his Ministers, to dismiss his Ministry when he objected to their policy, and sometimes to defeat his own Ministers in Parliament by means of his own personal influence. But the circumstances under which that action of the Sovereign was exercised are entirely gone, the position is entirely changed; and no conflict between the Crown and Parliament can ever be waged at the present time in circumstances even remotely similar to those to which my hon. Friend referred. But even at the time when the conflicts between the Crown and the political Parties were constant, I think it will be found, upon examination, that no Parliamentary action was ever taken, except on grounds most distinctly stated, or except on grounds the existence of which was perfectly notorious. Now, Sir, have any such grounds for Parliamentary action been alleged in the present case, or is there any such notorious interposition of the Sovereign in matters of policy as would warrant the absence of specific statements in the Motion which has been made? In my opinion, my hon. Friends who moved and seconded this Resolution have confused two issues which are altogether and totally distinct. They have confused the charges which have been brought from this side of the House from time to time against Her Majesty's Government of an abuse of the powers of the Crown with charges of a different, of an altogether different description. We, on this side of the House, have thought it necessary, and I have myself been a party to it on every occasion, to challenge the exercise of the Prerogative of the Crown by Her Majesty's present Advisers in the case of the removal of the Indian troops; again, in the case of Anglo-Turkish Convention; and, again, in the proceedings, without the knowledge of Parliament, which led to the Afghan War. We have contended that in every one of these cases the Prerogative and the powers of the Crown have been abused by Her Majesty's Government. I think that we took a right course in raising every one of those issues in detail and separately. I think we should have failed in our duty to the House and the country if we had acted otherwise. But, as has been pointed out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich

(Mr. Gladstone), these issues have been decided in every instance against us by this House. Although we are not content to consider that decision as a final one, there is but one tribunal to which it is possible for us to make an appeal. It is competent for us, and we shall, I hope, appeal from the judgment of the House to the judgment of the constituencies whenever we have the opportunity. But, on the other hand, I must agree with my right hon. Friend that there is no practical object to be attained in raising again collectively in this House charges which have been heard in detail, and which, so far as this House was competent to decide them, have been decided against us. But with these issues which we have raised, and which my hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) and I have together been parties to raising, my hon. Friend has mixed up the question which has excited—I do not say unnecessarily excited—considerable attention in the mind of the country generally, the question which goes, for want of a better name, by the name of the revival of personal government. What instances have been brought forward by my hon. Friend in support of the allegation which was conveyed in the Resolution, as it stood on the Paper yesterday, that there has been a direct interposition on the part of the Crown in matters of Indian and foreign policy, or in support of the insinuation contained in the Resolution moved to-day, that there has been a supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign? I listened carefully to the speeches; but I must say that in the historical narrative of recent events which was given by my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), and in the historical disquisition of my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), I was only able to detect two allegations brought forward in support of this supposed personal interposition. One of them has been very fully dealt with, and I think, on the whole, very satisfactorily dealt with, by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, in the speech which he has just made. I am not here to defend the answer given in the first instance when the question was first put. I think, on further consideration, it should have occurred to the Government that it was not altogether right that they should say that they had no knowledge of correspondence between the Sovereign and the Viceroy, and should appear to treat the question as a matter which could have no concern either for them or for Parliament. I think, if the full explanation given to-night had been given at the time, we might probably have avoided a great deal of misapprehension. I wish the right hon. Gentleman had entered as fully into an explanation of what has taken place in the matter of the alleged correspondence with Sir Bartle Frere and with Lady Frere. I cannot say, with the facts before us, that I see anything which need necessarily excite Constitutional jealousy in that correspondence. We have not seen the letter which, it is said, has been written to Lady Frere. If a letter has been written, I think it is extremely probable that it is due to those causes which have been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, and that it is a letter of sympathy, not at all expressing an opinion of Her Majesty, or of Her Majesty's Government, upon any of the difficult questions to be settled in the Colony. I must say I think if such a letter has been written that great blame is due, not to Her Majesty for having written it—for I have no doubt, if we knew its contents, that it would do her nothing but honour—but great blame is due to someone in Africa for the use to which that letter has been put; and that that letter, whatever its contents, should be allowed to be spoken of by the Colonial Press as a letter which had stimulated the opinions of political combatants in the Colony is, I think, a use of that letter extremely to be deprecated, and extremely wrong to have allowed. But, Sir, I cannot say, in either of these cases to which reference has been made, do I see the slightest ground for affirming that Her Majesty has departed from the Constitutional practice which she has almost throughout the whole of her Reign observed. While I entirely agree that no sufficient proof has been brought forward of the alleged personal exercise of Prerogative by Her Majesty, I cannot sit down without stating my conviction that if stronger proof had been forthcoming, and any exercise of Prerogative had been proved, it would have been matter calling for very grave and very serious notice. I do not think that we can, either in the interests of our own Privileges or in the interests of the Crown itself, afford to abate one jot of our Constitutional jealousy, or one jot of the doctrine that for every act of the Sovereign some Adviser of the Crown must be held responsible. It is useless to deny that there does exist in the country some vague uneasiness as to impending changes in our Constitutional relations. The right hon. Gentleman asked us just now whether anybody desired that the Constitution should be changed, and I thought that he spoke with almost too great an alacrity of his willingness to enter into discussion of any propositions which might be brought forward. But, Sir, there is no doubt that there is some, though, I grant, a vague uneasiness as to the possibility of impending changes. I will not, at this hour, go into what I believe to be the causes of that uneasiness—the subject, if discussed here, should be fully discussed, and it is useless to go into it at this hour. But, Sir, there is no doubt that men of great ability, in periodicals of much political influence, have put forward doctrines respecting the relations of the Executive to Parliament and the Crown which are altogether contrary to the doctrines which have been generally held on both sides of this House. Those doctrines, so put forward, have been met as I think they ought to have been met. They have been very fully discussed in the Press and out-of-doors. I do not think it is incumbent upon this House to discuss abstract theories about our Constitution, or about changes in our Constitution, however influential may be the exponents of such theories, or however much ability may be shown in supporting them. This House is only called upon, in my opinion, to act, and can only act with effect, to put such theories into action. Some attempt has been made to-night to show that a commencement has already been made in the policy which I have indicated. In my opinion, my hon. Friend has been led away by false and unnecessary alarm. I think the House, by agreeing to the Resolution which he has moved, and by showing unnecessary anxiety and want of confidence in its own position and in its own powers, would rather impair than strengthen the Privileges which it is the duty of this House to guard, and would, at the same time, imperil those relations with the Crown which, next to its own Privileges, it is its duty and its main object to maintain. As to the vote that I intend to give, I am sorry that, on account of the unexpected change in the Resolution, it is impossible for my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) to move his Amendment. That Amendment, in my opinion, very distinctly and very sufficiently met the allegations which were contained in the original Resolution. It is, I think, to be regretted, when a Constitutional question of this kind has been raised, that it should be met by a direct negative, and that nothing should be left upon the Records of the House to show the view the House takes upon the subject. I regret, for the same reason, that the Government have not thought it possible for them to meet it with a Resolution which would have expressed the opinion of the House on the point raised. I think, when a Constitutional question of this sort is raised, it is right to have some expression of the opinion of this House. But I entirely agree with all that was said by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) as to why it was impossible for him to support the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea. I will not repeat his arguments; but I must say that, although on the grounds of the inexpediency of the Motion, and of its being ill-timed, I might, under ordinary circumstances, have been disposed to take no part in the issue so raised, yet that there are still in this Resolution words which make it impossible for me to refrain from expressing by my vote the opinion I hold on the question at issue. The Resolution still contains, although in a secondary position, the words "the supposed personal interposition of the Sovereign." Now, as the Resolution cannot be amended, I cannot refrain from expressing by my vote the opinion which I hold, that no proof has been forthcoming to-night to justify the assent of this House, either directly or indirectly, to the assertion that there has been any such personal interposition on the part of the Sovereign; and as there is no Amendment which more clearly expresses the opinion I hold on the question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), I have no alternative but to vote with Her Majesty's Government against the Motion.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I shall not intervene for more than two minutes between the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) and this House; but one remark fell from the noble Lord which, I think, I am bound to answer. The noble Lord has observed that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made no allusion to the letter which is supposed to have been written by Her Majesty to Lady Frere, nor to the message sent to Lady Frere. I have to say, on behalf of my right hon. Friend, that the only reason why he did not allude to it was because he thought, after what had taken place, that there really was no serious suggestion made with regard to what was said in the message which went from the Crown to Lady Frere. Therefore, he did not allude to it, or make the statement which he had received authority to make. But as the noble Lord has pointed out that no allusion has been made to it, I think it only right that I should state at once to the House the information which I have received the authority of Her Majesty to-day to state. In that communication to Lady Frere—although, as I think Her Majesty was bound to do, she did express the deepest sympathy for Sir Bartle Frere in all the difficulties and dangers and troubles with which he had to contend, her letter of sympathy was couched in the most general terms; and there was nothing in it, either one way or the other, which should lead him to believe that Her Majesty wished to recommend any line of policy. I think it is only right to say that, and I think my noble Friend will agree with me that it is due alike to Her Majesty, and the House and the country, that that should be openly stated.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, at this late hour, after the apologies of the Home Secretary, and the perplexities of the noble Lord, and the statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he is ready to consider any proposal for the amendment of the Constitution, it is impossible that this question should be properly discussed, and, therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER seconded the Motion.

The Marquess of Hartington

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir Robert Peel.)

The House divided:—Ayes 46; Noes 347: Majority 301.—(Div. List, No. 91.)

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MAJOR NOLAN said, that his hon. Friend the Member for County Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), who had seconded the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, represented a county which contained a very large number of inhabitants. As he (Major Nolan) represented a neighbouring county with a similar population, he ventured again to urge the necessity for adjourning the debate. In the first place, this was a most important question; and, secondly, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) wished to address the House upon it. The right hon. Baronet had only given way to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had insisted upon speaking when he rose. For these reasons, and as the right hon. Baronet had been precluded up to that time from taking any part in the debate, he thought it should be adjourned. The right hon. Baronet was one of those Members who were listened to by the House with the greatest attention, and the fact of his being precluded from speaking constituted a reasonable cause for the adjournment of the debate. He therefore begged to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Major Nolan.)

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) having referred to him, he felt bound to offer some observations upon this subject, which he considered to be one of absolute importance to the country. The House had heard apologies from the Secretary of State, and expressions of bewilderment from the noble Lord who led a section of the Liberal Party in that House, with regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). Nothing definite had, however, been arrived at, although the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that Her Majesty's Government were quite prepared to entertain any proposition which might be started concerning it. This being the case, he thought that it would become a very serious question if this matter of the Prerogative of the Crown were raised out-of-doors, for a feeling was growing up that something was going on which the people did not understand. It was all very well to lay stress upon what were called letters of condolence from Her Majesty to Lady Frere. No one in that House questioned the character or the qualities of the Sovereign, or her right to express her feelings of condolence to Lady Frere in the position in which she had been placed. But there was something behind—and it was a question of confidence in the policy which this country pursued. He had no hesitation in saying that the policy followed in South Africa at this moment was one which would meet with the reprobation of the country. The Government had admitted that the war was both unjust and unnecessary. The question which had been raised by the hon. Member for Swansea was one which had been more than once previously raised in this country, and had met its reprobation. It was not met with sneers when Mr. Dunning raised it in 1780, but it was carried by a majority; and, again, in 1820, when Mr. Brougham raised the question, it was not met in the way which it had now been. Mr. Fox, speaking early in the century of the Prerogatives of the Crown, said—

"You talk about bringing proof of that which is an intangible thing; but, nevertheless, is a thing which may work invisible, but incalculable, mischief to this country."

That was precisely what many people in the country and in that House felt at the present moment. There was, undoubtedly, an uneasy feeling abroad—it was impossible to deny it—and he considered that, for the purpose of freely and fully discussing the matter, they ought more fully to debate the question raised by the hon. Member for Swansea. The speech that he had heard that night from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had fairly astonished him. He would have given anything to have risen after that right hon. Gentleman. When he recalled to his recollection what the right hon. Gentleman said in the country last autumn—how, over and over again, he reiterated that the Government had put the Sovereign above and beyond the Constitution—and then, when he saw the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich get up and make that shabby, flabby speech to-night, pretending that he had not had time to consider the Motion, he was astonished. Time to consider the Motion by the right hon. Gentleman, who could speak by the yard, without notice or hesitation! It was idle to bring forward such a pretence as that. Then, as to the noble Lord, he might tell him that there was no chance of “squelching” that debate, for the subject only excited too much feeling in the country. If a meeting were got up in London, as it might be, in Exeter Hall, or in any of those places, and a half-dozen Members of Parliament were present, they could readily raise a feeling which would show that this debate was not to be squelched. He approved of the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway, and agreed with the necessity of postponing the discussion of a question which was regarded of the utmost importance out-of-doors.

Mr. O’CONNOR POWER supported the Motion for adjournment. With regard to the explanation of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies with reference to the letter to Lady Frere, he would point out that when the Question was originally asked about that letter it was scarcely noticed by the right hon. Baronet. If the Government had stated at an early day that this letter was not intended to endorse any line of policy, he ventured to say that the public feeling would not have been excited on the matter. In his answer to that Question, the right hon. Baronet only stated that the Government had no knowledge of the existence of such a letter. But he must remind him that it was his business, as a Member of the Cabinet, to have such knowledge. It was his business, when a Question was put upon the Paper of that House, to ascertain all the circumstances of the matter. From the Question being put down upon the Paper, the Government would know that they were likely to be challenged upon the subject, and it was the duty of the Secretary of State for the Colonies to have knowledge of the existence of the document.

Sir Robert Peel

Instead of that, the right hon. Gentleman had disposed of the matter in a very summary manner; but when the subject came to be debated in the House, the Home Secretary got up and made an apology, which he would venture to say would sway the votes of 40 or 50 hon. Members. He did not think that that was a business-like way of dealing with the question, nor that the public, who took a great interest in this subject, would consider it a right course. Under these circumstances, he trusted that the House would say that the Motion for the adjournment was one which only showed a proper desire for the discussion of this question, and that it was one that ought to be acceded to.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK observed, that at the the time right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth rose to move the adjournment of the House the clock stood at 5 minutes past 1, and there was ample time for him to express his views. The right hon. Baronet had used terms with reference to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich which he thought everyone must consider would be more properly applied to the speech of the right hon. Baronet himself. On this occasion, he had taken the opportunity of escaping from the embarrassment in which he found himself by moving the adjournment of the House. But the House was perfectly willing to hear the right hon. Baronet, if he had thought to address it, after the right hon. Member for Greenwich. He thought that the patience and consideration with which the speech of the right hon. Baronet had just been listened to showed that the House would have been willing to have heard him at any hour. It seemed to him that both the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, had discharged themselves of the utterances with which they were charged, and that, therefore, there was no occasion whatever for the adjournment of the debate. He trusted that the House would not accede to the Motion.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 307: Majority 264.—(Div. List, No. 92.)

Question again proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

MR. O'SULLIVAN begged to move the adjournment of the debate. He said, that however willing the House was to listen to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, the country was also anxious to know what he said, and at that hour it would be impossible for anything that he uttered to go beyond the walls of that House. He hoped the House would see the futility of protracting this matter, because at 7 o'clock in the morning hon. Members would be found as fresh to move the adjournment of this debate as they were at the present time, and the matter would only result in the same way as the debate on the Sunday Closing Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. O'Sullivan.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The House has now, by two Divisions, expressed its opinion that it is desirable to continue this debate. When the House, by such majorities, affirms its desire, it is to be taken for granted that the House will be patient enough to listen to any hon. Gentleman who wishes to address it on this Motion. But, seeing that the promoters of the Motion are most anxious for the adjournment of the debate, I do not know why we should not be justified in putting this construction upon their conduct—that they shrink from challenging the opinion of the House upon the question that they have submitted to it. Whether that be so or not, it is quite clear that it would be only a waste of time to divide the House upon repeated Motions for adjournment; and, therefore, I shall offer no opposition to the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Tuesday next.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that he had a Motion on the Paper with reference to this subject, and as it was impossible now to bring it on, he had to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it might be again postponed. He now found himself in a worse position than he was last week when the matter came on; and he, therefore, ventured to repeat his appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give him another opportunity for bringing on the Motion. If the right hon. Gentleman would permit him to offer a suggestion, he would ask whether it would be possible for him to bring forward this Bill upon Thursday next? If the right hon. Gentleman could allow him to bring forward the Motion about 11, or half-past, it would be a great convenience, as the Motion was not one which it was desirable to have hanging over, inasmuch as there was a great amount of misrepresentation with regard to the Bill being circulated about the country. It was, therefore, desirable that it should be taken on as early a day as possible.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he should be happy to give the hon. Member another opportunity of bringing forward his Bill, and that he thought he could promise him either Thursday or Monday next. He gathered from his observations that Thursday would suit him, and, if possible, he should have that day, and if not, Monday.

THE O'CONOR DON moved that his Motion be postponed till Thursday.

Motion agreed to.

WORMWOOD SCRUBS REGULATION BILL.—[BILL 96.]

(Colonel Lindsay, Mr. Secretary Stanley, Lord Eustace Cecil.)

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Shaw Lefevre be a Member of the Select Committee on the Bill."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that he was surprised that the Motion should be brought on. No one had been consulted with regard to this matter; and it was without parallel, in so far as he knew, for a Committee to be nominated consisting of three Members from one side and only one from the other. Under these circumstances, he moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY did not know that there was any opposition to the Motion, but it was understood that everyone was agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [12th May] reported.

MAJOR NOLAN, before the Resolutions in Committee of Supply were reported, wished to draw the attention of the House to a matter connected with the Patent Office. A large sum of money was derived from the Patent Office; about five-sixths of the sums paid by the patentees went into the Imperial Exchequer, and about one-sixth was spent on the Patent Office itself. The books in that Office were kept in the most disgraceful state, whereas in America various abridgements of the patents were furnished. There were also good plans and printed books in America by which anyone could see what a patent was about by simply looking through the description and plan. About three years ago, abridgements were started in the Patent Office; but they had now been discontinued, as the form in which they were made rendered them of no use. These were never proper abridgements, and now they were abolished altogether; and if a man went into the Patent Office, he had to wade through a long patent of four or five pages to find out what it was about. That was a most discreditable thing, although it was very true that the Library was good in other respects, excepting that it was too small. There was hardly room in it for the present books and documents, and the whole thing was in a very bad state. He thought the Government ought to take care that proper abridgements were made; he did not insist upon plans as in America, but abridgements were absolutely necessary. The law in this country was somewhat different to that of America; for here a man claimed as being the true and original inventor, which was not the case in America. If proper abridgements and plans were furnished, every person of common sense could find out at once what a patent was about; but, at the present moment, no one could make any investigations without the greatest difficulty. He was constantly told that American machinery and tools were better than those of this country; and, in his opinion, that was owing to the fact that it was so difficult to find out anything with regard to patents. He thought that better machinery and a better Patent Law went together. Of course, some people might be of opinion that it would be best if the Patent Law were altogether abolished; he did not intend to argue that question; but all that was necessary, in his opinion, was that the Patent Law should be improved. He thought the Government should give some assurance that these matters should be looked into, and that the arrangements of the Patent Office should be put into a more scientific form, so that anyone could make investigations without being put to the great labour which was now entailed.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman, than whom there was no one better acquainted with patent matters, brought this matter before the Government last year, and he had then promised to endeavour to make some improvement, and to place the Patent Office upon a better footing than existed at that time. Since that period he had sanctioned the appointment of a certain number of clerks in the Patent Office for the purpose of preparing proper indices. From that fact, the hon. and gallant Gentleman would perceive that the Government had every desire to effect an improvement. But he would remind him that everything could not be done at once. He could, however, assure him that the subject was not lost sight of, and that he would himself make inquiries into the question of abridgements and plans, and endeavour to see whether his views could be met. He fully agreed with him that it was of great importance to give every facility for readily ascertaining the existence of a patent, and that a great improvement might be made upon the means for so doing which at present existed.

Resolutions agreed to.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDERS (KILLARNEY, &C.) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. JAMES LOWTHER, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board for Ireland relating to the towns of Killarney and Parsonstown, ordered to be brought in by JAMES LOWTHER and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 178.]

EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS.

Ordered, That the several Accounts and Papers which have been presented to this House in this Session of Parliament, relating to the Revenues of India, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the whole House.—(Mr. Edward Stanhope.)

Committee thereupon upon Thursday 22nd May.

House adjourned at a quarter
after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 14th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Second Report—Public Accounts [No. 186].

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Salmon Fishery Law Amendment (No. 2) *.

Ordered—First Reading—Indian Marine * [182]; Common Law Procedure and Judicature Acts Amendment * [181].

First Reading—Great Seal * [180].

Second Reading—Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2) [51], put off; Local Government Provisional Orders (Axminster Union, &c.) * [154]; Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Buckingham, &c.) * [161].

Third Reading—West India Loans * [167], and passed.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)
(No. 2) BILL.—[BILL 51.]

(Mr. Downing, Mr. Butt, Mr. Shaw.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SHAW, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he was sure the House would excuse him if he expressed his deep regret that this duty should have now fallen upon him. The death of his esteemed Colleague, Mr. M^cCarthy Downing, and, more recently, of his much-respected Friend and political associate for many years, Mr. Butt, had thrown this very onerous duty upon him. He need hardly say that the death of those Gentlemen had been a great loss to the House; but it had been a much greater loss to the cause of reform and progress in Ireland. They were both men of great experience. No man was better acquainted with the various questions connected with Land Reform than Mr. Downing; and the practical experience of Mr. Butt, combined with all the higher qualities of statesmanship, enabled him to deal successfully with subjects involving the nice and delicate points connected with property. He felt that, having accepted the duty of introducing this Bill, he should look over the debates that had arisen in recent years upon the subject. Although he had enjoyed a seat in that House for 10 years, and had aided in passing the Land Bill, he had never taken part in any of the great debates upon the question. He had heard every speech that was delivered upon it in the House for some years past; but, still, he considered it his duty to go over all those speeches again, especially those in opposition to the measure, to see what really were the objections to the Bill. The perusal considerably staggered him, for it seemed the English language hardly contained words strong enough to denote the opinions held by Gentlemen opposite. The Bill was, in their opinion, "confiscation"—it was the "destruction of the rights of property," and so on. It was, therefore, not without some trepidation that he re-examined his Bill, bringing to the study a deep sense of duty; and he said, without hesitation, that if it contained any such principles it would not have his name upon it. The Bill was a moderate one, and would tend to strengthen and confirm the stability of the institution of property in Ireland. Those who supported it were taunted with bringing forward a confiscatory Bill—and he thought he remembered hearing from the opposite side the suggestion that they advocated, but did not practise, these principles in favour of the tenants in dealing with their own property in Ireland. That was hardly a fair line of argument; because there might be personal matters, such, for instance, as family settlements—which prevented Gentlemen dealing individually as they might desire, and who, if they were authorized by law, might act in a different manner. But was it a fact that those who advocated the measure disregarded its principles? Mr. Downing offered to his tenants a tenure exactly upon the lines of the Bill. Mr. D'Arcy, who occupied a seat in the House in the last Parliament, gave to his tenants a tenure upon the same lines. He did not like to speak of himself; but he had held land by purchase in Ireland for the last 25 years, and, he supposed, when he got the ownership he was wanting in some of the grand instincts of landlordism; but one of the first things he did was to tell his tenants that as long as he was their landlord they might hold the land on the same lines as those of the Bill—that was, that they should not be disturbed as long as they paid their rents; that their rents should be fair; and that if they wished to sell they could do so without undue interference on his part. Within six months two parties sold out, one of whom got more than the fee-simple for an expiring lease; and by reason of his adopting the lines of the Bill there was no property in Ireland upon which more money was laid out by the tenants. One of the great problems they had to solve in Ireland was that of improving the tenure of land. There had not been for centuries any man of capacity who looked at this subject, or at the social condition of Ireland generally, who had hesitated for a moment to pronounce the insecurity of the tenure of the land to be at the bottom of all the evils that afflicted that country. This was a question not merely of politics, but one affecting the life and prosperity of the country, and its prompt settlement was worthy of the highest statesmanship. From the time of James I., when the law of tanistry was abolished, from the time in which Sir John Davies had presented his Report, in which he declared that insecurity of tenure was at the root of the Irish difficulty, to that of Sir Robert Peel, who said a short time before his death that if the tenure of land in Ireland were improved, he did not see why it should not become very prosperous, and thence to the more recent utterances of the right hon. Members for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) and Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), every man of political capacity who had looked at the subject came to the same conclusion. There was no other country in Europe in which such a system of land tenure existed as prevailed in Ireland. What was really the state of the case? Three-fourths of the people of Ireland lived by the land—their exclusive business, he might fairly say, being to till the land—and yet their tenure was so uncertain and precarious that they held their means of subsistence absolutely at the will of their landlord. That was a condition of the law which must be inimical to the welfare of the country. It had a most injurious effect alike upon individuals and upon the nation. It accounted, in a great measure, for the people being called unstable and unthrifty. In fact, it was impossible for any individual or any nation to be thrifty when their entire means of living were uncertain and precarious. To be stable a people must have something stable in their surrounding institutions. The contrary was the case, and the unstable character of the holding of land had insinuated itself into the very character of the people. Much of the want of steadiness in high aims and great plans and purposes which had been ascribed to the people of Ireland was due to this cause, and could not be traced to race, religion, climate, or any of those influences to whose account it was sometimes credited. What had been done to remedy this condition of things? A Land Act was passed in 1870—and he, for one, agreed with the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) that it was a great and honest measure; but that right hon. Gentleman also said it was imperfect and incomplete. No doubt, it was. It introduced great and important principles; but it did not carry them out to their legitimate end. It partook of the character of all our social legislation in this respect—that a long time was required to mature and carry out any change. When the Bill of 1870 was laid before the country, the effort of the landlords was directed to narrow and confuse its operation; and the consequence was that many of its most beneficent provisions had become inoperative. One very important part of the measure related to the purchase by tenants of their own holdings; but what had come of that? What came of another part applying most vitally to three-fourths of the country? Why, the very moment the clause was adopted, declaring that the tenants had a right to compensation for disturbance, a sliding scale of compensation was adopted that made the clause almost perfectly useless. There was hardly a landlord in Ireland whom it would not pay to dispossess his tenants upon that scale; and, for himself, he was bound to say that if he took advantage of it he would make a large amount of money. Now, he desired, by means of his Bill, to meet these drawbacks. He was in hopes up till then that it would obtain a second reading, because no one had put down a Notice of opposition to it till then. He was surprised to find that the opposition came from a Gentleman sitting on the Liberal side of the House; and he could not imagine why he should come forward as the advocate of extreme landlordism in Ireland; because, if the Opposition came into power, they would be bound to deal with the question substantially on the lines of the Bill now before the House. The object of the promoters of the Bill was to do justice to the tenants and landlords; and if there was any appearance of injustice, there was no reason why it could not be removed in Committee. But the principle, he urged, ought to be affirmed. He would not trouble the House by dwelling upon the first two parts of the Bill, because, last year, very little was said against them. In fact, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Law), who made an exhaustive speech on the subject, expressing what might be taken as the view of official Liberalism, stated that the first two parts contained little that was objectionable, and it was against the third part that he directed his heavy artillery. To the third part he should, therefore, now briefly direct attention. This part gave the tenants of Ireland the power of getting security of tenure. He did not use the word "fixity," because it might give rise to misunderstanding; and, in fact, they could not fix the tenantry of a particular district therein and secure that they should remain there permanently. The only thing that could be done was to secure to them a reasonable amount of security, as far as that could be done consistently with natural laws that must work in the case of the Irish tenant as well as with regard to every other class of the community. He proposed to give to the tenantry of Ireland, without excluding any class, the power of securing themselves in the occupation of their holdings without being subject to having their property confiscated by an unreasonable advance of rent, and to give them the power, in case of good fortune, of raising them above their position, or, in case of evil fortune, casting them beneath it, to get the full value of their holdings from an incoming tenant. It struck him that no more reasonable principles than these could be placed before reasonable men. There was nothing in them unjust, unfair, or against the rights of property. In fact, it would be in favour of the rights of property, if these principles were carried out. What the Bill proposed was the adoption, as far as possible, of the original tenant right of Ulster, and its application to the whole of Ireland. He was quite aware that the tenant right of Ulster had been modified, and that in some cases efforts had been made to efface it; but history and their own experience left no doubt as to what that principle and rule really were. The Ulster custom was really the key by which the problem of the land in Ireland could be solved; and they had this advantage—that in using it they were not disturbing the feelings and habits of the people, because—he said it without doubt or hesitation, and he had a knowledge of the South and West of Ireland—he found throughout the country the feeling on the part of the tenant that he had a right to the value of his holdings. What was more natural? The practice was not understood in England, though the history of the English laws disclosed it, showing that in England the same practice existed as in the North of Ireland. When the Romans left England, they did not efface from the customs of the people the influence of Roman law, and the Roman law gave the right of inheritable tenancy. Continuous tenancy, and copyhold, and other forms of tenancy throughout England, were the remains of this law. No doubt, an immense effort was made to get rid of this in times of high prices, and land in England was let just as a house would be furnished and let, or a ship equipped and sent out to sea. But in Ireland the people did not get their fences and drains provided. In the times of James I. the people got their land on the condition that they would reclaim it, and continuous tenancy was one of the fundamental conditions of their holding. Insensibly, and as a matter of course, the same principle spread through the whole of Ireland.

Mr. Shaw

Upon two large estates bounding his own he found this principle in force, and the tenants were hardly ever evicted except for some gross non-payment of rent; while they either received compensation, or were allowed to sell their holdings. A man in Ireland had no real and substantial interest for improving the soil. The terror was kept over him that some day or other, by a change in the law or in the family of the owners of the land, or from some other circumstances, the land on which he and his fathers had lived, and around which every feeling of home centred, might be rendered so uncomfortable to him as to compel him to seek a home elsewhere. Was that a sound principle on which to found the prosperity of a country? It was, in fact, treating the country unjustly and landlordism unjustly. Landlordism ought to be above the littleness of dreading every movement in legislation as something which might swallow up and destroy it. Was the position of the owners of the land so weak that they dreaded to give a man a real hold upon his own property, lest the property of the landlord in the soil should be destroyed? He believed that if the prayer of this Bill were granted, it would do more to strengthen the hold of property and increase the feeling of respect and goodwill between landlords and tenants than any other measure that could possibly be devised. In the discussion the other night about the Law of Distress, the Attorney General for Ireland pointed out that there was no such clause in this Bill; and the reason that much stress was not laid in Ireland upon the Law of Distress was, that there was no landlord who did not feel that there was between himself and the loss of his rent a great deal of property to fall back upon. He knew a case where four years' rent was due, and the landlord, instead of distraining, referred the question of the right of parties to two persons, who decided that he ought to give the family of the tenant as much as would take them to America. That was done, and the landlord had not had possession of the land for a week before he was offered for it a sum equal to 5 per cent advance on the rent and outlay. The principles of this Bill were such that no man of common sense, dealing with his own tenants, would ever question their justice, and no Legislature could do more for the pacification of Ireland than by passing this Bill. If something was not done, the difficulty would arise of getting tenants to take the land. Why should people, when rich land was waiting for them in other parts of the world, remain in Ireland in a state of serfdom? If hon. Members valued the stability and prosperity of the country, and wished to settle a great question which was ripe for settlement, and which could now be settled rationally and effectively, let them pass the second reading of this Bill, and make in Committee such Amendments as were considered necessary.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Shaw.)

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW, in rising to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, the hon. Member for the County of Cork had expressed his surprise at opposition to the Bill coming from that (the Liberal) side of the House. He wished to explain that he had put his Motion for its rejection upon the Paper as the representative of the Irish Society and speaking for a large number of the Companies of the City of London interested in land in Ulster, who considered that the Bill materially interfered with their rights. The hon. Member had treated the question as if the provisions of the Land Bill had not passed, and were not in operation; as if the tenants of Ireland had not now the right to obtain compensation for their improvements and for disturbance in their holdings. He (Sir Sydney Waterlow) was not there to object to these provisions. The Land Bill had been of the greatest advantage, not only to the Province of Ulster, but to the whole of Ireland; and what he said was that they should not make any further change in the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland till they had further experience of the working of the Irish Land Act. No one could say that the Land Courts of Ireland had not fairly and fully considered the claims that had come before them for improvements to the land in the shape of buildings, drainage, &c. He should be glad to see the Ulster custom extended to the South and West of Ireland, subject to the same kind of restrictions as existed in Ulster. But Clause 18 was in every respect unjust. It provided that no tenant should be disentitled to obtain compensation under the 3rd clause of the Land Act on the ground that he was evicted by the landlord on account of the persistent exercise of any right from which he was debarred by express or implied agreement with his landlord. What was that but a premium to the tenant to break the stipulations made with his landlord? There was a provision in the Bill that under-tenants should be entitled to compensation for disturbance, and to that he saw no objection. But the Bill did not stop at such provisions. It repealed the provisions of the Land Act by which tenants and their landlords, in cases of tenancies over £50 a-year, could contract themselves out of the provisions of the Land Act; and, in so doing, it directly assailed the liberty of contract. It might be to the interest of the tenant to get his land at a low rent and upon a long lease, giving up as a consideration certain claims, and the House would pause before it said such things should not be done. The hon. Member had spoken of the future prosperity of Ireland under this Bill should it be passed into law; but he (Sir Sydney Waterlow) believed it would create much disturbance between landlords and tenants, and would not tend to increase amity and concord or promote those good feelings which were so desirable in that country. The position of Irish tenants was superior to that of English or Scotch tenants. If they wanted thrift in the tenants of Ireland, they must look for its encouragement in another quarter than in any further alteration in the tenure of land. As to the Ulster custom, which was now sought to be extended, when the tenants in Ulster first took the land they had to take it bare, owing to the peculiar circumstances under which it was confiscated and handed over to the Livery Companies in consideration for money advanced. The tenants had to do the work of reclamation, and thus acquired the right to compensation for their expenditure. In conclusion, he would say let the question alone for a time, and until they knew more of the working of the Act of 1870. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Mr. Shaw

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Sydney Waterlow.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he had seldom heard a speech which went so short a way as that of the last speaker to justify an Amendment for the rejection of a Bill.

MR. SPEAKER said, he had not understood the hon. Gentleman the Member for Maidstone to move his Amendment.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW intimated that he did move it.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA regretted that the hon. Gentleman had not taken advantage of the locus penitentie he had carved out for himself, and that he had not abstained from moving the Amendment. Such a course would not only have obviated the necessity for his (Sir Joseph M'Kenna's) remarks, but would have conduced more to the respect they all desired to entertain for the Companies which the hon. Gentleman represented on that occasion. He (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) denied that the tenant right custom of Ulster had arisen from the action of the London Companies who held land in Ulster, but attributed it to the exigencies of the condition in which those Companies found themselves when they received the gift of land from the Crown. Then it was that the tenant right custom arose in Ulster; and why it was continued in Ulster alone had been sufficiently stated, 25 years ago, by an orator who gave as the reason of the custom that the tenants were Protestants, with arms in their hands. The hon. Member, although he had referred to two clauses, had taken exception only to the manner in which one of them would affect the Companies. He represented that the Companies would be most injuriously affected by Clause 18 of this Bill, although he admitted the Land Act of 1870 had done them no harm, but much good. The system of tenant right had not been established by, but was submitted to by, the Ulster Companies. It was rather commencing at the wrong end to have allowed these London Companies to retain the fee-simple of land in Ireland, while the Church lands were sold out. It was not such a long step to apply the principle of mortmain to those Companies, and to disestablish them. Such a measure would not in the slightest degree do violence to anyone's feelings, for there was no sacred halo about them, such as there was about an ecclesiastical institution. The hon. Member's apprehensions as to the effect of Clause 18 of this Bill were not justified. The Land Act of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich constituted the Chairman of a county a Judge in the Local Land Court, and gave him the power of taking all the circumstances of an eviction into consideration, and making his assessment. Now, Clause 18 of this Bill, which the hon. Gentleman had specifically objected to, simply declared that no tenant should be disentitled to obtain compensation under Section 3 of the Land Act, on the ground that he had been evicted by the landlord on account of the persistent exercise of any right from which he was debarred by private agreement with his landlord. The principle of that part of the clause was strictly in accordance with the principle of the Land Act, because there were tenancies recognized in the Land Act with respect to which the tenant could not contract himself out of the benefit of the Act. There was no intention to interfere with the right of private contracts, except under equitable circumstances; and there was a Proviso to the effect that nothing therein contained should prevent the Chairman, when assessing the compensation, from taking into consideration the conduct of the tenant, and all the circumstances attending the agreement. If, therefore, there was anything in the circumstances under which the tenant was made to contract himself out of the benefit of the Act, those circumstances should be taken into account, and full compensation, where equitable, should be allowed to the landlord on that account. He had expected that the Bill would have been allowed to be read a second time. He did not pretend that there were not clauses—though he did not think there were many—to which reasonable exception might not be taken in Committee; but the very last quarter from which he should have expected opposition was the London Companies. He considered their position as Irish landlords was an anachronism; he should like to see such anomalies got rid of by the sale of the land of those Companies to the highest bidders. If that were done, the Companies would get a full return for their so-called investment, and Ireland would get rid of the joint-stock landlordism which certainly did not recommend itself to his mind. If the City Companies chose to be represented in that House as opponents of legislation for Ireland, which Irish Members considered advisable, it was probable that they would shortly have to defend their own interests in another fashion.

COLONEL COLTHURST took note of the admission of the Mover of the Amendment that the Companies did not object to the extension of the Ulster tenant right to the rest of Ireland, and declared that the advocates of the Bill sought nothing more than that. That Ulster custom was admitted to contain certain principles. In the first place, the tenant had a right to continue in the occupation of his holding so long as he paid a fair rent for it, and if the landlord chose to disturb him, he must pay the full market value of such holding to his tenant; and that, in most parts of Ulster where the tenant right had not been taken away, meant something like 25 years' purchase. In the second place, the Ulster custom conferred on the tenant the privilege of holding at the fair customary rent of the neighbourhood—a rent, no doubt, which was subject to being raised by an increase in the price of corn, or by other circumstances, independent of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in the farm. The tenants of Ulster had the right of continuous occupation at fair rents and of a fair right of sale; and there was abundant evidence to show that the condition of the tenantry of Ulster was far superior to that of the tenantry of any other part of Ireland. He knew that one objection had been raised, which might be repeated again, to the effect that, while tenant right was all very well for Ulster, the people of Ulster were different in race and religion from the people of the rest of Ireland; but in Donegal, in part of the County Down, and in other portions of the Province, four-fifths of the occupying tenants were Celtic and Catholic, so that that objection did not hold good. The rents in Ulster were confessedly better paid than in any other part of Ireland; arrears were unknown, and, according to evidence of great weight, the rents were often higher, or as high, as in any other portion of the country. It was also said that if they granted perpetuity of tenure to the tenants, they would deprive the landlord of any real interest in his property, and cause him to be non-resident, and to care nothing about the welfare of the tenants. But he would appeal to any hon. Member who was acquainted with the facts, whether the landlords of Ulster were less solicitous about their property or their tenants than other landlords? The Ulster landlords took a deep interest in their property and in their tenants, and there were less non-residents in Ulster than in any part of the country. He should not have troubled the House, but for the fact that that he happened to represent one of the largest constituencies in Ireland—a constituency composed almost exclusively of tenant farmers—and in speaking as he had done he not only gave expression to the views of those whom he represented, but gave utterance to the opinions which he held conscientiously himself. He felt he could not better conclude than with the words of the late Lord Chief Justice Whiteside, who, travelling in Italy, and observing the prosperity that was caused by the existence of a peasant proprietary in the North of Italy, and seeing the same effects produced by the same cause in Ulster—because he (Colonel Colthurst) maintained that the Ulster tenant right virtually gave the tenantry the proprietorship of the land—said—

Sir Joseph M'Kenna

“If these principles are productive of so much benefit to Ulster, they should be fearlessly extended to the rest of Ireland.”

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that, after the admission of the Mover of the Amendment that he would gladly see the Ulster custom extended to the rest of Ireland, the supporters of the Bill might logically claim that hon. Gentleman's vote. He ventured to say that if the House would accept a measure embodying the main features of the custom, his hon. Friend the Member for Cork would waive all the subsidiary provisions of his Bill. The opposition given by the Government was of a different character.

The Irish tenants were to be congratulated on the fluent candour with which the Government had hitherto met the demand for reform of the law of landlord and tenant. They had been told, over and over again, that not only would fixity of tenure be refused, but that the Land Act had gone too far, and that it should not be extended beyond its present scope. That was an honest answer to a plain question on which the fate of the Irish nation depended. They knew from the mouth of Ministers that as long as they were in power nothing would be done to alter the relations of landlord and tenant. It had come very opportunely with a General Election not remote, and some very interesting contests going on. The Tories tolerated among them one Irish Member, the hon. and gallant Member for Sligo (Colonel King-Harman), of whom he wished to speak with great respect, who gave an annual vote in favour of the Irish Land Bill; but he was tolerated, because it was felt that his vote was a perfectly harmless vote, and that as long as he and a dozen other Irish Conservative Tenant Right Members, if there were so many, gave what was called an independent support to the Tory Government, by which was really meant a general support, independent of, and reckless of, the conduct of the Government on the Land Question, the Irish tenant had as little chance of obtaining any improvement in the condition of his tenancy from the present Government as he had of obtaining the fee-simple of his farm. The Bill would, no doubt, be rejected in the old way without the faintest hope that any amendment of the law would be considered. They knew what to expect. The bare idea of an inquiry into the working of the Land Act was summarily rejected by the Government last year. It was not merely that the Government refused to deal with the case. It steadily shut its eyes and refused to open them, and would not look at the case. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had on a late occasion, speaking in his official capacity, given his reasons. The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) had taxed him with speaking contemptuously of the Land Act. “No,” said the Chief Secretary, in his blindest tones, “I did not speak contemptuously of it. I say it is a bad Act.” It was dislike, and not contempt, that he felt to the tendency of the Land Act. Of course, he would endeavour to prevent the extension of the principles of that Statute. All that he could bring himself to say was that he would not wish vested interests that had grown up to be interfered with—whatever that ingenious sentiment meant, if it meant anything, and it did not. The Conservatives were capable of holding out expectations on Irish questions. They could allow false hopes to be created about the question of Irish University Education, and then, at the right moment, solemnly disclaim all connection with negotiations on that delicate topic. They could allow an Irish Registration Bill to reach a second reading—one of those cheap second readings which cost the Government so little that they might well be called penny readings. When the graceful comedy of a second reading was concluded, the right hon. and gallant Member for Dublin (Colonel Taylor)—that profound statesman who thought so much and spoke so little—or some Irish Conservative, would go about and find some congenial spirit to put down a Notice of opposition, and stay the further progress of the measure, and then the right hon. and gallant Member would feel his patriotic soul satisfied, and repose peacefully on the Treasury Bench. But on this question of the relation of landlord and tenant in Ireland the answer of Her Majesty's Government, and the furtherance of every Irish Member who gave them general support, was a genuine cry of "No surrender." And what was this measure that caused so much opposition? It merely endeavoured to extend to the rest of Ireland the principles of the custom under which the tenantry of Ulster had become a prosperous, contented, and industrious people. That proposal involved nothing novel or revolutionary. The custom had existed for ages without the form of law. The Land Act had turned that into law, giving an unsupported usage, unrecognized in the Courts, the validity of a legal usage, and consecrating it by statutory authority. There, indeed, was a novelty; but if it was a novelty it was a precedent also, and a wise one. The custom entitled the tenant to remain in possession as long as he paid a reasonable rent, and to assign to a good solvent tenant.

These rights given to the rest of Ireland would solve the question. They would not diminish the landlord's security for his rent, or his right to increase it within reasonable limits. They would not take away his power of insisting that his land should be well cultivated and kept in solvent and respectable hands. They would only prevent bad landlords from doing the very thing for which all good landlords condemned them. Good landlords would continue in their present wise and honourable course, and he fully admitted that they were the majority of landlords. It was said that various plans for the valuation of rent, suggested by advocates of tenant right, were unfair. He ventured to think that if the right to continuous occupation were made law, questions of valuation of rent would not often arise. But if they did, he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Cork was not wedded to any particular form of valuation tribunal, and he need not feel himself so wedded. Any fairly constituted tribunal would be accepted, provided it did not make competition the exclusive criterion of a fair rent. It was perfectly well known that undue competition had raised land far above its agricultural value in Ireland. Competition for land in Ireland was an unhealthy competition. It was mainly caused by this fact—the Irish tenant was afraid, on account of the insecurity of his tenure, to put money into land for its perfect cultivation; but having no use for his money in that direction, he invested it extravagantly in obtaining the possession of land whereon to live. Thus cultivation suffered. A good landlord never regarded competition as the real test in the choice of a tenant. He knew that a competition rent would not leave a proper margin for the support of the tenant, the due cultivation of a farm, and the remuneration of the tenant's expenditure and labour. Therefore, the landlord protested against competition being looked on as an exclusive test of the value of land in Ireland. With regard to sub-letting and sub-division, which he admitted led to evils, strong clauses in leases and agreements would effectually prevent them, as they did under the existing law, according to the experience of Irish lawyers. The hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) objected to this Bill because it would leave a possibility of contention constantly hanging over the heads of the landlords and tenants. There was a simple way of dealing with the question which would involve no necessity for contention or litigation. Take the main features of the Ulster custom—the right of continuous occupation, the liability to a reasonable rent, and the right of free sale to an approved assignee; enact that these conditions should attach generally to all farm tenancies, and then give the landlord every security against the dishonest tenant. If this seemed too revolutionary at this moment, let them take up the Land Act and inquire by the light of these past nine years how far its objects, even if fully attained, fell short of the necessities of the country. He did not expect any hopeful answer from Her Majesty's Government; and even if a hopeful answer were given, experience had taught them not to expect any practical reason of improvement in consequence of it. As for the Members of the Opposition, they should remember that experience had taught them that it was only by the Irish vote they could hope to achieve or retain power; and that vote they could not get unless they dealt fairly or wisely with the Land Question, which was not very important to the Irish tenant, but was the principal key to the gaining of Home Rule; because it was only when the English Parliament had disposed of the pretensions of Irish landlords that the latter would be induced to withdraw their opposition to an Irish Parliament, which they knew would soon dispose of those pretensions, and it might be that, like other great questions, it could only be solved by successive alterations of the law; but those alterations must be substantial and progressive. They must remove the insecurity of the tenant. He would not speak in the spirit of a menace, because it was not by menace, nor the ingenious manipulation of the English Party, but by the justice and moderation of their claim that the Irish tenant would succeed. They felt grateful for the attempt latterly made to create a peasant proprietary; but the creation of a peasant proprietary on the occasion of a few sales in the Landed Estates Court was no solution of the Land Question. The overwhelming majority of the tenants had no hope, and no possibility, of becoming proprietors. What they wanted was to be allowed to cultivate the land of their birth which they held as tenants, and could only hold as tenants in security. Let the right hon. Members for Greenwich and Birmingham address their minds to the great problem, and finish the work they had begun. When they returned to it, they would find their efforts sustained and seconded not by an Irish Whig contingent, as in former days, now gone for ever, but by an independent Irish Party.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON opposed the second reading of the Bill, contending that it was an exceedingly dangerous course to pursue, and one contrary to all the principles of political economy, that the landlords should be compelled by Acts of Parliament, by insidious degrees, to increase the powers of the tenant over the landlord. A landlord was surely as important as a trader; and what would the traders say if Parliament stepped in and said they were making too much profit, and must hand a portion of their profits over to somebody else? He was quite sure that hon. Members opposite would most indignantly oppose such a measure as that. He doubted the wisdom of at all times holding up the tenant as an injured individual; and he could not see why, in this matter, there had been one law for Ireland and another for England, the right of tenancy being the same in both countries. He believed that the consequence of passing such a Bill as this would be that the landlords would be afraid to let their land to anybody. It would be much better, in that case, for the landlord to work the land himself, because he could then do as he liked by it; whereas, if he passed it to a tenant, there would always be the risk that the tenant, availing himself of his novel rights, might take away the land from the landlord, and thus deprive him of his own freehold. The agitation on which they had embarked was a very serious matter, for it was calculated to interfere very materially with the prospects of their country and to raise false hopes. He hoped the House would not assent to the Bill. The Land Act of 1870 had been productive of great advantage to the tenants of Ireland, and the Irish Party might well be content to leave that Act to work for some 14 or 21 years before they disturbed it; and when further legislation was found necessary, then it should be proposed in a well-digested measure on the responsibility of a Government.

LORD FRANCIS CONYNGBAM said, he felt great difficulty in speaking on this subject to-day, because last year his name was upon the back of a Bill which was almost identically the same as the measure which was now before the House. Since last year he had lost—and the Home Rule Party had lost—one of their best friends and most kind advisers by the death of Mr. Butt. During the existence of the present Parliament death had been very heavy on the little Home Rule Party; for since this Parliament had been returned, the Home Rule Party had lost more men than any other Party. He should not have said anything at all to-day, had it not been for the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Alderman Cotton); and he must say that it appeared to him that a great many hon. Members sitting on the opposite side of the House, and also a great many hon. Gentlemen sitting above the Gangway upon that side of the House, knew very little about Irish affairs with regard to the Land Question. His own opinion on the question remained unchanged; and in the full belief that his Party did represent some portion of the territorial land in Ireland, he could assure those hon. Members whose speeches gave evidence of their want of knowledge on the subject of Irish land, that he was not afraid of any good Bill to increase the facilities for purchase by tenants in cases where estates were brought into the Landed Estates Court, or of anything in the direction of security of tenure. He knew very well what would be the result of this Bill. It was then nearly half-past 2 o'clock, and in the course of two hours there would be a tremendous number of hon. Members who would come down and, to use a vulgar expression, sit upon the Irish Members, and would then go home perfectly satisfied with having done so. They had lost one of their ablest men lately, and he was amused to see it stated in the newspapers that the Irish Party were fast breaking up; but he could assure the House that they need not be in the least afraid of that event. There was still an Irish Party who were determined that the Irish Land Question should be settled, and who would settle it.

Mr. Alderman Cotton

MR. JOHN GEORGE MACCARTHY said, the Irish Members had to thank the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Alderman Cotton) for having broken the long silence of the Governmental Benches. It illustrated one of the difficulties of Irish Members, who believed in the justice of their cause, and in the ultimate triumph of justice in that House, that speeches so able and so convincing as those of both the hon. Members for Cork County should have been addressed to almost empty Benches. In theory, a legislator was supposed to be one who calmly considered opposing pleadings, and recorded his vote, or delivered his speech, as the result of such consideration. But the fact sadly differed from the theory. Every new proposal had to be pleaded for to an almost vacant House, and was decided on by hon. Gentlemen who did not even hear what had been said about it. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London had at least given the advocates for the Irish tenant a fair hearing, and had frankly and courteously expressed his own views respecting their proposal. The hon. Member had also conferred on them the favour of illustrating in his own person the extreme difficulty under which English Members laboured in dealing with the internal affairs of a country on whose soil, perhaps, they had never stood. The hon. Member was a poet, and had enriched their literature with some imaginative productions. Let him be assured that in the boldest flights of his muse he never more completely left the solid ground of fact than in his conception of the mutual relations of Irish landlords and tenants. He said that they were substantially identical with such relations as they existed in England; and he pictured the happy Irish tenant whose peace was disturbed only by those who injudiciously desired to benefit his condition. But, in reality, no human position could be less like another than that of the sturdy English tenant entering into an equal bargain with his landlord, and the Irish agriculturist who, in the vast majority of cases, must accept whatever terms his landlord offered. As a rule, Irish tenants were not voluntary contractors. The terms they accepted and the tenure that prevailed had been well described as a collection of terms imposed by the strong upon the weak. Those terms were sometimes just and sometimes unjust; they were sometimes harshly enforced; but they were far more generally allowed to lie unused. They were all open to this fatal objection—that they rendered the man who tilled the soil uncertain as to whether or not he should enjoy the results of his labours. The hon. Member for the City of London considered that it would be a violation of the principles of political economy to give the tenant security of tenure. But perhaps the hon. Member knew more of poetry than of political economy. He (Mr. MacCarthy) ventured to ask what principle of political economy sanctioned the practice of compelling nearly the whole agriculture of the country to be conducted by men who were absolutely insecure as to the duration and the terms of their occupancy? On the contrary, if there were one doctrine of political economy more clearly established than another it was that, unless in the purely special and exceptional case of farms fully equipped and requiring no outlay, such insecurity of tenure was a wrong to the tenant, an injury to the landlord, a fatal hindrance to agriculture, a fearful peril to the State. Indeed, the first principle of political economy was the right of the producer to the product, the certainty that he who sowed should reap. But, as a general rule, that principle could only be carried out by providing some reasonable duration of occupancy on fair terms. The reason why no one improved in barbarous countries was that no one was certain of the duration of his tenure. In insisting on precariousness of tenure, they defended barbarism, and sought to revert to barbaric precedents. Of all arts, agriculture most required time. The agriculture that thought only of next year was the agriculture of the savage. Real agriculture sacrificed the present to the future—the immediate petty gain to the large ultimate advantage. It was the product not of the land but of the farm, and the farm was created only by labour that looked years ahead for its reward. To ripen the sower's richest harvest, it was not only one summer that was required, but many summers. A proper succession of crops and a higher state of cultivation were becoming every day more and more necessary to the successful prosecution of agriculture. Hence, to deprive the agriculturist of a reasonable certainty of continuous occupancy was either to paralyze his industry or to submit its results to confiscation—in either case, to violate the fundamental principles of public policy. Edmund Burke said—

“Confine a tenant to temporary possession, and you cut off that laudable avarice which every wise State cherishes as a first principle of its greatness.”

Those views had had the sanction of Parliament itself. The Land Act was passed to obtain for the Irish tenant some fair chance of continuous occupancy, and some reasonable security for the results of his labours. Their complaint that day was that the object of the Legislature had not been attained, and that three-fourths of the tenants of Ireland were still in a barbarous state of uncertainty as to the duration of their tenure, and as to the security for the results of their industry. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, in introducing the Land Act, spoke in his own eloquent way of notices to quit falling like snow-flakes over the land. Those cold and bitter snowflakes still, too often, chilled the peasants' hearts and ruined the peasants' homes. In the three years before the Land Act the number of ejectments brought on notice to quit in Ireland was 4,253. In the three years subsequent to the Land Act the number of ejectments was 5,641, thus showing an increase of 1,388. In the three subsequent years 8,439 such notices were served. There were no more recent Returns; but, taking the average, 20,000 such ejectments had taken place since the right hon. Member for Greenwich made his great effort to stay them. Every holding might be supposed to represent a home, and every home an average of five persons. Thus, if that calculation be approximately correct, a population as large as that of the City of Cork—men, women, and children—must have been capriciously evicted from their homes under the operation of the Land Act of 1870. Other demonstrations of insecurity abounded. Everyone familiar with the agricultural affairs of the country knew that any experienced landlord going properly about it could still evict his tenants at will, and, instead of losing, make money by the transaction. That they did not do so was due to their own sense of justice. It was not due to any protection afforded to the tenant by the laws of the country. Now, he (Mr. MacCarthy) asked how could agriculture thrive under such circumstances? How could land be otherwise than depreciated in value? How could the country be otherwise than impoverished? It should be borne in mind, also, that Irish agriculturists had to contend with American agriculturists to an extent hitherto unknown. An able writer in a recent number of Macmillan's Magazine had shown that the importation of foreign breadstuffs into the United Kingdom had risen from 58,000,000 in 1857, to 160,000,000 in 1877. A still more able writer, in a more recent number—Mr. A. J. Wilson—whose statesmanlike papers had obtained such well-deserved attention, had shown that while it cost 48s. to produce a quarter of wheat in these Islands, an equal quantity of American wheat could be delivered in Liverpool for 37s. Surely, in the face of such facts, the Legislature ought to give the Irish farmer a chance for his life. It could not really serve the landlord; it could not really serve the State—to compel the Irish farmer to meet such competition on terms obviously unfair. Of course, those pleadings would fail that day; but the principles they advocated would some day be accepted. It was characteristic of that House to resist improvements at first, then to repent the unwise resistance, and then to carry triumphantly the very measures that had been resisted. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), whose accession to that House gave so much pleasure to Members of all sections, in his valuable and brilliant history of our own times, had given some curious instances of that. Thus he told how the great philosophical historian, Mr. Grote, brought forward, year after year, his Motion for the Ballot; and how, year after year, the Motion was scornfully rejected by vast majorities, and confuted by brilliant speeches. But, as now appeared, the vast majorities were all wrong, and the brilliant speeches were all moonshine. The same historian told how, when the Motion for penny postage was introduced here, it was denounced by the then Postmaster General as being of "all wild and extravagant schemes the wildest and most extravagant." They would hear by-and-bye their proposals denounced in language not less strong, and with no greater reason. Parliament was incessantly making such mistakes, and incessantly appearing on the stool of repentance for having made them. This was a subject too serious to render mistakes innocent; it concerned the homes of the people; it concerned the only really great industry of the country—its agriculture; it concerned every man in the country, for every class was more or less dependent on the agricultural class. It concerned the interests and the honour of the Empire; for surely it would be neither conducive to the honour or the interests of the Empire to insist on managing Irish affairs, and then to mismanage them so signally as to render the homes of the people insecure, to retard its agriculture, to hinder its improvement, to depreciate the value of its landed property, and to leave the condition of the Irish agriculturist a reproach to the civilization of the world.

COLONEL TOTTENHAM, as an owner of land, ventured to make a few observations on the Bill. The first and second parts of it were of minor importance, and he had no serious objection to them; but on the third part of the Bill he found himself at issue with the hon. Gentleman who had introduced the measure. He believed that in the interests alike of landlord and tenant that which was called fixity of tenure in Ireland would be, to a great extent, prejudicial. It would not only strain the relations of landlord and tenant to a very considerable degree, but it would deprive the landlord and the estate generally of the control which was of the greatest possible benefit to the tenant. He did not wish to enter on the merits or demerits of the Land Act. He believed it had given to the tenants a valuable interest in the land which they had not possessed before; and it had given them a security which he did not grudge them, and which must tend to their benefit. But if there was any disadvantage in the Land Act, it was the withdrawal of some of the control which the landlord formerly exercised in the choice of his tenants, and in the management of his estate. He knew, from his own experience, that if he had assented to all the applications made to him by his tenants to be allowed to dispose of their holdings it would not have been for their benefit. A case of the kind had occurred recently.

Mr. John George MacCarthy

He did not know whether he was called a bad landlord or a good one; but during the seven or eight years he had been connected with the management of his estate he had never had occasion to change a tenant, and his object had been always to retain them. Well, an old tenant, nearly 80 years of age, came to him, saying he was worn out, and wanted to sell his interest in the holding to a successor, whereby he could get £40 or £50 ready money. He, however, made inquiries, and found that the old man's son had for years been earning and paying the rent of the farm, and that the old man, having quarrelled with him, wished to disinherit him by getting the ready money, and, when that was spent, going into the workhouse. Was that the sort of tenant right they were anxious to encourage? Another case of a very similar kind had recently occurred; but in both instances he refused his consent, which he could not have done if the provisions of this Bill had been in force, and then the parties would have been ruined. He should, therefore, oppose the second reading of the Bill.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he did not intend to go into the general question, or into the principles involved in this debate. All that had been admirably done by some of his hon. Friends; but there were one or two points in the debate to which he wished briefly to refer. The hon. and gallant Member for New Ross (Colonel Tottenham) had pointed out cases in which the exercise of proprietary right might be perverted by malign or worthless persons, so as to inflict injury; but it would be impossible to furnish any system or law which would prevent a bad father from being bad, or put a stop to evils of various kinds being brought about by ungrateful or unworthy men. As an abstract statement, he was quite willing to admit that it might occasionally be for people's benefit if they were prevented from exercising their full legal rights; but that was not an argument for refusing to recognize men's common rights altogether. He must express his surprise and regret that the opposition to the Bill should have come directly from a Member of the Liberal Party, to which he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had long had the honour of belonging. It appeared to him a strange fatality that it should so often happen that the work of hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial Benches should be performed for them by hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Opposition side of the House, and that some Member of the Liberal Party was so often willing to relieve hon. Gentlemen opposite of responsibility, and perform an obnoxious task for them. Everyone who knew the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) knew perfectly well that he had none but high and proper motives for what he did. Still, there seemed a certain simplicity in the explanation the hon. Baronet gave of the course he was about to take. He explained that he opposed the Bill in the interests of the Irish Society. Now, that Society, however well it might have managed its affairs in recent generations, only began to occupy Irish lands by virtue of conquest and of confiscation; and if the hon. Baronet had thought less of the Irish Society and more of the Irish people, he would have seen there was good reason for withholding his opposition to this measure. But the hon. Baronet objected to the Bill, on the ground that it put a stop to the power of landlord and tenant to contract themselves out of the clauses of the existing Act; and he asked why that power should be taken away from them? Now, if there was any course more dangerous than another, or more calculated to produce evil results, it was, first of all, for the general convenience of the people to lay down general rules restricting the power to do certain things, and then to give permission to individuals to contract themselves out of such legislation. Such an arrangement had, undoubtedly, acted so as to mar the good effect which existing legislation on the subject of Irish land tenure might otherwise produce. What would happen if, in regard to our factory legislation, and our legislation relating to shipping and merchant seamen, we were so to enforce the rights of individuals as to allow any two persons, employer, and employed, to contract themselves out of the Acts of Parliament? The hon. Member opposite had carried them back to the earliest days of this controversy by raising the broad, general question as to the right to limit in any way, by Parliamentary legislation, the rights of employers and landlords. Existing legislation, however, had completely disposed of that view of the matter; and it would seem like a superfluous travelling back to the dark ages of the controversy, if they were to begin again to demonstrate that the public interests, when occasion required, must be held superior to individual rights. They had been asked if the trading or manufacturing class would endure any Parliamentary limitation of the profits of their trade? But the greater part of our factory legislation had actually had the effect of interfering with the full exaction of profits of trade. The existing legislation in regard to Irish land, and even this Bill itself, did not go so far in that direction as the measures affecting factories and trades. The Bill before the House only acknowledged the general principle of the laws of this country—namely, that the interests of the State were superior to any real or supposed private rights. The supposed sanctity of private territorial rights had gone with the days of feudalism, and all the other vanished institutions and customs which were once believed to be immutable and eternal.

Mr. WHEELHOUSE said, it had been stated there was something widely different between the position of an English landlord and tenant and an Irish landlord and tenant, and the only ground on which that statement was based was that in England they generally spoke of landlords as a rich body of men, the tenants also being extremely well off; whereas in Ireland the landlords were well-to-do, but the tenants were supposed to be in a much worse condition than the English tenants. Without stopping at this moment to inquire how far this statement would bear investigation, surely that could not be a ground for alleging there ought to be any difference between the general relations of the two, whether it was on this side of the Channel or the other. Any such idea would be entirely at variance not merely with the views upon the matter in England, but with every sound principle of possessory rights anywhere. He did not know upon what grounds the statement was based, that the English people knew nothing of the feeling of Irishmen with regard to their territorial rights. Allegations of that kind were most easily made—wholesale statements, if he might so call them. Without wishing to impute wrong to anyone, it was perfectly easy to make such assertions, either in this House or elsewhere; but he ventured to think, with all due respect to those who made them, there was no ground for such allegations. For years they had had their own tenants in England exactly in the same position as the Irish tenant, with this exception—that the tenant in Ireland, even before the Irish Land Act was passed, had better terms compulsorily given to him by the law than had ever been given to the English tenant in England. There were certain things—call it Ulster custom if they pleased, or by any other name; but there were in Ireland certain rules and regulations to which they in England had never yet come, and he had no reason to expect, or hope, they ever should arrive at them; and, further, he was not sure it was desirable they should carry out those rules. They were told that one of the greatest doctrines of political economy was the security for holdings. He quite admitted that, within reasonable limits, that view was perfectly correct; but security, even as a question of political economy, must be within reasonable limits; and he said it was not political economy that there should be such a security as was sought to be laid down under the lines of the Bill he held in his hand. It was more—it was taking, or seeking to take, from the proprietor the actual rights that belonged to him, and giving them in perpetuity to the tenant. That was not permitted in English legislation; and he trusted it would never be permitted in Irish legislation, so far to forget the differences between the landlord and tenant as to make the landlord subject to the tenant, and putting the former in such a position as that. That was not security—it was confiscation. It amounted to nothing less than that, and it was necessary they should know it. Let them look at what they had when they talked about such security. He knew that was not a time when they should go through the details of the measure now before the House; but, in order to show what the foundation of it really was, he would take the language of the 18th section of the Bill, that no tenant should be disentitled to obtain compensation under the 3rd section of the Land Act on the ground that he “Is evicted by the landlord on account of the persistent exercise of any right from which he is debarred by express or implied agreement with his landlord.”

Mr. Justin M'Carthy

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Read the whole of the clause. ["Order, order!"]

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he would do so later on; but at present he was only dealing with the first part of the question. He had both parts of the section in his mind, and had had them in his mind for some time; and he could assure the hon. Gentleman he would not, on the one hand, forget to read the whole clause, nor, on the other, was he likely to be put off his argument, because any attempt was made to mix up two totally different subjects. He took the language of the 18th section as it stood; and he would ask anyone who knew anything about the subject, if that was not a section which had the effect of allowing the landlord to be at the mercy of the tenant, and permitting the tenant to do precisely that which he liked with every acre of the land he occupied? As he was asked, he would come to the second part of the section, which he had certainly intended to do without any such request; and he must say the subsequent part of the section was even stronger than the first, and declared more emphatically what the principles of the Bill were. It proposed the repeal of the 14th section of the Land Act, and this, he apprehended, was one of those clauses that was inserted for the purpose of guarding Irish property from one of the inroads which it was now sought to bring to bear upon it. If the 14th section was desirable in 1870, it was desirable now, as a safeguard against the propositions of the Bill. Was it to be supposed that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, who was mainly instrumental in passing the Land Act, did not know how far he could go, and how far he dared go? But let them take the last portion of the Bill, which provided that nothing contained in the Act should permit the Chairman, in awarding compensation, from taking into consideration the conduct of the tenant in the manner provided by the 18th section of the Land Act. He wanted to know what that meant but the purest—if it could be said to be pure at all—most complete Communism in the world? It was nothing but Communism in its most undisguised similitude thus to say that the tenant should do what he liked with the land. The tenant was to have the power to say he would persist in setting at defiance the rules and regulations—it might be the payment of rent, for aught he knew, even set everything at defiance—and still the landlord should have no practical remedy, and the tenant could force the landlord to go to the Chairman of some local sessions, or land tribunal, whose interests, for all he knew, would be antagonistic to one or the other, and have a question of so-called compensation settled. It was unreasonable to imagine that the landlord ought to be wiped out practically in that way. Were they to be told there was something different in Ireland—that the state of things was so exceptional, that they should reverse all the rights existing between the landlord and the tenant throughout that country? When they were considering such a question, let them take care that what they were seeking to carry out would be well; and do not let them, under the name of fixity of tenure, really give every man in Ireland a proprietary right—and that in perpetuity, moreover—which in no way whatever belonged to him. The idea of carrying out a contract was altogether ignored, and any tenant could force a landlord to go before a tribunal to have the contract practically set aside. There was nothing in Ireland to justify the reversal of the landlord's rights—nothing to justify, under the name of fixity of tenure, the giving a right to every tenant at the expense of the owner of the property. It would be an evil day for the country when that House so far forgot the rights of the landlords as to pass this Bill. If a tenant was a good tenant and paid his rent, conforming to all the regulations, performing the covenants, of the estate, doing his duty by the land, then any landlord, no matter on which side of St. George's Channel, would be glad to keep him. It was not the fault of laws or of Government that there was such a poor class of tenant farmers in Ireland. He regretted that such should be the case; but legislation such as that attempted here would never alter or amend that state of things; and he trusted the House would not be led into thinking that any remedy was to be found in disregarding the rights of contract, and of putting on the tenant those rights a landlord had always had handed down with his inheritance.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, the Irish Land Question had been before the House on several occasions, and he would not now detain the House at any great length. It would appear that the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Wheelhouse) was under the impression he was in some law debating society, giving an address to persons knowing very little of legal matters on the subject of the Law of Contract. But to create a contract and to make it available, the parties ought to be in a position to enter into the contract. The hon. and learned Member, and other English Members who were not acquainted with the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, had dealt with the question from an abstract point of view, and had totally disregarded what every man who considered the question ought to regard—namely, the social and political relations of the Irish people, and the position of landlord and tenant in Ireland. Speaking from a landlord's own point of view, landlords should regard the 20 or 30 years' experience they had had of the consideration of this question. It was the old story of the Sybilline books. He remembered the time when Sir Joseph Napier, when he held high law office under the late Lord Derby, was put forward to make the statement of the great Conservative Party in England on the position which the landlord and tenant question occupied at that day, and he made statements which seemed to horrify many of the hon. Gentlemen who sat beside him. But what had been the course of events? Why, to a considerable degree, the opinions which were then put forward had been carried out by legislative enactments. Now they were considering, not in the words of the hon. and learned Member who had just addressed them, whether they were to suppress the position of landlord or not, but whether this was not the time for them to set their house in order, and without giving undue advantage to any class of society, to carry out a fair arrangement between them, rather than to wait till circumstances might induce a settlement of the question, which no one who now took part in these proceedings would regard as a fair one. In olden days, landlords in Ireland did not very much consider, in the administration of their property, what were the social results of a particular course of conduct. They seemed to think that the placing of one class of men upon the Government Bench was the sumum bonum for an Irish landlord. They seemed to think that because a man once in a way contributed to obtaining for a friend the apron of a Bishop or the wig of a Judge, they were performing their duty to themselves and their families. But landlords had now arrived at this position—that they had to fight in that House for matters which 20 or 30 years ago would have been regarded as unassailable. What was the result of a man being a territorial magnate in Ireland in olden days? There was no ballot, and he could make any number of 40s. freeholders he chose in his particular district, not to conduce to the good cultivation of the land, not to raise a large quantity of beef and butter to export to England, but to get a pen of Irish voters together, when there was a consideration of whether a certain right hon. Gentleman was to be Chief Secretary for Ireland or not, or whether some right hon. Member was to be made a Chief Justice; and it was said that the landlord had performed his social functions when he had driven those men like sheep to the poll, and had done his duty at once to himself, to his family, and to the country. They had got over that state of society now, and had not to consider the political relations of landlords and tenants in Ireland. It was not now in the strict sense a political question, but a social question. He spoke to hon. Members opposite, who owned more land than he did, although his subsistence, too, was derived from land, and he spoke as a landlord. He had seen the folly that had actuated those men in the olden times; and he asked hon. Members if they were going to pursue that insane folly at present? They might have their own opinions as to the manner in which the Government of the country was to be conducted, and they might express their opinions like men, and according to their influence they might give effect to those opinions; but the day was gone by when they could imagine that, by any system of force or compulsion, they could drive those men who held land from them any more than they could drive the shopkeepers of the towns to express the opinions of their landlords, except by fair persuasion. Now, what was proposed by this Bill? Hon. Members had said that it was proposed to take the rights of the landlords away. What rights? They could not use a fusy supervision over the tenants, and tell them what they were to do. But they could say to a tenant—"You hold your land from me; you owe a certain amount of rent, and if you do not pay it I have the law on my side;" and the Bill did not propose to interfere with such a law. "I can remove you from the holding in which you have proved yourself an unworthy servant." No hon. Member on that side of the House wished to pursue the question further than that. He thought few hon. Members opposite would deny that, admitting the great advantages of the Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, it had been proved by experience that there were instances in which that Bill had failed to do what the right hon. Gentleman stated it was his intention it should do when he brought it in—namely, to give a certainty of tenure to a hard working man. He did not think the House could do a better act than to give a second reading to the Bill, which professed to give that certainty of tenure which late legislation had not afforded. If the statements made were exaggerated, and if the claims put forward could not be well sustained, the matter could be well considered in Committee. It had been often stated that hon. Members who came to the House from Ireland cared little about anything except their own particular position in the House; but it would be seen, from the list of Members furnished by Irish constituencies, that the large majority of them were connected with the landed interest of the country; and it was not to be supposed that for the casual position to be obtained by being in the House of Commons for four or five years, men would give up their interests, as well as their opinions, to promote what had been called a system of confiscation. Certainly, if the Bill were worthy of such a term, he should not be there to advocate it. Whatever the opinion of the Government might be of the Bill, there was one thing he would wish to impress upon them. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had lived too short a time in Ireland to learn; and if he had done so, the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) could give him the information that a strong impression prevailed throughout all classes of Ireland that, while admitting the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich to have conferred great and inestimable benefits on the Irish people, there had been instances of its working in a very unjust direction—instances which had been exhibited in every County Court in Ireland, and which warranted everyone who cared for the interest of the country in giving the Bill his earnest and thorough support. It was said that there were clauses in the Bill which could never pass the House of Commons. But his impression was that, commencing in small degrees, great questions had arisen, and had been carried out in a way that no one could have dreamed of in the first inception; and this might be the case with the Irish Land Bill when it came before Committee. At all events, he would remind hon. Members opposite that ucalegon proximus ardet applied to this question. Looking at the present position of agriculture in England—and he was not in error in stating that there was not a county in which farms had not been given up or were about to be given up—he would ask English landlords whether it would not be well for them to take time by the forelock, and to abate that high notion of individual prerogative which they possessed, from having been brought up in the idea that they were the lords of the soil and of all that appertained to it? He was glad that several English Members had joined in the debate, because the way to prevent a big revolution in this country was to put our house in order in time. The position in England now was very much what it was in Ireland before the Famine precipitated affairs; and this Bill would show hon. Members what they would shortly have to do with reference to the landed proprietors of England. He said, when he rose, that he only intended to make a few observations upon this question. It was, unfortunately, a question which had distracted his country for the last 50 years. The Irish people had really been unable to give expression to their opinions either in that House or elsewhere; and it was not to be met by the quiet chaff of those Gentlemen who had searched Chitty upon Contracts with the view of giving character to their speeches. At present they had to consider, not merely a Law of Contract such as had been referred to by the hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse), but the state, position, and the internal and social arrangements of the nation. What he had said about Ireland would be equally true of England; and he would urge hon. Members representing English constituencies to allow the Bill to go into Committee, when the statements which had been made would be carefully considered, and when their judgments would not be disturbed by declamatory speeches.

Sir Patrick O'Brien

SIR JOHN LESLIE regarded the introduction of the Bill at the present time as singularly inopportune. The period which had elapsed since it was last introduced, and since the House pronounced a judgment upon it, was so limited that he thought it was unwise to re-open the subject. In the next place, it was impossible to turn to the back of the Bill without discovering that there were peculiar circumstances connected with it; and, as a matter of feeling, he thought it would have been only respect due to the organizer of the measure (Mr. Butt), and to Mr. Downing, who was a strong supporter of it, that the Order of the Day should have been treated with mournful and respectful silence. There was another reason which he would advance why this measure came inopportunately at the present time, which was that it anticipated legislation which was expected in reference to the "Bright Clauses" of the Land Act. The two measures could not run together; and it was obvious that no tenant farmer could be expected to advance any portion of the purchase-money for his holding if he were told by the Representatives of Ireland—as he was told by this Bill—that he need not put himself to any inconvenience to supply this purchase-money at all, because if this measure passed he would become a freeholder of his farm without any outlay. This Bill, with its wild generalities about fixity of tenure, free sale, and fair rents, must make way for legislation on the subject to which both sides of the House looked as a real advantage for peasant proprietors, if conducted upon prudent principles. He had watched, with great interest, all that had been said by speakers upon this question during the Recess, and he read, with interest, the speech of the hon.

and learned Member (Mr. O'Shaughnessy), delivered last year at Limerick. That hon. and learned Member called upon his hearers to affirm that every living soul, every artizan in the town, and every man in the community had an interest in the proper cultivation of the land. In that remark he fully concurred. They were all interested and concerned in producing the greatest amount possible from the cultivation of the land; but the hon. and learned Member for Limerick then went on to say that the remedy was fixity of tenure—a conclusion which he entirely disagreed with. The crying evil, the besetting sin of Ireland, was the indifferent cultivation of the soil. It was the want of improvement in that respect, not the want of improvement in the laws, which prevented the tenant farmers of the country from rising to the standard to which they aspired. Fixity of tenure would only perpetuate the evils which they had already suffered from, and would establish what they really ought to get rid of—namely, a slothful, thriftless, ignorant system of cultivation which would lead those who were fixed in their possessions to neglect their duties, and, in the end, find themselves in the poorhouse. A true friend of the tenant farmer should show him how he enjoyed advantages above his class in other parts of the Kingdom, how, in addition to the advantages given to others, he had compensation for disturbance as a sole privilege; and, therefore, instead of looking for a remedy to alteration in the laws, they should look to their own energy and knowledge of the elementary principles of agriculture. Never did hon. Members opposite, in their addresses, get out of the political aspect of the question. By no chance did they allude to what was the real root of the evil—bad cultivation. He trusted, so far as this Bill was concerned, that the House would not consent to the second reading. An hon. Member (Mr. Shaw) had said that it was a very moderate measure; but he considered it went far beyond what was contemplated, and was an extreme measure, and for that reason he hoped they would hear no more of it, and that a modified Bill would hereafter be introduced capable of working in concert with the measure relating to the establishment of a peasant proprietary.

Sir Patrick O'Brien

Mr. BLENNERHASSETT said, he had no intention of detaining the House; but there were one or two observations which he felt bound to reply to. The hon. Baronet (Sir John Leslie) had expressed regret at the loss of two distinguished Members, and had said that this was, therefore, an inopportune time to proceed with this Bill. But he (Mr. Blennerhassett) considered that the best tribute they could pay to the memory of those who had departed was to press on quietly, but, at the same time, determinedly, the principles which they so sincerely advocated. The hon. Baronet had expressed a fear that the present measure would interfere with the proposed legislation on the "Bright Clauses" of the Land Act. No one could believe more strongly than he did in the beneficial nature of those clauses; but he must point out that their operation had not been so extensive as was anticipated. The hon. Baronet shared the views which he entertained with reference to the "Bright Clauses." Their object was to create and retain a large number of tenant farmers in Ireland with security of tenure. The whole point was simple, and lay in a nutshell. If they could deal with the land in Ireland, and the relations between landlord and tenant upon purely commercial principles, the present system might work well; but it was because those relations did not exist that the tenant was deprived of every incentive to industry and perseverance. The hon. Baronet had said that they should improve the cultivation of the land rather than make a political question out of it; but it appeared to him that the two things were united, and they could not look at one point without having regard to the other. When Lord Spencer was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, he tried to improve the cultivation of the land by a system of prizes, and other efforts had been made in that direction which he hoped would have a good result; but Professor Baldwin, in a pamphlet which he had lately issued, showed how difficult it was to produce any result, because, he said, the tenants feared that by improving their holdings and making the farms tidy they would be called upon to pay an increased rent, and the landlords would thus swallow up the extra capital or labour which they might expend. He did not wish to make any complaint against landlords; but it could not be denied that this idea prevailed greatly throughout Ireland. Judge Flanagan, in his evidence before the Committee on the "Bright Clauses," insisted strongly upon the expediency of providing for the sale of the residue of estates, after the majority of the tenants had purchased their holdings. The smaller lots of land put up for sale generally fell into the hands of small purchasers, who proved the most avaricious landlords, and by their exactions paralyzed and spread fear throughout the tenants of a whole district. If the land was held by just and honourable men nothing would be heard of the subject; but they were bound to deal with the matter as they found it, and to prevent unscrupulous landlords from trading in what really belonged to the tenant. This debate would, he was sure, throw a good deal of light upon the subject, and it would show the different ways in which the English and Irish Members approached the subject; but nothing was so calculated to mislead the House as to compare the way in which the land in England was held with that of Ireland. Therefore, if they wished to deal justly, it must be considered as an Irish question simply, and legislation must be applied to the peculiar circumstances of that country.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) had introduced the Bill to the House in a speech of singular moderation—not singular to him, because he was always moderate—in the most persuasive and attractive, but, at the same time, an eminently misleading manner. And no one would have recognized, from the way in which he spoke, that he was asking the House to read a second time a Bill of the character which was now before them. In fact, anyone would have imagined from his manner, that it was a moderate, easy-going measure on the land laws of Ireland, and that it was inconceivable that anyone could be found who was so rash as not to accept such a boon. That was the manner in which he had introduced it; and, in fact, he seemed like a modern Moses, trying to lead his chosen people through a wilderness of legislation into a land of promise, from which the older proprietors were to be cast out. There had been debates on this subject for the last five or six years, and in the present discussion not a new fact or new argument had been adduced. The Bill was divided into three parts. The first part was put in, he would not say deliberately to mislead; but it would certainly have the effect of leading a Member who did not read the whole measure to believe that it was a moderate and harmless measure. There was in this part many clauses of a moderate character, and which were well worthy of consideration. If they stood alone many of these clauses might be discussed. The second part of the Bill proposed some amendments in detail, and there might be amongst the clauses of which it consisted some few grains of wheat amongst a mass of chaff; but, although some of these provisions might be worthy of acceptance, he would point out that some of the clauses might be capable of considerable extension. The clauses contained an effort to introduce what was vigorously resisted when the Land Act was passed—that was, the introduction of the jury element into the administration of the land laws before the County Court Judges. When that attempt was first made a very full discussion ensued, and it was pointed out that it would simply hold up the landlords to confiscation to allow County Court Judges to submit disputed questions as to the compensation to be paid by landlords to juries of tenant farmers; and with such obvious good sense was that advanced that the House of Commons at once acceded to that view, and it was decided that the provisions of the Land Act should be judicially administered by the County Court Judge, and the jury element should be carefully excluded. Well, one of the sections of the second part of the Bill now before the House provided that a Chairman should, if he thought fit, refer the question to a jury, who he should call in to assist him in his decision if a single question arose, not only under the Land Act, but under any of the provisions of the Bill. That was about as grave and serious an innovation as could possibly be imagined. It was no use to point out that it was permissive, and that the Judge was not compelled to call in a jury. The minute a popular question arose he would be pressed all round to allow his judgment to be assisted by the jury; and if he was not extremely firm, and if it was a case about which there was any great popular excitement, he might be very glad to get rid of the responsibility of deciding such disputant questions, and refer it to a jury. The only other remark he had to make as to the second part of the Bill was that the effect of its provisions (in seeking to repeal the 12th section of the Land Act) was such as to amount to a legislative enactment that any tenant, no matter what his education or ability or wealth—even if he held thousands of acres of the best land in Meath, and was richer than his landlord—should not have the power to enter into any valid contract with his landlord with respect to altering the compensation under the Land Act. Was not that really rank nonsense? And yet that House was quietly asked to pass a measure which was susceptible—and was intended to be susceptible—of such a monstrous construction as that. But the second part of the Bill was nothing compared to what the third part was, and which contained what he supposed he must call the principle of the Bill. That was a very remarkable portion of the Bill, and required a little attention to find out exactly what the principle was, because it was disguised in 20 or 30 sections, and required to be put into plain English. Without going through the details of the sections, the part was this—that by an Act which was retrospective, and did not look simply to the future, it proposed to enable every tenant in Ireland, no matter under what circumstances he got his farm, or what his position might be—no matter what his wealth, his education, or his intellectual attainments, or the extent of his holding—if he pleased, against the wish of his landlord, by giving a simple notice, to turn his tenure into a perpetuity. But the hon. Member for Cork did not put his proposition in such a naked form as that was—though that was the real principle of the measure, and it was necessary that the House should have the simple plain English words to deal with in deciding such a question. It proposed to enable a tenant, no matter how he got his position, by the service of a notice, to turn his tenure into a perpetuity, and that without giving one farthing of compensation to the landlord—and whether he pleased or not. All he could say was,

The Attorney General for Ireland

to use a common expression, that that was rather a strong order—that principle was diluted into 10 or 11 sections, and so its meaning might not be at once perceived by a casual reader; but what it really said was that every person, except the landlord, should have power to regulate and fix the rent. The County Court Judge, in the second part of the Bill, was invited and persuaded to rid himself of his responsibility by handing the disputed question over to a jury; but in all cases of dispute the County Court Judge had absolutely no discretion whatever as to the fixing of the rent. The Judge might arrive at a conclusion that the rent suggested was wrong; and yet he must register the figures handed over to him by two gentlemen, who were obliged to swear a very attractive oath as to the proper rent to be paid in future. He asked was that a reasonable kind of Bill to ask the House to read a second time? He ventured to say that it was not; that the few observations he had made would show that it was a very stringent and strong measure; and if he did not use the word "confiscation" in regard to it, it was because that word had been used so often that he should like to find a new word to mean about the same thing. With regard to the machinery for fixing the rent—each party, the landlord, who was unwilling to be dragged into the matter at all, he was told he must fix an arbitrator; and the tenant, who was the real master of the situation, and who could do what he pleased, and by serving a notice transfer his tenure into a perpetuity, he was to appoint another arbitrator, and then two gentlemen were to proceed to fix the rent. If those men honestly discharged their duty, and rigidly proceeded in the way fixed by the Bill, there would be a substantial rising of rents from the Giant's Causeway to Cape Clear; but he ventured to say that that was not the object of the Bill, and if any Member made such a suggestion as that, he ventured to say he would meet with a somewhat warm reception when he returned to Ireland; and, therefore, he contended that it was intended that the arbitration clause should only work in another way, and that the only variation of the landlords' rents was to be downwards—that the arbitrator might lower the rent, but was not expected to raise them. If that was not intended, why was the County Court Judge given absolutely no discretion to decide in any single particular as to the amount of the rent? The Preamble of the Bill was a masterpiece of apparently studied frankness; and in his original Bill the late Mr. Butt acted on the principle that it was absurd to include in its provisions a number of rich graziers, who, in nine cases out of ten, were better off than their landlords; but the farmers' clubs in Ireland, which were very powerful, were not satisfied with the exclusion; the Bill was altered to suit their views, and now applied to every farm in Ireland, no matter what its extent. Was it not absurd to say that all that could be changed in Committee, when the principle had been deliberately introduced into the Bill? He addressed the same criticism to the Bill before, and yet it was introduced again; and, therefore, it must be taken that it was deliberately intended to make the Bill apply to all farms in Ireland. He also could not help referring to what had been said as to the extension of such a principle to English farms; and it was impossible not to see that if the principle he had referred to was applied in the way proposed in Ireland, it could not possibly rest there, but some attempt would be made to extend it to England. How were arrears of rent dealt with in the Bill? If a man was four or five years in arrears, one would have thought that, as a matter of common sense, if a tenant had the power given him to turn his tenure into perpetuity by serving notice, that at least a landlord would have power to recover his arrears of rent. But one must change all one's preconceived notions in dealing with the Bill before the House; for he found that when a tenant was five years in arrears in his rent and was under notice of ejectment, that notice of ejectment was paralyzed by the tenant being able to serve a notice on his landlord stating his desire to turn his tenancy, for which he was five years' rent in arrear, and for which he was being sought to be ejected, into a perpetuity. What was the discretion of the Judge in such a case? He might, if he pleased, award to the landlord, before the tenant was turned into a perpetuity, a sum which should in no case exceed one year's arrear of rent. One would have thought that the unfortunate landlord, who had only got one year's rent when five were owing, at all events would be able to recover all his costs in such a matter; but, again, the Judge, who had no discretion as to the raising of the rent, and who could only award one year's rent instead of five, had discretion given him not to give the whole costs, but so much of the costs as, under the circumstances, he might think requisite. Was that a fair way to deal with the arrears of rent in Ireland? It might be said that the balance was not confiscated; and certainly the landlord might go into the High Court of Justice, and seek in some of its divisions the balance of the four years' rent, and the costs, if he was fool enough to resort to litigation. Once, in the County Kilkenny, two gentlemen were competing for the suffrages of the tenant farmers, and one of them announced that if returned he would introduce a measure to reduce the rents one-half. He was cheered to the echo, and the friends of the other candidate thought their man was nowhere; but he was equal to the occasion, for, addressing the tenant farmers, he said—"Does the villain expect that you will pay the other half?" The result was that the candidate who moderately proposed only to cut down the rents by half was glad to get out of the place with his life. The way in which the clause about sub-letting and assignment was arranged was very ingenious, for Clause 35 was about as nice and moderate as anyone would well wish for; but it was nibbled away by subsequent clauses until nothing had been left of it. Clause 38 took away a little of it, Clause 39 a great deal of it, and Clause 40 enabled a coach and nine or ten horses to be driven through it. The speeches in support of the measure had been extremely interesting, and some of them had been characterized by a great amount of research, and, as might have been expected for the nation which supplied the bulk of the speakers, by much ability and eloquence. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) made a speech which was of considerable ingenuity and ability; but he could not help thinking it was delivered largely in reference to some elections which were pending. He would not, however, attempt to follow him through the details of his argument; but would confine himself to the subject-matter of the Bill before the consideration of the House. The hon. Member for Cork went on to describe the course he had taken on his own ably-managed property and on the property of others in Ireland. They all knew, taking it on a broad rule, that Irish landlords were very good landlords, and he had no doubt that many in the House who had property in Ireland were good landlords. But the matter became quite different when it was proposed to take the land arrangements out of the scope of the landlords of Ireland. The hon. Member had said that nothing had come of the Land Act. [Mr. SHAW: That it did not carry out all its principles.] That might be so; "all" was a big word; but it had, at any rate, transferred £20,000,000 of the property of the landlords to the tenants. At present, there was really as little of practical hardship or friction in the relations between landlords and tenants in Ireland as was to be found at any time in the history of the country. In former debates there were only three or four specific cases of hardship inflicted by the landlord which used to be alleged. The Bridge evictions were a godsend on two or three occasions. But he had not heard any allegation of that kind in the course of this debate, and not one single case had been quoted which would justify such an extreme measure as the one before the House. It must be borne in mind that no measure—and, even assuming that the present Bill became law to-morrow—could do more than benefit the existing race of tenants. That was a matter which could not be denied by argument. Property would be given without compensation to the existing race of tenants, and they would be enabled to sell to others who had no land that property which they held at as high a price as they pleased. The result would be that future occupiers would stand in the same position as the tenants were at present, and, no doubt, would apply to their Representatives to pass for them a new land law. On the whole, the relations between landlords and tenants in Ireland were satisfactory. As a rule, the tenants in Ireland paid their rents promptly and fairly, and he hoped they would enjoy a very fair measure of prosperity, though they might not have done so of late. He did not think it was the interests of either landlord or tenant that they should be disturbed as they were being disturbed at the present time. The truest and best interests of both would be considered if the Bill were rejected; because, if the second reading were agreed to, it would intimate to the tenant farmers of Ireland and their friends that there was some chance of some clause being passed in their favour, a chance which did not exist.

The Attorney General for Ireland

MR. PATRICK MARTIN remarked, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman in his speech had not entered upon the principle of the Bill. He had not even attempted to show the House any reasons why the substantial benefits which the Ulster custom, really observed, gave to the Northern tenant should not be secured to all Ireland by law. To confer these benefits on the entire tenantry of Ireland was the substance and essence of the present measure. Instead of argument, Her Majesty's Attorney General minutely and unfairly, in many instances, criticized the clauses of the Bill. He condemned the arbitration clauses in the Bill. But those clauses were in substance copied from an Act obtained by Trinity College, which had passed this House. Indeed, if his right hon. and learned Friend had given the matter the benefit of his consideration, even for a short time, he would have seen that these clauses were more clear and distinct than the Trinity College clauses.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. GIBSON) said, that in the case of the Trinity College Act the sales were regulated by an average price of products for years.

MR. PATRICK MARTIN said, that the clauses in the Bill were more simple and clearer than the Trinity College clauses, and enabled a more accurate conclusion to be arrived at between the arbitrator and the Judge. No doubt, it had been said it was a monstrous novelty that the Judge should, by this measure, have the power of obtaining the assistance of a jury in land cases; but in railway arbitrations, in all other cases of dispute, except between landlord and tenant, it had been already decided by this House a jury was the proper ultimate tribunal. In those cases, either party had the absolute right to demand a jury. In the case of landlord and tenant, under the present Bill, a discretion was left to the Judge. The objection made in respect to grazing farms was an example of the unfair way in which the second reading of this Bill was opposed. In 1877, when the Bill was first introduced by the late Mr. Butt, the then Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) said he saw no reason why grazing farms, as well as others, should not be subject to its provisions. Did not the Ulster tenant right apply to grazing as well as to tillage farms? It was then objected that all or none should have the privileges of the extension of the principles and incidents of the custom. The Bill had been met in a way which he trusted would not commend itself to the House. Let him again remind the House the promoters of the Bill sought only to give practical effect to principles recognized and admitted in the Land Act of 1870. He was glad to hear the hon. and gallant Member for New Ross (Colonel Tottenham) give his testimony in regard to the 1st and 2nd clauses of the Bill, and also to hear him express himself in favour of the Ulster tenant right. If the Ulster tenant right had worked so well in Ulster, why, he wished to know, should it not be applied to the whole of Ireland? Upon that point, he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman might have given some more fitting comments on the arguments that had been advanced in favour of the Bill than that of saying there was nothing in them. On the second reading of the Land Act of 1870, the then Chief Secretary for Ireland stated the Government intended to extend the incidents of the Ulster tenant right custom over the entire of Ireland. It was, therefore, rather unreasonable to call this a measure of confiscation, which simply gave effect to the professed intentions of the framers of the Land Act of 1870. If the voice of the hon. and learned Member, so often listened to with pleasure in that House, but now, alas! stilled for ever, could be once more heard, he would have stated—as he had, indeed, left on record—his conviction that the measure involved no interference with any just right of property, that it was justified by the circumstances of Ireland, the general principle of jurisprudence, the purposes for which, of old, Irish estates had been granted, and the conditions under which they were of right held. "But," said the Attorney General, "no instances of hardship have been given." But he forgot in previous debates those cases had been already substantiated. Assuredly, the striking and forcible terms in which Mr. O'Brien, a deputy lieutenant and gentleman of large property in Limerick, showed that the Land Act of 1870 was powerless to prevent rack renting, had not passed from the Attorney General's memory. Many instances, if time permitted, could be quoted to show that the Land Act of 1870 had not removed the grievances it proposed to redress. The Chairman of Queen's County (Mr. Clarke), who was himself opposed to tenant right, pointed out that the Land Act of 1870 had been powerless to prevent the consolidation of farms and the sweeping away of the small tenants, and in strong and emphatic words he pointed out the desirability of further legislation being required. Those evils which previously existed had, unfortunately, to some extent, been aggravated by the Act. He said it was a mistake to say, what might be implied from the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that the Act had had any such operation as to transfer £20,000,000 from the pockets of the landlords to the pockets of the tenants. It would be correct to say the Act professed to give to the Irish tenants the £20,000,000 of improvements made with their money and out of their capital. But though the Act admitted the moral claim of the Irish tenants to their improvements, anyone who understood the practical working of the provisions of the Act knew that this Act took away by one clause what it in a previous one professed to give; and, in the result, even the most willing Judge could only award the most miserable and inadequate compensation for the bona fide expenditure of the tenants. In conclusion, he warned the Government against the danger of their trifling with the Irish people on this most important question. He asked the House not to listen to the arguments so adroitly introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, which really were discussions upon the clauses and not the principle of the Bill, and he asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland to say when the Government intended to give consideration to the demands indicated by the Bill.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I should have thought that after the very able and exhaustive statement of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, it would have been unnecessary for me to say anything; but as the hon. and learned Gentleman has asked me a plain question, I will give him a plain answer. He asked me whether the Government approved of the proposal contained in the Bill, to extend to the whole of Ireland what is known as the Ulster tenant custom? I say at once that the Ulster tenant custom, like any other vested interest, is deserving a protection where it already exists. Those who have obtained vested interests under the Ulster tenant custom would always receive from Her Majesty's Government that protection which every legitimate vested interest obtains. Well, the hon. and learned Gentleman asked me to go further, and to say that this custom should be extended to districts and estates upon which it does not now prevail. To that I reply, unhesitatingly, that if we begin de novo I cannot conceive any worse system upon which land can be held than that which is known as the Ulster custom. What is that custom? Why, as I said the other day, it is simply a device for locking up the capital, which otherwise ought to be spent upon the soil. The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. MacCarthy) spoke upon the question of political economy in connection with the matter. In a former debate, I ventured to tender the advice that the political economist had better hold his peace in a discussion of this question from the point of view of the tenant right advocates; because, from the point of view of political economy, what can be worse than withdrawing capital which ought to be employed in the cultivation of the soil, and not merely locking it up—that would be bad enough—but removing it altogether from the land? A man comes into a farm under the Ulster custom. He pays down all the money he has, all he can collect from his family and friends, and all he can borrow from usurers and others, and what becomes of the money? When he leaves the farm the money is, perhaps, taken to the Colonies, or it is invested in business miles away from the land upon which it ought to be spent; and I cannot conceive anybody arguing, from the politico-economical point of view, in favour of the adoption of this Ulster tenant custom where it does not prevail. So much for the first part of the Bill. And when I am asked why the Government do not address themselves to its principles, I say that the principle of this Bill is pure, undiluted, unmitigated Communism. That is my opinion. It is simply a project for taking the property of one man and giving it to another, without compensating the person from whom it is taken; and I do not hesitate to say that that is a principle which neither Her Majesty's Government nor any principal section of this House is likely to support. Well, an hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. O'Shaughnessy), whose speech I was, unfortunately, prevented from hearing, being momentarily called out to other business, appears to have made a great point of the relative claims of the English political parties upon the popular suffrages of Ireland. Now, I do not wish to be drawn into any statement upon that subject, although it might, perhaps, be of some interest, if not to the usual occupants of the front Opposition Bench, whose absence has been noted to-day, at any rate to the outside public. I do not know if the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir George Balfour), who now occupies a prominent place upon that Bench, is authorized to express the views of those who usually sit there; but I think unless the hon. and gallant Gentleman is so delegated, the appearance of those Benches does not show that any very great amount of sympathy or interest is evinced amongst the Leaders of official Liberalism with regard to the supposed wrongs of Ireland upon this subject. Whatever may be the opinion of those right hon. Gentlemen, and whether they claim to hold aloof from expressing an opinion upon the subject or not, I still entertain a conviction that the vast majority of this House, drawn from all sections of the House, will be found recording an opinion against the principle of this Bill. We have heard a great deal about fixity of tenure. Now, I can perfectly understand that if the condition of the Ulster occupier were absolutely perfect, that state of bliss might be urged upon us an argument for the extension of similar conditions to other parts of Ireland. That would be an argument which would commend itself to those who have the interests of the country at heart. But what do we find is the case? We find that those hon. Gentlemen, who come down to this House and ask us to extend the Ulster system of land tenure in Ireland, speak in the same breath of a down-trodden class of occupiers who are almost destitute of the bare necessities of life. I ask is it reasonable, is it common sense, to put forward as a remedy for the state of affairs the perpetuation of that very system under which the state of affairs has been called into existence? I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman who will reply to me will admit that I am correct in my assumption as to his argument—namely, that he proposes to stereotype for all time a system which he says has hitherto worked so badly. I hope the House will, upon this occasion, express an opinion without any of those drawbacks which, upon some recent occasion, apparently operated against the expression of the real opinion of the House. We have had many Bills introduced, sometimes from this side of the House, and sometimes from the other, and most of them have been surrounded by ambiguous clauses, which have prevented the real principle of the Bill from being discussed in that candid manner which, as the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Patrick Martin) has just said, is desirable. We have been told that some of these Bills are simply plans for giving effect to certain provisions of the Land Act which have hitherto not been allowed fair scope. In other cases, we have been told these are really only a few clauses for maintaining the Land Act. This Bill, however, has no ambiguity about it. It is, as I said just now, pure, undiluted, unmitigated Communism. It proposes to take away property from those to whom it belongs without any compensation to them; and, therefore, I hope the House will reject it.

Mr. Patrick Martin

MR. SHAW, in reply, said, he could not understand why the right hon. Gentleman should have described their proposals as stereotyping present things, where they wished to change those things. He wished to give security of tenure to the tenant, and they had not got that. Now, the right hon. Gentleman stated that the Bill was a piece of pure, undiluted, unmitigated, Communism; but, in his opinion, it was a piece of pure, undiluted common sense, and strictly in accordance with the principles of political economy. If he had a million of money he would invest it in

been given." But he forgot in previous debates those cases had been already substantiated. Assuredly, the striking and forcible terms in which Mr. O'Brien, a deputy lieutenant and gentleman of large property in Limerick, showed that the Land Act of 1870 was powerless to prevent rack renting, had not passed from the Attorney General's memory. Many instances, if time permitted, could be quoted to show that the Land Act of 1870 had not removed the grievances it proposed to redress. The Chairman of Queen's County (Mr. Clarke), who was himself opposed to tenant right, pointed out that the Land Act of 1870 had been powerless to prevent the consolidation of farms and the sweeping away of the small tenants, and in strong and emphatic words he pointed out the desirability of further legislation being required. Those evils which previously existed had, unfortunately, to some extent, been aggravated by the Act. He said it was a mistake to say, what might be implied from the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that the Act had had any such operation as to transfer £20,000,000 from the pockets of the landlords to the pockets of the tenants. It would be correct to say the Act professed to give to the Irish tenants the £20,000,000 of improvements made with their money and out of their capital. But though the Act admitted the moral claim of the Irish tenants to their improvements, anyone who understood the practical working of the provisions of the Act knew that this Act took away by one clause what it in a previous one professed to give; and, in the result, even the most willing Judge could only award the most miserable and inadequate compensation for the bona fide expenditure of the tenants. In conclusion, he warned the Government against the danger of their trifling with the Irish people on this most important question. He asked the House not to listen to the arguments so adroitly introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, which really were discussions upon the clauses and not the principle of the Bill, and he asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland to say when the Government intended to give consideration to the demands indicated by the Bill.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I should have thought that after the very able and exhaustive statement of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, it would have been unnecessary for me to say anything; but as the hon. and learned Gentleman has asked me a plain question, I will give him a plain answer. He asked me whether the Government approved of the proposal contained in the Bill, to extend to the whole of Ireland what is known as the Ulster tenant custom? I say at once that the Ulster tenant custom, like any other vested interest, is deserving a protection where it already exists. Those who have obtained vested interests under the Ulster tenant custom would always receive from Her Majesty's Government that protection which every legitimate vested interest obtains. Well, the hon. and learned Gentleman asked me to go further, and to say that this custom should be extended to districts and estates upon which it does not now prevail. To that I reply, unhesitatingly, that if we begin de novo I cannot conceive any worse system upon which land can be held than that which is known as the Ulster custom. What is that custom? Why, as I said the other day, it is simply a device for locking up the capital, which otherwise ought to be spent upon the soil. The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. MacCarthy) spoke upon the question of political economy in connection with the matter. In a former debate, I ventured to tender the advice that the political economist had better hold his peace in a discussion of this question from the point of view of the tenant right advocates; because, from the point of view of political economy, what can be worse than withdrawing capital which ought to be employed in the cultivation of the soil, and not merely locking it up—that would be bad enough—but removing it altogether from the land? A man comes into a farm under the Ulster custom. He pays down all the money he has, all he can collect from his family and friends, and all he can borrow from usurers and others, and what becomes of the money? When he leaves the farm the money is, perhaps, taken to the Colonies, or it is invested in business miles away from the land upon which it ought to be spent; and I cannot conceive anybody arguing, from the politico-economical point of view, in favour of the adoption of this Ulster tenant custom where it does not prevail. So much for the first part of the Bill. And when I am asked why the Government do not address themselves to its principles, I say that the principle of this Bill is pure, undiluted, unmitigated Communism. That is my opinion. It is simply a project for taking the property of one man and giving it to another, without compensating the person from whom it is taken; and I do not hesitate to say that that is a principle which neither Her Majesty's Government nor any principal section of this House is likely to support. Well, an hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. O'Shaughnessy), whose speech I was, unfortunately, prevented from hearing, being momentarily called out to other business, appears to have made a great point of the relative claims of the English political parties upon the popular suffrages of Ireland. Now, I do not wish to be drawn into any statement upon that subject, although it might, perhaps, be of some interest, if not to the usual occupants of the front Opposition Bench, whose absence has been noted to-day, at any rate to the outside public. I do not know if the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir George Balfour), who now occupies a prominent place upon that Bench, is authorized to express the views of those who usually sit there; but I think unless the hon. and gallant Gentleman is so delegated, the appearance of those Benches does not show that any very great amount of sympathy or interest is evinced amongst the Leaders of official Liberalism with regard to the supposed wrongs of Ireland upon this subject. Whatever may be the opinion of those right hon. Gentlemen, and whether they claim to hold aloof from expressing an opinion upon the subject or not, I still entertain a conviction that the vast majority of this House, drawn from all sections of the House, will be found recording an opinion against the principle of this Bill. We have heard a great deal about fixity of tenure. Now, I can perfectly understand that if the condition of the Ulster occupier were absolutely perfect, that state of bliss might be urged upon us an argument for the extension of similar conditions to other parts of Ireland. That would be an argument which would commend itself to those who have the interests of the country at heart. But what do we find is the case? We find that those hon. Gentlemen, who come down to this House and ask us to extend the Ulster system of land tenure in Ireland, speak in the same breath of a down-trodden class of occupiers who are almost destitute of the bare necessities of life. I ask is it reasonable, is it common sense, to put forward as a remedy for the state of affairs the perpetuation of that very system under which the state of affairs has been called into existence? I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman who will reply to me will admit that I am correct in my assumption as to his argument—namely, that he proposes to stereotype for all time a system which he says has hitherto worked so badly. I hope the House will, upon this occasion, express an opinion without any of those drawbacks which, upon some recent occasion, apparently operated against the expression of the real opinion of the House. We have had many Bills introduced, sometimes from this side of the House, and sometimes from the other, and most of them have been surrounded by ambiguous clauses, which have prevented the real principle of the Bill from being discussed in that candid manner which, as the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Patrick Martin) has just said, is desirable. We have been told that some of these Bills are simply plans for giving effect to certain provisions of the Land Act which have hitherto not been allowed fair scope. In other cases, we have been told these are really only a few clauses for maintaining the Land Act. This Bill, however, has no ambiguity about it. It is, as I said just now, pure, undiluted, unmitigated Communism. It proposes to take away property from those to whom it belongs without any compensation to them; and, therefore, I hope the House will reject it.

Mr. Patrick Martin

Mr. SHAW, in reply, said, he could not understand why the right hon. Gentleman should have described their proposals as stereotyping present things, where they wished to change those things. He wished to give security of tenure to the tenant, and they had not got that. Now, the right hon. Gentleman stated that the Bill was a piece of pure, undiluted, unmitigated, Communism; but, in his opinion, it was a piece of pure, undiluted common sense, and strictly in accordance with the principles of political economy. If he had a million of money he would invest it in land in Ireland, and the tenants should keep their holdings under the principles of this Bill. He complained of the Members who simply came down to vote without hearing the debate. The Leaders of the Liberal Party came down to the House when some twopenny-halfpenny Irish question was before them to pat the Irish Members on the back; but when such a question as this, of interest to the whole people of Ireland, was under discussion, they were conspicuous by their absence. When, in the course of time, these Liberal Leaders occupied the Government Bench, they would not find their seat so comfortable as they supposed. Irish Members had long memories. When a Liberal Government wanted them, they also would know how to remain away.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 91; Noes 263: Majority 172.—(Div. List, No. 93.)

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

SALMON FISHERY LAW AMENDMENT

(NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Colonel KINGSCOTE, Bill to amend the Salmon Fishery Act with relation to fixed engines in tidal waters, ordered to be brought in by Colonel KINGSCOTE, Sir JOSEPH BAILEY, and Mr. STAFFORD HOWARD.

INDIAN MARINE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. EDWARD STANHOPE, Bill to provide for the observance of Discipline in Her Majesty's Indian Marine Service, ordered to be brought in by Mr. EDWARD STANHOPE and Mr. JOHN G. TALBOT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 182.]

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE AND JUDICATURE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WADDY, Bill to amend the Common Law Procedure Acts and the Judicature Act, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WADDY, Mr. WHEELHOUSE, and Mr. RIDLEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 181.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

Mr. Shaw

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 15th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—West India Loans * (86).

Second Reading—Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation * (73).

Committee—Habitual Drunkards (26-86).

Third Reading—Public Health (Scotland) Provisional Order (Castle Douglas) * [68], and passed.

Withdrawn—Cathedral Statutes [4].

FOREIGN POLICY OF HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, I wish to put a Question to the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll) with respect to the inquiry he intends to make to-morrow into the results of the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government in Europe and Asia. I do not know whether the noble Duke contemplates, in the discussion which he proposes raising, to refer to the affairs of Afghanistan; but I must say that, in respect of those affairs, the lips of Her Majesty's Government are now sealed, and, indeed, we should consider any discussion on the matter as one which would be injurious to the public interest. The noble Duke, I am sure, will inform me what his purpose is in regard to that part of the subject of which he has given Notice. With respect to the latter branch of the noble Duke's subject—the result of the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government in Europe and Asia—Her Majesty's Government will be quite prepared to enter fully into any discussion that may be raised.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, we are all aware, through "the ordinary channels of information"—which, I believe, is the Parliamentary expression for the newspapers—that Her Majesty's Government are now in the course of negotiation with the new Sovereign of Afghanistan in regard, I suppose, to the new Frontier, which is to be the scientific Frontier referred to by the noble Earl (the Earl of Beaconsfield) in his celebrated speech at the Guildhall, and also with reference to our future relations with Afghanistan. I at once recognise the fact that to enter into a discussion upon the subject of our future relations with Afghanistan might, probably, be inexpedient as regards the Public Service; and, indeed, it never was my intention to enter at all into the question of our future relations in that part of the East.

PARLIAMENT—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.—QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I think it would be convenient to your Lordships' House if the noble Earl at the head of the Government could state at what time he proposes the House should rise for the Whitsuntide Recess, and how long that vacation is to last?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, we propose that the House should rise on Friday, the 30th of May, and meet again on Friday, the 13th of June.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE ZULU WAR—REINFORCEMENTS.—QUESTION.

LORD TRURO said, that on a former occasion the noble Viscount the Under Secretary of State for War stated that the Government awaited information in despatches before sending reinforcements and stores asked for in a telegram from the Cape. It was rumoured that difficulties were experienced in getting the reinforcements; and, under these circumstances, he wished to know, Whether there was any objection to the telegram being laid on the Table of the House?

VISCOUNT BURY, in reply, said, that no difficulty would be experienced in getting the reinforcements if it were decided to send them. As to the telegram, with the exception of a few words of it which he had read to the House, it related to Departmental matters, and therefore could not be produced.

CATHEDRAL STATUTES BILL.—(No. 4.)

(The Lord Bishop of Carlisle.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the cathedral bodies of this country were divided into two classes—those of the old foundation, which consisted of the cathedrals existing previous to the time of Henry VIII., and those of the new, about 12 in number, which were, in fact, monastic bodies transformed into Deans and Chapters. There were important differences between the old and the new foundations; but, so far as the present Bill was concerned, the principal difference between the two classes was that while the old foundations possessed the power of altering and amending their statutes with the consent of the Visitor, the new foundations had no such power. Henry VIII. did, indeed, give statutes to the new cathedrals; but they were not under the Great Seal and no legal authority. Several attempts were made to put the statutes upon a proper footing; but it was not, from various causes, until the time of Queen Anne that an Act was passed to legalize them, and she died before she had exercised the power of re-modelling the statutes granted to her by that Act. The statutes of the cathedrals had become antiquated; officers were appointed who had no duties to perform; the statutes contemplated a Communion table which did not exist, regulations were made which could not possibly be carried out, and many things had become absurd by simple lapse of time. Again, there was a very strong objection to these antiquated statutes, on the ground that conscientious people did not like to swear to observe statutes which they knew they could not keep; and great difficulty was experienced when disputes arose between Bishops and Deans and Chapters, or in other cases. He himself had plenty of power in his own cathedral; but in some cases the Bishop of the diocese had very little power. The Bishop of Ely, for example, was actually not able to preach on any day in the year in his own cathedral except by permission of the Dean and Chapter. There had grown up in connection with the cathedrals a body of honorary canons, who received no emoluments; of this he did not complain, as there was no funds out of which emoluments could be granted to them; but if these canons could be placed on something like the same footing as the prebendaries of the old foundations it would raise the value and status of the office. Things could not be set right except by an Act of Parliament. His Bill gave the power of revision to the Sovereign, not for the life of Her Majesty, but for the lives of Her Majesty and Her Successors, and it then provided the machinery of revision. The initiation of the matter was given to the Dean and Chapter, if they thought fit to make use of the machinery of the Bill. It was then proposed in the Bill that when the Dean and Chapter had drawn up a draft scheme of revision it should be laid before the Bishop. When the Dean and Chapter and the Bishop had determined how the statutes were to be revised, the scheme upon which they had agreed was to be submitted to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and, if approved by them, laid before the Queen, when it would become law in the manner in which schemes of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in new districts and the like now did. He might be asked why, when he was a Dean himself, he had not tried to do something in this manner? That he had done, for he had procured the introduction of a clause into a Bill of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners when he was himself Dean, with the approval of the then Prime Minister (Earl Russell); but there was a change of Government at the time, and it being thought that the moment was inconvenient for bringing forward the matter, at the request of the late Lord Derby the clause was dropped. Again, it might be said that this matter did not concern him as a Bishop; but, in reply, he said it did, because, by reason of the non-revision of the statutes, difficulties had arisen in connection with his own cathedral, and, as Visitor, he had been called on to deal with them. A Royal Commission ad hoc had been suggested as an alternative plan to the one provided in his Bill. He had no objection to such a Commission, but it would entail a considerable expense, and he did not know how far it would be viewed with favour by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was not wedded to the details of his own plan. On the contrary, he had, from the first, expressed his wish to see the Bill subjected to examination by a Select Committee of their Lordships' House if it were read a second time. It had been said, as an objection to what he proposed, that it would be dangerous to place the duty of revision in the hands of the Dean and Chapter; but he asked their Lordships to bear in mind that he only proposed to give to the Deans and Chapters of the new foundations the same power as was now vested in the Deans and Chapters of the old foundations, and that those bodies had not abused their powers. He accepted the resolutions passed with reference to his plan by the Lower Houses of the Convocations of the Provinces of Canterbury and York as virtually votes in favour of the second reading of the Bill. It was true that at a meeting of Deans of the new foundations, held on April 4, a resolution was adopted declaring that to his Bill there were serious objections, both in principle and detail, and that it was desirable to offer to the measure the unanimous opposition of those assembled. He had, however, received letters from Deans and Canons who were not present at that meeting, stating that they did not sympathize in its views, and even some of those who were present at it had written to him to say that if he submitted to some modifications everybody would be with him. The Dean of Bristol had opposed the Bill in a pamphlet; and asked why, if the Bishop of Carlisle's object was to confer on Her Majesty and Her Successors the powers which the Act passed in the reign of Queen Anne only conferred on that Sovereign for her life, he had not proposed that in a Bill of a few words? His reply was that a power given to the Sovereign would never be acted on unless machinery for carrying it out was provided by the Act. The person who objected to such legislative machinery being provided was like a person who would say, "Let us have steam; but I object to machinery."

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Bishop of Carlisle.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, whilst fully sympathizing with the intentions of his right rev. Brother, was of opinion that the Bill would not effect the object in view. That object, moreover, was too limited in its scope, and was hardly well worthy of being made the subject of legislation. The Bill would apply to only a small number of cathedrals. His right rev. Brother had told the House that the Deans and Chapters of the older cathedrals had already the power of altering their statutes. If they had, they had scarcely ever used it, nor did he see any probability of their doing so. The statutes of the old cathedrals were ancient and very unsuited to the present time, quite as unsuited as were the statutes of the new foundations. Why there should be legislation for the statutes of the new foundations, while those of the old were left untouched, was what he did not exactly see. The fact that the old foundations had not used their power in respect of revision, if such power was possessed by them, showed that there was something in the cathedral bodies which made them very averse from change; and, therefore, the passing of this Bill would be simply leaving matters where they were. They were too conservative in their instincts, and individual influence was too great in so small and select a body to hope for much spontaneous action in the direction of reform. That considerable changes were necessary and desirable he did not deny; but they would not, he thought, be brought about by the cathedral bodies themselves unless a distinct suggestion were made in that direction by the Government. Again, statutes had very little influence in the government of the cathedrals. They were governed, not by statutes, but by customs, which had all the force of law in the minds of those who administered their affairs. He was of opinion that there was a necessity for change in this matter; but that change was not likely to originate in the cathedral bodies—it must be suggested by others. It was a fatal blot in this Bill that it placed the initiative in the hands of the body which required to be reformed. The Act of Anne went on the principle of reformation from without. It must be borne in mind, too, that some of the most marked difficulties that had arisen were in connection, not with new, but with old foundations. A difficulty so important had arisen in connection with the cathedral at York that a noble Lord had given Notice of his intention to bring it under the notice of their Lordship's House. A few years ago, it had been found necessary to introduce a special Act of Parliament to alter the relations between the body corporate of the minor canons and the body corporate of the greater canons in the cathedral of St. Paul's. The difficulties that existed before the passing of the Act had thus been removed; but there were a great many other cathedrals in which similar difficulties were continually cropping up. The Bill before their

The Bishop of Carlisle

Lordships did not notice several most important questions which should be dealt with in any legislation worthy of the name. The questions to which he referred related to the payments of the singing men, the position of the almsmen, the cathedral libraries, and the minor canons. He held that most of the evils dealt with by his right rev. Brother were imaginary. He was strongly in favour of altering the old Roman Catholic statutes; but any new legislation that was introduced should not confine itself to such alteration. A Commission had, some years ago, reported at great length on the subject before their Lordships, and some of their recommendations had been embodied in legislation, but not all. It might be the opinion of Her Majesty's Ministers that the time had not arrived to ask Parliament to appoint a Commission with legislative powers, as had been done in the case of the Universities; but as 25 years had elapsed since the appointment of the last Royal Commission in connection with cathedrals, and as great changes had taken place in that period in public opinion, it might not be undesirable to refer the matter to another Royal Commission, who could take it up where it was left by their predecessors. Some such course he believed ought to be taken, and he had no doubt that it would be, if not now, at some future time. He was, for his part, anxious that no time should be lost, as it was dangerous to put off such changes as he contemplated for an indefinite period. There could be no doubt that the cathedrals were much better understood at the present time than in the year 1841, the last occasion on which there had been legislation on the subjects under the consideration of their Lordships. The cathedrals were now, in most respects, doing their work admirably; but they were hampered by difficulties which had already been pointed out. One of these, to which he had already alluded, was, in his opinion, almost inherent in the present constitution of cathedral bodies. He referred to the power of obstruction which existed in these bodies. He thought it would be unwise to take steps which would produce no real results, and earnestly hoped that the Government might see their way to call attention, through a Royal Commission or otherwise, to all the difficulties which his right rev. Brother had brought before their Lordships, and to endeavour to apply some remedies, not merely in the case of the few cathedrals which he had enumerated, but in that of the whole body of cathedrals. These institutions were engaged in work which was being more and more appreciated, and the cathedrals were frequented by classes of persons who would not have thought of entering them 40 years ago. What was now wanted was that every member of these cathedral bodies, being adequately remunerated for his services, should have facilities given him for the discharge of his duties, and that the cathedrals themselves should be gradually raised in the estimation of the community to that high place which they were entitled to hold.

THE EARL OF POWIS said, the Bill had been objected to on the ground that it dealt only with the cathedrals of the new foundation; but that objection did not appear to him to be a very strong one, as the cathedrals of the new foundation differed as much from those of the old as Ireland did from Scotland. The argument that the Bill was imperfect because it did not deal with the cathedrals of the old foundation, was very similar to that of certain gentlemen who objected to a Bill about tenant right in Ireland because it did not deal with the Law of Hypothec in Scotland. The Bill only sought to give to the new foundations the powers now possessed by the old; powers which the Chapter of Hereford had exercised as regarded their College of Vicars' Choral. He trusted their Lordships would read the Bill of the right rev. Prelate a second time, on the understanding that it should be referred to a Select Committee of their Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: I think, my Lords, we are all agreed that some change is necessary in the capitular bodies of cathedrals. So far as the Bill of the right rev. Prelate is concerned, I think its object is one that ought to be encouraged. But then, my Lords, it does not meet many cases which appear to me to require to be considered and dealt with. So far as my own experience is concerned, I have had, in my official position, much correspondence respecting what I regarded as a great anomaly in one of our principal cathedral bodies.

The Archbishop of Canterbury

But that is a cathedral of the old foundation; and, therefore, the Bill of the right rev. Prelate would not at all offer any remedy in that case, which is, I think, one that requires attention. It is necessary, when we are considering this question, that we should not embark on one of those long investigations which sometimes absorb years, and end in proposing results quite disproportionate to the original necessity which justified any movement in the question. I should be myself favourable to the idea thrown out by the most rev. Prelate that we ought to meet the difficulties which we have to encounter rather by previous inquiry than by immediate legislation. But, in that case, if a Royal Commission were appointed to carry out the investigation, I should be glad that arrangements should be made to procure Reports from time to time from the Royal Commissioners—that they should report with respect to each cathedral, for example, and state what they might recommend should be done in each case. In that way, my Lords, I think we might come to some discreet and judicious limitation of the investigation. As I have said, I am favourable to the suggestion of the most rev. Prelate. I think that something ought to be done. There are anomalies which ought to be removed after due investigation, and I believe that the most prudent course to adopt would be the appointment of a Royal Commission. So far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned, that, my Lords, is their opinion, and they are prepared to act upon it.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE said, that after the favourable statement just made by the noble Earl he was ready to withdraw the Bill.

Motion and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

HABITUAL DRUNKARDS BILL.—(No. 24.)

(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Preliminary.

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Commencement of Act).

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, the Government objected to this clause as it stood, inasmuch as it withdrew retreats conducted by philanthropic or charitable associations from the direct control of Parliament, while in seven years it would put an end to private retreats. Now, no one would go to the expense of establishing a private retreat upon such terms; and he proposed to remove the restriction, and make the Act temporary, so that at the end of a certain time Parliament could re-consider the question, allowing such retreats as it found properly conducted to continue.

Amendment moved—

To leave out after "eighty" to end of clause, and add, at end, "and shall be in force until the expiration of seven years from the passing thereof, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament."—(The Lord Steward.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY objected to the alteration, on the ground that such a provision would defeat the object of the Bill by preventing people from investing capital in private retreats as a speculation.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK observed, that public retreats would suffer equally from the proposed Amendment, inasmuch as the public would be unwilling to subscribe for the erection of an institution which was liable to be abolished in seven years.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Interpretation).

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY pointed out that in the definition of "retreats" he wished to draw as wide a distinction as possible between the institutions for habitual drunkards and lunatic asylums.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK moved an Amendment after ("person,") insert ("of sound mind,")—with the object of preventing these retreats being used as lunatic asylums.

LORD SELBORNE said, that he feared the addition would give rise to fresh difficulties.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR suggested the insertion in the definition of the words ("not being amenable to any jurisdiction in lunacy.")

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY and THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK accepted the suggestion.

Amendment made accordingly.

Further Amendments made.

Then, on the Motion of the Archbishop of York, a further Amendment made by inserting after ("intoxicating liquor,") the words ("at times") dangerous to himself or others.

VISCOUNT GREY DE WILTON moved an Amendment, to include habitual opium eating with habitual excess in partaking of alcoholic liquors.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY suggested that the word "narcotics" should be used instead of opium, as there was great abuse of morphia, chloral, and other narcotics, often through the bad advice of the doctors.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY replied, that the subject was too important to be introduced without Notice, and that to adopt the suggestion might imperil the Bill.

EARL BEAUCHAMP also remarked that if they used the word "narcotics" they might include tobacco.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Incorporation of Schedules, with forms and rules therein); and Clause 5 (Local authority and clerk of local authority) agreed to.

Retreats.

Clause 6 (Establishment of retreats).

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH objected to the clause on the ground that it would be a convenience to have the power of using private lunatic asylums as retreats.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE supported the clause. He thought it most desirable that the widest possible distinction should be kept up between lunatic asylums and retreats.

On Motion of the Archbishop of York, Amendment made at end of clause, add—

"One, at least, of the persons to whom a licence is granted shall reside in the retreat, and be responsible for its management."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK moved to insert, after Clause 6, new clause—

(To whom licence not to be given.)

"No licence shall be given to any person who is licensed to keep a house for the reception of lunatics without the consent of the Commissioners in Lunacy."

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY thought it would wreck the Bill if these retreats were in the slightest degree to be mixed up with any question of the control of the Lunacy Commissioners. He would consent to the insertion of the clause if the reference to the Commissioners in Lunacy were omitted.

Clause amended accordingly, and agreed to; and added to the Bill.

Remaining clauses agreed to, with Amendment.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Friday the 23rd instant; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 86.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 15th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—£6,694,816, Consolidated Fund.
PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—University Education (Ireland) [183]; Metropolitan (Whitechapel and Limehouse) Improvement Scheme Amendment* [184].
Second Reading—Hares (Ireland) [165].
Committee—Army Discipline and Regulation [88]—R.F.

QUESTIONS.

COLLEGE OF SCIENCE, DUBLIN— PROFESSOR GALLOWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is true that Professor Galloway has been dismissed from his Professorship of Chemistry in the College of Science, Dublin, after twenty-three years' service, during which he has carried on efficient laboratory instruction, as evidenced by various Parliamentary Returns (Nos. 67, 1873; 219, 1878; and Report on Scientific Institutions, 1864); and, whether he objects to lay upon the Table any Paper explaining the grounds for dismissal?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: It is quite true that Professor Galloway's services have been dispensed with from the termination of the present session of the College of Science in Dublin. As Professor Galloway had been connected with the College for 23 years, it is, I trust, scarcely necessary to inform the House that the Lord President and I only adopted this course after the most careful and anxious consideration, and when we were convinced that it was absolutely necessary for the welfare of the College of Science, for which we are responsible. There will be no objection to lay upon the Table letters and papers from the Science and Art Department, which will explain our grounds for acting as we have done.

CRIMINAL LAW—MANSLAUGHTER OF A GAME-WATCHER—THE SENTENCE.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of four men sentenced at Stafford, on the 3rd of May, to penal servitude for life, for 20 years, and for 15 years (two) respectively, on account of the death of a game watcher in a poaching affray; and, whether he will cause inquiry to be made with a view to the mitigation of the sentence?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: The learned Judge who tried this case informs me that he is quite sure, if the hon. Member had known the circumstances, he would never have thought of putting the Question. These four men were out, armed, at night, and they were tried for wilful murder; and, in the opinion of the Judge, it was a very merciful jury that let them off on that charge, and found them guilty of manslaughter. The offence, as the hon. Member knows, does not consist in poaching; but in going out by night, armed, and in gangs. The poor man who was murdered was simply a farm labourer. Two farm labourers were called out to watch, and four men came up to one of them—they were not keepers, but watchers—who ran away, and was pursued by the four men.

They made a most violent attack upon the poor fellow, and injured him in such a horrible manner that I will not describe it to the House. I am bound to say that, in my opinion, the sentence is not at all too severe.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—THE RE-ORGANIZATION SCHEME.

QUESTIONS.

MR. RITCHIE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to his statement that no further delay need occur in the issue of the re-organization scheme for the Customs Department after the reports that had been called for from that Department had been received, Whether such reports have now been received by the Treasury; and, if so, when the scheme will be issued?

MR. PEASE asked, When the decision on the scheme for the improvement of the position of the Customs Establishment, mentioned at page 32 of Parliamentary Paper No. 106 (ordered to be printed on 19th March 1879), is to be produced for the information of the officers in the Customs Establishment?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that different branches of the Customs Department had been dealt with separately in Reports from the Customs to the Treasury. These separate Reports required, each of them, very careful consideration, and the last of them was only received on the 7th of April. Three of the most important of the schemes proposed had been considered and approved generally, and no delay would take place in the consideration of the others. The moment all were considered no time would be lost in bringing the re-organization scheme into operation.

ADMIRALTY AND WAR OFFICE REGULATION ACT—THE SECRETARIAT OF THE ADMIRALTY.—QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, with reference to the Admiralty and War Office Regulation Act of last Session, Whether any steps have been taken to deal with the Secretariat of the Admiralty?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, some six weeks ago application was made to the Treasury for a Committee to inquire into the Secretariat of the Admiralty, and he was daily in expectation of receiving communications.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT—SUPERVISION OF SLAUGHTER-HOUSES.

QUESTION.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, if public slaughter-houses for killing butchers' meat cannot be established throughout the country, after the manner of many Continental States, Her Majesty's Government will not consider the propriety of bringing private slaughterhouses and other places used for killing animals for human food more directly under Government supervision, as well for economic and sanitary purposes as to prevent the cruelty to animals often practised under the present system?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: In reply to my hon. and learned Friend's Question, I may be permitted, perhaps, to state what the law is on this subject. My hon. and learned Friend is aware that the whole of the Kingdom is under the jurisdiction of urban or rural sanitary authorities. With regard to the former, the Public Health Act enables all urban sanitary authorities to provide slaughter-houses and to make by-laws for their management; and, as regards private slaughter-houses, urban sanitary authorities are empowered by the same Act to make regulations for the licensing, registering, and inspection of such slaughter-houses, for preventing cruelty therein, and for keeping the same in a proper sanitary condition. Moreover, the Local Government Board may, on the application of any rural sanitary authority, confer upon them all the above-mentioned powers regarding slaughter-houses. The Local Government Board have issued a series of model by-laws for the regulation of slaughter-houses, which have been adopted in numerous instances. Such being the existing provisions of the law, I am asked whether I will consider the propriety of bringing slaughter-houses under Government supervision? But I must say that, having regard to the duties and responsibilities thus vested in the local authorities, I cannot think it would be expedient to adopt the course proposed.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (IRELAND)
BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the honourable and learned Member for Louth, Whether, having regard to the advanced stage of the Session, the desirability of pushing on many Irish measures of importance now pending, and the virtual impossibility of continuing the discussion of the Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill, he will move that the Order for its Second Reading be discharged?

MR. SULLIVAN: I quite agree with my hon. and learned Friend that it is desirable to push on Irish measures as much as possible, and I should, therefore, be glad to push on this particular one. I feel, however, that while, on the one hand, it would be exceedingly undesirable to leave it on the Paper from week to week without its being possible to discuss it, it is due to hon. Members who are opposed to it to endeavour to give them an opportunity of arriving at its discussion; and, therefore, if I cannot bring on the discussion in a week or so, I shall move that the Order be discharged.

IRISH CHURCH TEMPORALITIES COM-MISSIONERS—MR. BALL.

QUESTIONS.

MR. SULLIVAN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been called to the proceedings in the Court of Appeal, Dublin, on Tuesday last, in reference to the claims of Mr. Ball, late Solicitor to the Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners, opposed by the Treasury; more especially to the language of the Master of the Rolls, who, in delivering judgment, is reported to have said—

"A more discreditable or more disgraceful course was never pursued than that adopted by the Treasury before Judge Flanagan;"

and the language of Mr. Justice Deasy, who said—

"It was one of the most unjust attempts ever made in a court of justice to defraud a man of money due to him for plain services under a contract sanctioned by the very people who now come forward to oppose him;"

and, if he can inform the House what Government Department or what Government official directed and is responsible for the proceedings thus characterised by the Irish Judges?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman is—what Department of the Government is responsible for the proceedings to which he has called attention? I have to say that it is the Department of the Lords of the Treasury. With respect to the circumstances to which his Question refers, I can only say it is a long story, and I could not possibly trouble the House by going fully into it; but I will endeavour, in an observation or two, to make the matter plain. The remarks referred to as having been made by the learned Judge were delivered under a misunderstanding as to the course which the Treasury had pursued. The state of the matter appeared to be this—By the Irish Church Act, the Church Temporalities Commissioners were authorized to pay various officers such salaries as might be recommended and sanctioned by the Lord Lieutenant and approved of by the Treasury. In regard to Mr. Ball there were two alternatives—that he should be paid by fixed salary, or that he should be paid by fees. The Treasury were asked to choose which alternative they preferred, and they preferred the former. They understood certain letters as meaning that the fixed salary was to cover all the services that would otherwise have been paid by fees. A question arose, however, as to whether it did cover certain classes of fees. In the litigation that followed Justice Flanagan upheld the view taken by the Treasury, and the case was so decided; but, subsequently, it was taken before the Court of Appeal, when the former decision was reversed, and the other view taken. I do not express any opinion as to which view was right; but I think the view expressed by the learned Judge was stated under a misunderstanding that could be easily explained.

MR. SULLIVAN: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman was the Treasury represented by no one before the Court of Appeal that could explain the matter; and if not, why not?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Treasury was not represented directly at the suit. The suit was one between the Church Temporalities Commission and Mr. Ball, and the Treasury was not represented by anyone. I regret it was not, and I am unable to account for it.

Mr. MELDON: Sir, I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Treasury intends to appeal to the House of Lords?

POST OFFICE—AUSTRALIAN COLONIES —CONVEYANCE OF MAILS.

QUESTION.

Mr. BAXTER asked the Postmaster General, If the Post Office has employed any line, other than that of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, of full powered steamships, for the conveyance of the Mails to and from Australia; and, if so, whether he can state the average time occupied by such steamers, as compared with those of the Peninsular and Oriental Company; why tenders were not invited for the conveyance of the Mails direct between this Country and Australia; if there will be any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence which has taken place with the Australian Colonies on this subject; and, if he can state to the House, in the event of the Contract of the 7th of February being ratified, what sums are to be received from the Australian Colonies for the conveyance of their Mails between this Country and Point de Galle?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Since the beginning of 1874, the Imperial Post Office has not employed any line of steam vessels for the conveyance of mails to and from Australia, the conveyance of all such mails from Point de Galle, Singapore, and San Francisco having been provided for by the Governments of the several Australian Colonies. Bags of ship letters have, at intervals during the last two years, been despatched from the United Kingdom by steam vessels other than those of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company; but the Post Office has no record of the average time occupied on each voyage by such steam vessels. Tenders were not invited by the Home Government, because, as already stated, the arrangements have been left in the hands of the Australian Colonies. There has been no Correspondence between the Post Office and the Australian Colonies on the subject. The arrangements under which the Australian Mails will be conveyed between this country and Point de Galle, in the event of the contract of the 7th of February being approved by the House of Commons, are being considered at the Treasury. But there is no reason to suppose that any sums will be received on that account from the Australian Colonies.

ARMY MILITARY PENSIONS—ROYAL
WARRANTS, 1877, 1878.—QUESTION.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he is aware that certain officers who retired from the Army on pensions under the provisions of the Royal Warrants of 1877 and 1878, and who now hold appointments in the Prison Department, are precluded from drawing any portion of their pensions; that one of these officers is actually drawing less income by £55 10s. per annum than he would be in receipt of if he drew his pension and were not serving the State; if he would state under what Clause of what Act the withholding of these Military pensions is justifiable; and, whether it is intended to place all retired Military and Naval officers who may be holding Civil appointments on the same footing as other Civil servants, viz. that they shall be permitted to draw their pensions until their Civil salaries amount to three times their pensions on half-pay?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: I am aware of the cases referred to by my hon. and gallant Friend. The withholding of the military pensions is in accordance with Clause 1,174 of the Royal Warrant of May 1, 1878; but, inasmuch as considerable dissatisfaction has been caused in several cases by the operation of that clause, it has been arranged by the Secretary of State for War that representatives of the War Office and Treasury should meet and discuss the conditions under which the clause shall be applied in future.

TREATY OF BERLIN—ARTICLE 23.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, since it has been officially stated that all the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin have been or are being duly carried out, except that portion of the twenty-third Clause which provides that institutions analogous to those of Crete shall be granted to those parts of European Turkey not specially provided for, he can say whether Her Majesty's Government are determined to insist on the fulfilment by the Turks of the stipulations in consideration of which they were saved from extinction, as firmly as they have insisted on the stipulations by which the advance of Russia was restrained?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Her Majesty's Government have more than once pressed upon the Porte the importance of taking speedy action under the 23rd clause of the Treaty of Berlin; and representations to that effect have recently been repeated.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—ORDINANCES OF THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Sir Garnet Wolseley has sent home Copies of all Ordinances enacted by the Council in the Island of Cyprus; and, whether in any case the Cyprus Ordinances will be laid before Parliament, or placed from time to time in the Library of the House?

MR. BOURKE: Many of the Ordinances passed by the Legislative Council in Cyprus have been received; but I am not quite sure that we have as yet received all. I said some little time ago that I should place these Ordinances in the Library, and that I purpose to do before very long.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE EXPENSE.—QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the Estimates of the Expenditure of the War in South Africa during the present financial year may be expected to be laid upon the Table?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am anxious to lay the Estimate upon the Table as soon as I am in a position to submit an Estimate that would give information to the House. The same reason that prevented me laying one before the House at the time of the Budget still prevents me doing so, until we get some further information. I hope that before long we may be in a position to propose a Vote of Credit. Of course, before the close of the Session it will be necessary for us to do so, and I hope it will be at an early date. As soon as I am in a position to place a Supplementary Estimate before the House on which any reliance can be placed, I shall be happy to do so.

Sir George Campbell

THE MEDICAL BILLS—THE SELECT COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the Select Committee to which he proposes to refer the Medical Bills before the House is to have powers to summon witnesses and hear evidence from Universities and Corporations affected by the Bills?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, it is proposed to give power to summon witnesses. What witnesses may be summoned depends on the decision of the Committee.

THE SAMOAN ISLANDS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL MURE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give the House any information as to a Treaty lately concluded between Germany and the Government of the Samoan Islands, by which certain rights of property have been guaranteed to German subjects in those islands; and, whether British subjects in those islands have complained that under Article 6 of the said Treaty their proprietary rights are endangered?

MR. BOURKE: I think my hon. and gallant Friend is correct in supposing a Treaty has been lately made between the Governments referred to. Last January the German Consul in Samoa communicated to Her Majesty's Consul a Treaty which had been made between the German Government and the Government of the Samoan Islands about that time. It was at once ratified by the Samoan Government; but we have not heard whether it has been ratified by the German Government. We have received a copy of the Treaty; but have had no complaints from British subjects or others affected by it.

THE LAW OF DISTRESS—LEGISLATION. QUESTION.

COLONEL BARNE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government intend to introduce a Bill to amend the Law of Distress; and, if so, whether they will be able to lay it before Parliament this Session?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, it would not be possible for the Government to introduce a Bill this Session to amend the Law of Distress.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—
TEACHERS' SALARIES.—QUESTION.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, in the Return, No. 3, in Parliamentary Paper, No. 71, of Session 1879 (which gives the average salaries of teachers in various schools), the principal teacher only of each school is reckoned in computing such average, or whether all the teachers of every grade are so reckoned?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, the Return included all the teachers who held certificates.

POST OFFICE, EDINBURGH.
QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN asked the Postmaster General, Whether, referring to applications which have been made at various times on the part of the Telegraph Clerks in the City of Edinburgh Post Office, it is intended to raise their pay to an equality with that given to the Clerks in the principal towns in England performing similar duties; and, if so, when the advance will take place.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The telegraph establishment of the Edinburgh Post Office has been recently revised, and there is no intention of making any alteration in the existing scales of pay.

SOUTH AFRICA—ESTIMATE OF MILITARY EXPENDITURE.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If the Government will lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence which has passed between the Home Government and the authorities of the Colonial dependencies in South Africa as to the expenditure incurred by the Home Government for Military Expenditure and Military Stores up to the close of the year ending on March 31st last on behalf of any or all of the above Colonial dependencies?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that Papers were now being prepared.

ARMY—THE 60TH RIFLES—COURT MARTIAL.—QUESTION.

MR. FRENCH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will be able to lay upon the Table of the House Copies of the Evidence produced at the trial by Court Martial in South Africa of a sergeant of the 60th Rifles for retiring a picket on an alarm of the enemy without the order of his officer, at which he was sentenced to five years' penal servitude and reduction to the ranks?

COLONEL STANLEY: I have not yet received the Papers to which the Question refers, and I am bound to modify the answer I made the other day, in which I stated that the Papers were privileged. In the strict sense of the word they are not; but it is only when special causes have been assigned that it has been considered convenient that such Papers should be produced. Until I have seen the Papers I am not able to say whether there is anything special in their character or not. I expect them by the next mail.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS COMMISSIONERS—THE REPORT.—QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he can arrange to furnish the House, before the debate on the Public Works Loans Bill comes on, with an Account of the Public Works Loans Commissioners for the year ending 31st March 1879, with an explanatory note of the errors to the Account of those Commissioners for the year ending 31st March 1878?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, he hoped to be able to present in the course of next week the annual Report and Accounts of the Public Works Loans Commissioners, in which explanatory notes of the errors referred to would appear; but he could not promise to wait until it was in the hands of hon. Members before proceeding with the Public Works Loans Bill.

BLIND AND DEAF-MUTE CHILDREN (EDUCATION) BILL.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MONK, who had the following Notice on the Paper:—

"To ask the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he has come to a decision as to the desirability of placing Amendments on the Paper showing the conditions and qualifications upon which the Government had assented to the Second Reading of the Blind and Deaf-Mute Children (Education) Bill," said, the Question bore a very faint resemblance to the Question he had placed in the hands of the junior Clerk at the Table. Indeed, two Questions had been jumbled into one, so as to make them meaningless and absurd. He, therefore, declined to put the Question; and would simply ask, what steps it was intended to take with respect to the Blind and Deaf-Mute Children (Education) Bill? He would remind the Government that on the 26th March they consented to the second reading of the Bill with certain qualifications.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the Bill now contained Amendments he had suggested with the view of making its provisions permissive; and he did not, therefore, think it his duty, on the part of the Government, to offer any further opposition to it.

M O T I O N.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in moving—

"That the Orders of the Day subsequent to the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill be postponed until after the Notice of Motion for leave to bring in a Bill for promoting University Education in Ireland;"

said, he made the Motion in accordance with a promise which he had given the other evening to the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), which was partly dictated by the consideration that the Government, by fixing a Bill of their own for a Morning Sitting, had prevented him from bringing forward his Bill on the occasion on which he would otherwise have done so. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) wished to take that opportunity of saying that the business-like spirit in which the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill had been discussed encouraged the Government to hope that they would be able to make further progress with that measure that night; and he trusted that the House might be disposed to allow them to take a Morning Sitting to-morrow, in order to go on with it, so that they might, if possible, get it through Committee before the House rose for the Whitsuntide Holidays.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intended to take the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill? The House was aware that he had a Notice of some importance to be considered before the second reading of that Bill. He would also like to know when it was proposed to take the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill? At present it stood for Tuesday next; but it appeared to him impossible that the Government should propose to go on with it before the Whitsuntide Recess.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that having balloted with praiseworthy perseverance during the Session, he had obtained first place to-morrow for his Motion on the subject of Brewers' Licences, and he thought it rather hard that at the very last moment Notice of a Morning Sitting should be given, which placed him at a disadvantage. He hoped the Government would take steps to make and keep a House at the Evening Sitting.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID called attention to the fact that it was only at the last moment the Government informed the House that they proposed to hold a Morning Sitting; and he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in future, it would not be possible for him to give some longer and more formal Notice with reference to the intention of the Government to hold Morning Sittings?

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON hoped the Government would not put down the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill for the Morning Sitting. This was a Bill in which he had several important Amendments to propose; and as he was also a Member of the Parliamentary Reporting Committee which would meet at 12 o'clock to draw up their Report, and this was also a subject in which he took a great interest, he trusted the Government would not then take the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill.

MR. E. JENKINS seconded the appeal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and pointed out the inconsistency of the reasons advanced by the Government for these Morning Sittings. Last year the Government excused themselves for taking early Morning Sittings because of the opposition offered to the Mutiny

Mr. Monk

Bill. This year they appeared to ask for it because of the business-like way in which the House had carried through the Business. Therefore, whether they opposed or facilitated Business, the Government seemed equally determined to have Morning Sittings.

MR. A. MILLS considered the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill of much more importance than the question of Parliamentary Reporting, and he trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would proceed with it. He had himself a Notice on the Paper for to-morrow evening, but would willingly sacrifice it in order to promote Public Business.

MR. J. HOLMS intimated that immediately the House got into Committee on the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill he should move that the Chairman do report Progress, in order that he might, in his humble judgment, save the time of the House by drawing the attention of the Committee to the real state in which they were in relation to that Bill. He thought it only fair and courteous to the House and the Government to state his intentions, and if the House wished, he would at once give his reasons for taking the step he proposed. [Cries of "No," and "Go on."] He would state his reasons when the House was in Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated, in reply to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), that the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill would be moved on Monday after Supply, and that it was proposed to close Supply in good time, so that the Bill might be conveniently taken and discussed afterwards. With regard to the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill, he was not at that moment in a position to answer all the Questions that had been asked, and he would be obliged to hon. Members if they would put them down on the Paper, so that he might consult the Attorney General. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), he must demur to the idea that Morning Sittings were merely to be regarded as punishments; and in proposing them the sole object of the Government was to promote, in the best way they could, the Business of the House. He quite agreed that it was inconvenient that sudden Notice should be given of them; and it was only in consequence of what had occurred in regard to the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill that he proposed to take the course which he had stated. He hoped that the House would consider the precedents, and would consent to a Morning Sitting on each of the two following Tuesdays, in order that they might make a real and important effort to get through the Bill before Whitsuntide. The Bill was one which ought to become law, certainly not without due consideration, but within a limited period. He would assure the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) that the Government would do the best they could to secure a House for the discussion of his Notice, the importance of which he frankly admitted.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman could name a convenient day for the Dogs Regulation (Ireland) Act (1865) Amendment Bill, and whether it could be placed as the first Order on the Paper?

MR. DILLWYN protested against the commencement of Morning Sittings a month before the usual time, and gave Notice that on the Motion to adjourn until 2 o'clock to-morrow he would oppose it.

SIR ANDREW LUSK supported the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman had been very liberal and kind to hon. Members with regard to the Holidays of the House, and his liberality ought to be met in a similar spirit.

MR. MELDON complained that all Government Orders were placed upon the list nearly every evening, thus causing considerable inconvenience to Members interested in any particular measure, and to the public. There was one Bill down on the Paper before them relating to Ireland, but which he did not wish to mention, and a deputation had come expressly from Ireland to watch its progress, and he did not believe the Government had the slightest intention of going on with it for the next two months. The Bill referred to by the hon. and gallant Member (Major Nolan) excited much feeling throughout Ireland, and Irish Members would find it very convenient if they knew when Irish Bills were coming on. In his opinion, the object of the Government in putting down all their Bills night after night was the hope of their obtaining a "catch" vote.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was absolutely necessary that the Bills should be set down, inasmuch as it was impossible to say when a convenient time might arise for their discussion. He would endeavour to arrange with the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the Dogs Regulation (Ireland) Act (1865) Amendment Bill should be brought forward with all due regard to the convenience of hon. Members. He was anxious to give a general Notice as to the time when regular Morning Sitings were to begin, and with regard to others as full a Notice as he could.

In reply to Mr. HIBBERT,

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that after the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill had passed through Committee, it would be proposed to take a Morning Sitting in order to proceed with the Valuation of Property Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day subsequent to the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill be postponed until after the Notice of Motion for leave to bring in a Bill for promoting University Education in Ireland.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL.—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 8th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 30 (Offences in relation to billeting).

COLONEL MURE moved, in page 12, line 27, sub-section 4, after "non-commissioned officer," to insert "or soldier."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. J. HOLMS moved that the Chairman do report Progress. He did so in order to make a few observations which he thought might, perhaps, save the time of the Committee. It appeared to him that if the Committee were to consider the precise position in which they were in relation to this Bill, they might come to the conclusion that at the point at which he had arrived they ought to delay going on with the Bill at the present time. They had already had two nights' discussion in Committee upon the Bill; and he thought that discussion, to anyone who had observed it with any care, must have shown very clearly that the Bill was not exactly that which the House was entitled to believe it would receive from the Committee which investigated the question upstairs. He should have been particularly glad to have addressed his observations to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who, he thought, would have taken a very judicial view of the position in which they were placed; but he wished particularly to draw the attention of the Government and of the Committee generally to the subject, because he would at once disclaim any Party feeling in the matter. The question was far too important for that. The subject was of such a nature that both sides of the House were equally interested in seeing a sound measure carried; and if the Committee were at all fully acquainted with the history of the Bill, he did not believe that even the Government would be inclined to venture any further in discussing the matter. It must be in the recollection of many hon. Members that last year the Mutiny Bill was very thoroughly discussed, and in that discussion it was made perfectly clear that the penalties in the Bill, and the very severe punishments it imposed, needed to be dealt with with very great care. Moreover, it was made clear that the crimes which arose out of desertion were very numerous, and that the number of prisoners who were imprisoned for crimes which were of no great importance was very excessive. Now, all these crimes were referred to by the Secretary of State for War, who used precisely the language which was used in the House just now—namely, that this was a Mutiny Bill, and that, therefore, it was a question of time, and must be pressed on at all hazards. In that discussion, many promises were made by the Secretary of State for War, with the clear understanding that if the Committee then would allow the Bill to pass quietly, he would take care that all the questions which had been raised should be investigated with great care by the Committee. In order to make perfectly clear what those promises of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman were, he must ask the attention of the Committee, and especially of the present Secretary of State for War, to those promises which were made by his Predecessor. In relation, first, to the number of desertions, and the excessive number of men in prison, the right hon. Gentleman used these words last year—

Mr. Meldon

"With regard to the question of deserters, that was one which must be carefully considered, and the Committee would be able to investigate the different forms which desertion took. He thought that the number of men who were at present imprisoned for offences which were not of a disgraceful character was excessive." — [3 Hansard, ccxxxviii. 1978.]

Nothing could be clearer than that. In relation to punishments, he would not now trouble the Committee with quotations, because he wished to put his case as simply and shortly as possible. The question of flogging was met by several Amendments. There was one by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), and another by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), and the hon. Member for Mayo wished to resist the principle that corporal punishment should be inflicted under any circumstances whatever. Well, the Secretary of State for War then promised that if the hon. Member would not press his Amendment, the subject should be investigated with great care. One hon. Member after another rose and begged the hon. Gentleman not to press the Amendment, but to trust to this investigation by the Committee; and upon that assurance the hon. Member for Mayo withdrew his Amendment. Now, he would proceed a little further. On the question of the 22nd clause—the flogging clause—when the hon. Member for Mayo had given up his Amendment, the Secretary of State for War stated to the Committee that if they would pass the Bill in its present shape it would be with a view that there might be a thorough investigation thereafter upon the whole subject. Further on in the discussion in Committee, the right hon. and gallant Gentlemen said he would make another appeal to the Committee to get through the Bill as quickly as possible, and he would promise there should be a complete inquiry into its operation, and upon that assurance his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh

(Mr. M'Laren) appealed to the Mover of the Amendment not to press it. For his own part, he joined very heartily in seeking that the Amendment should not be pressed, and that they should proceed to go on with the Bill. He heartily rejoiced that the Secretary of State for War had gone so far as to make that concession, and that they had, upon the word of a Secretary of State, the certainty of investigation into all these questions. That was the clear understanding; and it was because that had not been carried out that he felt it his duty to rise now and protest, and he should continue to protest against the passing of this Bill. Now, either it was necessary, or it was not necessary, for a Committee to investigate these various subjects. If it was necessary, then the Secretary of State for War was justified in saying he would take care that the investigation should take place. If it was not necessary, upon what ground did the Secretary of State for War, on a measure of such importance, lead the House and the country to believe that he was going to have a thorough and complete investigation? Now, he had to recount what the Select Committee did. He was a Member of that Committee, and they proceeded to work. The Committee was very ably presided over by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt); but he thought the Committee was not in the least acquainted with what that Select Committee did. What did it do? They met on the 17th of May. On the 23rd of May they had the first witness; and after they had had a sitting or two, he deemed it to be his duty to enter a protest against their not taking evidence upon those questions which they were sent up to consider. He was so full of the subject—as he was now—that he was anxious that they should have competent witnesses—not official witnesses—who would give them sound information on points referred to. It appeared to him that it was not a question of re-arranging a whole lot of clauses as to punishment that was wanted. They wanted something to precede that—namely, that they should do the best they could to examine into the great sources of crime in the Army—what were the causes of crime, and how it was possible to get rid of them. He visited a military prison, and conversed with the chaplain; and he came to the conclusion that if the Committee had wished, plenty of evidence could have been obtained. It would have been shown that many who were still in gaol might be free men, and it would be all the better if they were. But the Committee took no such evidence; they made no attempt to get evidence. What did they do? They had handed to them a draft Bill of 117 clauses, which the Chairman took, but very wisely did not acknowledge any responsibility; he ignored any responsibility in relation to that Bill. The Committee accepted it, and proceeded to work. To do what? To see how far, in effect, that Bill of 117 clauses, which was handed to them, was a boiling-down, so to speak, of about 190 Articles of War, and some 110 clauses of the Mutiny Bill; and so they proceeded to work. But they had not proceeded very far before they came to the flogging clause in that particular Bill, and he deemed it his duty to enter his protest. He entered his protest in this manner. He moved on the 21st of June—

“That, having regard to the discussion which took place in the House in the month of March last on the corporal punishment inflicted under the authority of the Mutiny Act, it is expedient that this Committee should take evidence in respect of punishments for crimes committed while on active service in the field.”

Although that was a very reasonable proposition, it received no support, except from the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O’Beirne). Well, they proceeded with the Bill, and the Bill came down to the House. It did not come down, however, with 180 clauses, but with only 117. It had, of course, been altered, and no one could complain of that; but he ventured to say that a more imperfect Bill it would be difficult to draw. Why, even the hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General got up to enlighten the House upon it the other night, and could not. He dealt with the 10th clause and the 4th section; but even he could not make it clear, although he belonged to the Department in whose care the Bill was placed. Why, they had a clause—the 173rd—contradicted by another clause—the 180th; but he (Mr. J. Holms) cared very little about that part of the question. He cared little whether the Bill was good, bad, or indifferent, in those respects. What he did care about, and what he protested against, was this—that they should go up to a Committee Room, appointed by the House, to undertake one of the most important questions of the day, and to take evidence in relation to subjects which had been discussed fully, freely, and decidedly in the House, and that they should come downstairs without having made one single step in regard to taking that evidence. This Bill was to be—what? Was it to be a temporary Bill? It was a Bill that was to be for the permanent government of the Army; and he, therefore, protested against their proceeding further with the measure. In his opinion, it was essentially necessary that the Committee, at this particular juncture, should consider what they were to do with the Bill. As he had said, the Committee upstairs took no evidence in relation to those matters to which he had referred. It was well that this Committee and the country should know that; because there were many outside this House who were waiting for the Bill to become law, and to whom it was a serious matter. What was the evidence which the Committee took? A greater sham never existed in the world than that most strange Committee. He did not speak disrespectfully of the Committee itself. He spoke of the work they did, and of the work which was given them to do. They had six witnesses in the main; one witness, and that was Sir Henry Thring, who drafted the Bill. They had His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief; they had Mr. Clode, from the War Office; and they had Major-General Carey, Colonel Roche, and Mr. O’Dowd. Well, of course, they were very good witnesses for the purposes of codifying and simplifying the Bill, and they gave very good evidence; but that was not in the least the question which the Committee were sent to investigate. In comparison, it was a very small and trumpery matter. In fact, if the Committee had gone into their room without any Bill, it would have been very much better. They should have gone up there as business men, thoroughly determined that that 200-year-old Bill was hardly worth looking at, and that it was their business to deal with 1878, and not 1678. But, in place of that, they took to boiling down the old Bill, and here they were to-night in a state which was not creditable to the House. It was not creditable to them to pursue a course of this kind, seeing that they had had promises that evidence should be taken in relation to the points to which he had referred, in order that they might legislate in the spirit of their own day. He wished the Committee now to consider what effect this Bill would have upon the Army. It would, he thought, deal a very serious blow to recruiting, because soldiers and the class from which they were drawn knew perfectly well what was being done. He had letters on the subject, and was disposed to read some extracts from them, because it was well that the Committee should know what was the opinion outside upon the subject. In civil life in this country, happily, there was even-handed justice for all classes; but in the Army they knew that was not so. [Colonel STANLEY dissented.] He saw the Secretary of State for War shake his head at that observation; but he wished, with all due respect, to press the point, because he was anxious the right hon. and gallant Gentleman and the Committee should know what was thought of the Bill. It was well for the lawgivers to know what those outside considered in relation to questions of this kind. Now, one soldier wrote to him as follows:—

Mr. J. Holms

"In civil life, if an employer or overseer strikes, cheats, or oppresses a labourer under his charge, and if a labourer strikes, cheats, or annoys his employer or overseer, they are liable to exactly the same punishment, and those penalties act, however noble the employer or overseer may be, and however mean the labourer. But in the Army, if a private strikes, robs, or annoys his officer, his punishment would be immeasurably greater than would be awarded to any officer who struck, cheated, or annoyed a private. In the one case, death would be the punishment possibly; a simple reprimand possibly in the other. If an officer commits any crime he is tried by his peers; if a soldier, he is tried also by officers, and they are the judge and jury."

In reading this to the Committee, he only wished to show what was the feeling of those who had to submit to this law. He did not blame the officers, far otherwise. They had only to carry out that which was put into their hands; but he wished that the Committee would take care to put into their hands something of a wiser character, and better than had yet been the case. He wished now to say a word on a point of great importance which had not been introduced—namely, as to the relative position of a soldier and a non-commissioned officer, for throughout this Bill they were treated alike. That he regarded as being one of the great defects of our military system. It was high time that they should raise the status, especially of the higher class of non-commissioned officers. They should lift them from their present position, and not leave them the risk of being reduced to the ranks at the mere whim, or desire, or private sentiment, of their commanding officers. He had received a letter on that subject which seemed so wise and reasonable that he would trouble the Committee with an extract. It was in relation to the reduction of non-commissioned officers to the ranks. The man said—

"This saps the foundation of the non-commissioned officer, for no matter however well paid and clothed and lodged he may be, whilst his position depends on the breath and mere will of his commanding officer, his position is so unstable as to be worth very little, and causes him to carry with him a constant uncertainty. There is no misfortune more deeply felt than that of a sergeant who has been reduced to the ranks. After years of toil, he loses the result of all his labours; his wife and children are put out of quarters, and into inferior positions; his small world is as much changed as is that of a prosperous tradesman when he becomes a bankrupt."

Now, that seemed to him to convey a great deal of sound common sense; and he believed that if they were to get good non-commissioned officers in the Army—and the short-service system demanded that they should get first-rate non-commissioned officers—they must consider that question. Then, if that were so, would it not be better that they should come to the conclusion that the investigation should still be proceeded with, as promised and intended last year. It would be better that they should now have such a Committee appointed. They were now just at the same period of the year as that in which the Committee of last year began its operations. Why should they not have a Committee appointed now, and begin, in real earnest, to take evidence in relation to these most serious questions, which had raised so much discussion? And when they had investigated the subject—he did not think it could be done this year, and even part of it would probably take this year and next; but he thought they should devote their time to advance the progress of a careful and thorough investigation of the whole question, and then proceed afterwards to have a new Bill. That was perfectly possible; and he believed the House would willingly grant to the Government a continuance of the old Mutiny Bill for a sufficient period. He suggested that the Temporary Continuance Bill should be allowed to go on for this year, and then let them proceed with the investigation indicated. He had ventured to offer these remarks in no spirit of hostility to the Government, but only with a sincere desire of doing some good. He sincerely trusted the Government would re-consider the position, and remember that last year they made promises one after another so strong that it was impossible for any Government to get out of them. It was impossible for this House, with any sense of its own dignity, to accept a Bill of this kind as the Bill which it had a right to expect after the promises given and the full investigation which had been made. There might be some who would say—"Why did you not raise this question on the second reading of the Bill? Why did you wait until we had had two sittings in Committee?" His answer to that was very simple. It was the duty of every Member to do that which he thought best to obtain his ends, so long as he took a fair and honourable way of going to work. In his opinion, had he raised this question on the second reading, it would have been very unwise indeed. It was very much better, in his judgment, to wait until the House had had a taste of the Bill, and see how imperfect it was, even as it stood, apart from the investigation, because he believed he would then be more likely to get support from the House and the country. He did hope the Secretary of State for War would yet consider this question with his Colleagues; because, for his own part, whether or not he opposed it in its course through Committee, this he should do—he should oppose it as much as he could do on the third reading, because he believed it to be a measure fraught with great danger to the Army and mischief to the country.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. John Holms.)

Mr. J. Holms

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the course his hon. Friend had taken was certainly a very unusual one, and if it were frequently taken it would be absolutely incompatible with the conduct of any Business in the House. He must say that the idea to which his hon. Friend referred in the last sentences of his speech crossed his own mind during the whole course of that speech—namely, why in the world his hon. Friend did not take the course upon the introduction of the Bill or upon the second reading? His hon. Friend's objection was that there had not been such an investigation of the matter as would justify any Bill at all. Well, if his hon. Friend was right, he had allowed the House to waste a great deal of valuable time which might have been saved; and he justified it on the ground that he thought it was the most effectual way of punishing the House for the course which had been taken. All he could say was that if every hon. Member took that view the House would transact no Business at all. He had hoped that the course which his hon. Friend took arose from a more obvious cause, that it had not been convenient for him to be present at the first or second reading. But now there was another course which his hon. Friend might take. So far as he recollects the proceedings of the Select Committee, the only question which his hon. Friend there raised was the one to which he had now referred in his speech, when he said the Committee ought not only to have investigated the punishments of crime, but also the causes by which crime was produced. Well, that was a very large question indeed. The hon. Member said it would take one year, and two years; but if they were to investigate the causes from which crimes arose, he did not think 20 years would suffice, because the causes that led to crime were not only multitudinous, but almost universal. Now, they were going to have a Bill for the codification of the Criminal Law of this country. Would his hon. Friend contend that they were not to codify the Criminal Law until they had investigated, either by a Committee or in this House, all the causes which led to the commission of crime? It seemed to him that was a proposition which was incapable of being sustained; and that was why he opposed it in the Select Committee, and the great majority of the Committee opposed it. The House could pass no Criminal Law upon any subject whatever, if it were insisted upon as a condition to precede it that they should examine into all the causes of the offences with which they proposed to deal. For instance, what were the causes that led to murder? The causes that led to murder were love, jealousy, hate—every passion which animated the human breast; and if they were to pass no Statute for the punishment of murder until they had investigated the causes and the operation of all those passions, they would never pass any Bill at all. Therefore, when his hon. Friend proposed that they should not proceed to legislate until they had investigated the causes of crime, he, for one, thought that was not a subject which could be investigated or dealt with by that House. Then his hon. Friend had said various things that led to the belief that there was not even-handed justice between different classes. Now, he agreed with his hon. Friend that that would be the greatest of all evils, and the Committee certainly considered that question—whether they did so efficiently or not, was another thing. This much he could say—that they were constantly altering the Bill in that direction, and he believed it would be found that the measure bore traces throughout of that spirit. Many clauses were altered for the purpose of putting officers on the same footing as men, and he did not remember that his hon. Friend proposed any clause bearing on the point. He was sorry that his hon. Friend had not attempted to amend the Bill by putting down some Amendments on the Paper; because the Committee upstairs and the present Committee would certainly consider most carefully and favourably any Amendments from the hon. Member. But to attack the Bill and the Committee in the way the hon. Member had done, he could not agree with or think to be well founded.

MR. J. HOLMS begged pardon for interrupting. He never attacked the Committee in the slightest degree. He only ventured to say that they came to the conclusion that they had not time to take evidence, and so proceeded at once to the work of codification.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT could not quite agree in the accuracy of that statement. No doubt, codification was the main line of the Bill; but still, especially on the very point to which he had referred, the Committee did not merely codify but made considerable alterations. If his hon. Friend could have given them the advantage more often of his assistance, the Bill, no doubt, might have been made more effectual in that direction; but the Committee would also be very glad if he would put down any Amendments now which would tend to remove from the Bill any trace of want of even-handed justice. It had escaped his own examination if there was that want of even-handed justice. His hon. Friend had suggested one or two other matters to which he would not refer in detail, because they were matters with which the present Committee were perfectly well able to deal. His hon. Friend had only to put down Amendments to them, and his knowledge and ability, especially in relation to all matters connected with the Army, which everyone must recognize, would certainly secure for them a very favourable acceptance. But to propose that the consideration of the Bill should be deferred until the House had investigated the causes of crime, was a proposition which they could not accept, and one which, practically, could never be carried out. No doubt, the Committee was not what was called an evidence Committee. The task it undertook really was to examine the Bill submitted by the Government. He never regarded its duty as anything else; and he certainly would not have become a Member of that Committee, still less would he have accepted the Chairmanship, if the task set before them had been to investigate the principles of Military Law, and the causes of the crimes with which it dealt. Their real task was to investigate the Mutiny Act, and to see what Amendments could be made in it; and he could not see that evidence would have assisted them much in that task. His hon. Friend had not even indicated the character of the evidence which he had proposed to have called with reference to the causes of crime. He spoke of chaplains of gaols; but that was the only indication he gave of the sort of evidence he wanted to take. For his own part, he was convinced that that was an inquiry which the Committee could not have carried out. In examining the Bill itself, on the other hand, the Members of the Committee were quite as capable of judging whether its clauses did or did not secure even-handed justice as any witnesses that could have been called before them. Therefore, for his part, he hoped the Committee would continue the discussion of this important Bill, making such alterations as they might deem necessary.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT was extremely surprised at the statement of the hon. Member (Mr. J. Holms). He would ask him and the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), who had been cheering him, how on earth the Business of the House was to go on if, in the middle of a Committee of this kind, after a Bill had passed the first reading and the second reading, and had been partly through Committee, they were to have such Motions as this brought forward? He always listened to the hon. Member with pleasure, especially on all questions connected with the Army; but his speech was one which should have been made on the second reading. What would the Irish Members have said if an Irish Bill were in Committee, and it was proposed to stop its further progress in this way? Would they not say that it was an attempt, on the part of the Conservative Members, to prevent justice from being done to Ireland? This was a most important Bill; and no one knew better than the hon. and gallant Member for Galway that it was essential it should be passed that Session. Therefore, he hoped that they would delay no further; but that the Motion would be withdrawn, the Committee proceeded with, and any Amendments which the hon. Member (Mr. J. Holms) might wish to make could then be discussed.

MAJOR NOLAN pointed out that the argument as to Irish measures was not at all applicable, for Irish measures never were allowed to get into Committee. He had been assailed for giving a single cheer, and he therefore would explain why he gave it. The hon. Member (Mr. J. Holms) had, on various occasions, put forward exceedingly clear and straightforward views on military administration. As he understood these views, his hon. Friend wished to make our Army more like the Continental Armies, and to give the country a powerful Army instead of a weak one. He supported those views, because he believed they were in the right direction. The present Bill tried to stop wholesale desertion and re-enlistment by severe punishments; while his hon. Friend wished to do away with those crimes, as he understood, by enlisting a superior class of men in the Army. They would only get those men to join by offering them advantages superior to those at present offered. He cheered, because he thought his hon. Friend, generally right on military matters, was especially right on the present occasion.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE quite agreed with his hon. Friend (Mr. J. Holms). The Committee was, more or less, a sham. That was his opinion of it. Its time was so limited that it could not discuss very many most important questions. That assertion the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) could not deny, for the statement was quoted from the opening paragraph of the Report of the Committee. He brought the question of Courts of Appeal at the very outset of the proceedings before the Committee, and the Chairman then said that they could not go into the matter, as important evidence would otherwise have to be taken as to whether or no there should be Courts of Appeal in the Army. He should have thought it a most important question to decide; but the Chairman decided against discussing it. He did not agree with the necessity of passing the Bill this year. It would make no difference to the Army whether it would be discussed this year or next. He thought it very desirable that a Committee should sit again, and go thoroughly into this Bill. Another point never discussed was the subject of flogging. He was quite opposed to it, for it did not exist in any foreign Army; and why it should exist in ours he was at a loss to understand. The whole proceedings of the Committee were too hurried, for they were bound to have their Report ready by the 15th of July, and everything was pressed on to suit that date. He might remind the Committee also that the present Bill contained the same perplexing and involved legal phraseology as the old Act, although one of the objects of this consolidating measure was to simplify and amend the language of the Mutiny Acts. Surely, at the present time, when men were only enlisted for short periods of service, they should make their military Acts as simple and concise as possible. He should heartily support the Motion.

Sir William Harcourt

COLONEL STANLEY thought he need add little to what had been already said by the hon. and gallant Baronet behind him (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) and his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Sir William Harcourt). He could not help regretting, however—though he hoped the hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Holms) would understand he did it with no personal feeling whatever—that the hon. Gentleman should have brought forward this Motion without observing the ordinary courtesy of informing either the House or the Member in charge of the Bill of his intention to do so. Had the hon. Member given Notice of his intention to make a statement of a general character, he might have provided himself, better than he was armed at the present time, with arguments which might have removed his objections. In many respects the hon. Member would find that the Bill did not deserve the character which he had attributed to it. In the clause punishing desertion material differences had been made. Although desertion was still visited by severe punishments, yet, nevertheless, many amendments had been made in the law in order to mitigate its severity, and to give men who got into trouble the opportunity of redeeming their character. In regard to non-commissioned officers, the hon. Gentleman had either mistaken the matter or had not taken ordinary pains to acquaint himself with the provisions of the Bill. The hon. Member read some extracts from a letter, in which the position of a non-commissioned officer was said to depend upon the mere breath of his commander. Although that might have been the case heretofore, the hon. Member had overlooked the fact that in the Bill was a clause which distinctly, and for the first time, gave the non-commissioned officer the right to appeal to a court martial from any decision by his colonel. Again, it was by no means the case that punishments had been made more severe. The powers of courts martial had been enlarged, the power of giving cumulative sentences had been very much restricted; and throughout the Bill an endeavour had been made, while keeping the punishments sufficiently clear for the purpose they were intended to serve, to make them less severe than they had been in former Acts. With regard to the suggestion that only one part of the Bill had been dealt with by the Select Committee, he had already more than once explained to the House the position in which he found himself on his accession to Office. A promise had been given that the old Mutiny Act should not be again presented to the House. A Committee was appointed; but it was not possible, in the time at command, to bring all the provisions relative to enlistment, &c. before the Committee. Part of the matter, therefore, was submitted to them; and he stated to the House, on the earliest opportunity afforded him, that, on full consideration, he thought he would be better carrying out the wish of the House and of Parliament by laying the remainder of the Bill before them, and by taking the discussion in Committee of the House. That course enabled the House to proceed at once with the amendment of the Bill, instead of having to defer it for another year. If there had been any refusal of discussion in Committee, or if there had been any attempt in any way to force the Bill upon the House without amendment, or if any disposition had been shown, either on one side of the House or on the other, to close the discussion, he could have understood the reasonableness of the course which the hon. Member had taken. On the contrary, however, during the two days on which the Committee had been employed on the Bill, they had proceeded in a most business-like spirit, and with a feeling of conciliation on both sides of the House, with the result that they were now making what he hoped would be a good law. The Bill was in no sense one of a Party character, and he did trust that the Government would be supported in its desire to proceed with it.

MR. E. JENKINS, though he agreed with the remarks of his hon. Friend (Mr. J. Holms), could not quite feel that this was the proper time for making them. But his hon. Friend troubled the House very seldom; and, as they all knew, he was actuated in all that he did by a very strong sense of duty. He hoped that this discussion, after all, might be of some use, and might facilitate the passing of this Bill, by securing from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite the offer of substantial concessions on several points. There could be no doubt that the remark of his hon. and gallant Friend (Major Nolan) had great weight. The minds of persons desirous to enter the Army must be affected by the character of the discipline to which they would be subjected; and if it should, unfortunately, get abroad, first permeating the Army itself, and then disseminated from it amongst the people, that the rules and regulations were at all unfair, or at all tended towards injustice, the effect would be very disastrous upon those who might otherwise wish to join. He was only anxious that there should be a thorough discussion. Up to that time the discussion had certainly been conducted in a business-like manner, and he would, therefore, advise his hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion. At the same time, he would ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to consider whether he could not accept some of the suggestions as to courts martial, and so enable the Committee very quickly to dispose of a number of clauses. The proceedings of courts martial should be subjected to a certain amount of legal oversight and revision, and they ought to have a proper, efficient, and able Judge Advocate General, with a competent staff. He hoped before long to hear some assurance from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that he would do something to insure that in all courts martial there should be every chance of doing every possible justice.

COLONEL MURE must say there was a good deal in the speech of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Holms). He must regret that it was not consistent with the work of that Committee—of which he was a Member—to make a thorough investigation of the Military Law, especially when they remembered the very ancient character of the Mutiny Act. He wished he could think that the rules and regulations of the Army had any influence on enlistment. All, however, who were conversant with it knew that that was not so. The men who at present joined the Army usually enlisted through starvation, and they were not, unfortunately, of a class whose decisions were formed by any consideration as to the character of the Mutiny Act. Being men of this character, it was necessary to have very strict discipline; and although he was entirely opposed to excessive punishments, he did not think that the existing scale, in view of the present character of the Army, could be very much relaxed.

Mr. E. Jenkins

One other thing he did wish to point out. In the Committee upstairs it was understood that their work was to be mainly consolidation; but it was also clearly understood that when the Bill got into Committee of the House, a thorough investigation and revision was to be made. He must complain of the fact that this arrangement had not been carried out. Whenever Amendments were suggested, the answer was that the proposal was an alteration of the old Act, or the old Articles. That was not the temper which he had expected from this Committee. There was not that earnest desire for improvement which he had expected from the front Bench of the Opposition—the progressive Liberal Bench. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) had shown no desire to help forward Amendments; but had constantly said, with Shylock, that it was not in the bond. They were now making a law for all time; and he was bound to say he did not congratulate himself on the progress they were making. He did not, at the same time, entirely agree with the hon. Member (Mr. J. Holms), who, apparently, was not thoroughly acquainted with the Army. Would he, for instance, as he rather indicated by the passages he quoted, make no difference between the case of a private striking an officer and an officer striking a private? Again, he complained of the reduction of non-commissioned officers for ill-conduct. But if the hon. Member had a foreman who behaved himself ill, would he refrain from dismissing him because the dismissal might be his social ruin? A non-commissioned officer was in a better position than the foreman, indeed, because he had a right of appeal. He hoped his hon. Friend would not divide, especially as he could gain nothing by it.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON also hoped that course would be taken, although if anything could make him support his hon. Friend, it was the fact that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had hitherto failed to lay on the Table the alteration by which he proposed to bring this Act within the lines of the Constitution. Before going into Committee he pointed out to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that the Bill at present violated the principles of the Constitution in regard to the relations between the Crown, the Army, and Parliament. On finding that it was so, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman promised to alter the clause, and on that understanding he withdrew his Amendment. As yet, however, that alteration had not been laid on the Table; and he did think it was trifling with the House to defer its production any longer.

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that what he undertook to do was to strike out Clause 178 when they arrived at it, and to deal with the matter by the insertion of the old clause, as it at present stood, in the Act. He regretted that clause had not yet appeared on the Paper; but as he would have other verbal Amendments to move, he deferred putting it down until they were ready also.

MR. HOPWOOD said, his hon. Friend (Mr. J. Holms) had been a good deal abused for doing what he conceived to be his duty. In his opinion, however, the hon. Member had very fairly justified his own position; and he had certainly stood up for it like a man and a Member of Parliament—a combination much to be admired. He was sorry the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) had left the Committee; because he wished to tell him that he did not altogether approve of one of their own side administering reproofs in the manner that he had done. He was not even content with administering advice and reproof, but he went further, and suggested that his hon. Friend (Mr. J. Holms) wanted a Committee to inquire into all the causes of crime, and proceeded to enumerate, for the sake of ridicule, many indirect causes, such as love, hate, self-interest, &c. That was by no means correct. His hon. Friend wished for an inquiry into the causes of military crime—of those offences which, in the eyes of civilians, were not crimes at all, though they might be military offences. Did they not all know that great good would be done by such an inquiry? His hon. Friend, and other business men like him, might have inquired how far petty oppressions and the ignorance of the non-commissioned officers were responsible for the enormous number of military crimes, and the inquiry would have been a very proper one. The Committee upstairs did not go into these subjects, because they had not time; and that of itself, now that they had the Bill under discussion, should make them uncommonly tender and careful how they decided upon the Amendments now before them, and should also protect his hon. Friend from a lecture for doing what he conceived it to be his duty to do.

GENERAL SHUTE was not much enamoured of the Bill, for it neither simplified, so far as officers and soldiers were concerned, nor abbreviated the present law. But he was not surprised that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) felt a little hurt at the remarks which had been made, for, as a Member of the Committee, he could testify that it was impossible that any Chairman could have shown greater tact in dealing with the Bill in the Select Committee, or greater knowledge on the subject for one who was not a military man. In the short time allowed them more, certainly, could not have been done than was accomplished. He did not altogether agree with the last speaker. The Mutiny Act was intended to ensure more exemplary and speedy punishments for breaches of discipline than could be obtained by the Civil Law; and though its enactments might appear to be severe to civilians, they were forced to be severe. The court martial system, in his opinion, had been seriously injured by the tinkering of indifferent lawyers, many of whom were utterly ignorant of the requirements of discipline, and not particularly well up even in their own profession. The Army wanted discipline, while lawyers thought only of the punishment for, and the repression of, such offences as would in Criminal Law be considered crimes. Courts martial, then, should be real Courts of Justice, unfettered by the minor quibbles of the law, which might render the conviction of unquestionably guilty offenders less certain. When he first knew the Army an innocent man would always prefer trial by a court martial, while the guilty one liked to be sent to a Civil Court. He did hope, therefore, that in considering this Bill the Committee would look rather to the requirements of discipline, than merely to the repression of crime in the civil sense of that term.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER knew that the gallant General (General Shute) was always inclined to take a very harsh and severe view of questions of this kind; and he never remembered an occasion when, either by chance or accident, he said anything in favour of relaxing Military Law. Once, on the trial of a political prisoner in Ireland, the hon. and gallant Gentleman had regretted that he had no power to order the prisoner a whipping at the cart's tail. He did trust, therefore, that the Committee would look with very great suspicion upon his evidence. Both the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Stanley) and the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had entirely evaded the main justification for this Motion, which was that the Government, after a pledge of the most distinct and emphatic character that the Select Committee should thoroughly revise and reform the Military Law, had not kept their pledge. Why was that? Had the right hon. and gallant Gentleman no apologies to offer to the House for the broken promises of his Predecessors? If no explanation were offered, the Committee would be perfectly justified in a refusal to proceed with the Bill; for his hon. Friend (Mr. J. Holms) had given chapter and verse for his statements, and had shown that on many occasions Amendments were withdrawn because of those pledges. Now, it was found that the Committee which set out to improve the law had simply occupied themselves in its codification, with the result that they had actually perpetuated and stereotyped the very things against which these Amendments were protests. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) asked whether the Criminal Code Bill was to be set aside until they had ascertained the causes of crime? His reply was, that they had already repeatedly inquired into the causes of civil crime, but that they had not taken the same pains with military crimes; and for that reason had not been able to enact laws calculated to improve the condition and character of the Army. The prevention of crime ought to be as much the object of the Mutiny Act as its punishment. It ought, also, to enact the law in clear, plain, and simple language. An appeal had been made to the Government to see that this was done in the present Bill, and a promise was given. In what respect had that promise been carried out? In none whatever. In the Select Committee hon. Members who wished to go into the matter were told that the Bill was simply intended to codify the different clauses of the old Mutiny Act. So far from being business-like, the conduct of the Committee had been, up to the present, the very reverse; for it had simply stereotyped things against which many of them had vainly protested time after time before. They ought to inquire into the circumstances which led to the commission of offences in the Army before they proceeded to draw up a Code to punish them; and they ought to take care that the matter was fully and amply investigated, not merely by calling military testimony, but by taking impartial evidence, especially with regard to the punishments inflicted. Nothing of this sort had yet been done. His hon. Friend, he thought, had shown great discretion in affording the Committee an opportunity of examining the Bill in detail before asking them to reject it; and the protest made against his proceeding by some hon. Members, who seemed to think their only duty was to help the Government to back out of its pledges, was entirely without reason.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he earnestly hoped that the time of the House would cease to be misapplied in discussing so badly prepared a legislative measure as this Army Discipline Bill was. There were other far more important questions connected with the Army needing the urgent and devoted attention of the Secretary of State. No one acquainted with the state of the Army could help being anxious about its condition at the present time. Any military man, who saw the five regiments which recently embarked for the Cape, must be struck by the necessity for some change in their system. His hon. Friend (Mr. J. Holms) had certainly exercised a wise discretion in not bringing forward his Motion until the Committee had had an opportunity of judging whether it was likely to pass this Bill with any satisfactory results. They had now been two days at work, yet they had made very little progress with this Bill; and he must also point out that they had not got the simplification and the clearness they had been promised in a new Mutiny Act. Why, then, should not the right hon. and gallant Gentleman take back his Bill and amend it for next year's re-consideration, asking, at the same time, for an extension of the present continuing Act for a few months? When the Militia Bill was brought in, it was accompanied by an explanatory Memorandum of the changes made; but this Bill, though far more important, had been thrown, chucked, before the Committee without any such explanation. They knew, also, not merely by rumour, that the Horse Guards were very much dissatisfied with the measure; and they surely should have a full opportunity of considering its details and submitting their views on the measure. He was perfectly certain that no soldier who knew what a Mutiny Bill should be would allow this Code to pass in its present form. Let the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Stanley) look at Clause 173, as an instance of the way in which the non-commissioned officers were treated. At the present time, with their short-service system, it was of the utmost importance that they should have the very best non-commissioned officers; but so long as they lowered the rank of the non-commissioned officer, by allowing him to be degraded at the mere hasty words of the commanding officer, so long would they fail to get the class of men they wanted. There was plenty of time to pass a thoroughly satisfactory measure; but, for his own part, he would far rather have the old Mutiny Act than the present measure. In that opinion he knew many officers would concur.

Mr. O'Connor Power

MR. P. A. TAYLOR would only trouble the House for a minute or two in reference to the particular part of this Bill in which he took special interest—punishment of soldiers by flogging. Some of his hon. Friends from Ireland—especially the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), and the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power)—when this Mutiny Act was before the House last year, were in favour of offering a very determined resistance to these clauses, word by word and line by line. They wanted to move the reduction of the lashes from 40 to 39, and from 39 to 38, and so on. He ventured, however, to advise them not to take that course, as he did not think it was the best way to meet the evil. He reminded them that the Government were pledged to give the Act a thorough overhauling in all respects, and to introduce a new Bill; and he told them that after that had been done he did not believe the flogging clauses would be again offered to them. His hon. Friends accepted his advice, and withdrew their Amendments. Now, he asked whether it was fair of the Government to Parliament, or to the Irish Members, or fair even to himself, to allow that to be done when they had no intention of going into these matters in the Committee, and, as a matter of fact, never did go into them at all. For when he asked some of his Friends on the Committee, taking great interest in the matter, what was being done about the flogging clauses, he was told that they were not to be discussed at all. He certainly was justified in believing that the Government were pledged to go into the matter; for he found, on turning back to Hansard, that these were the words of Mr. Secretary Hardy, now Lord Cranbrook—

“He had asked the House to pass the Bill in its present shape under the following state of things:—It was going to be referred to a Committee. . . . He certainly asked the Committee, as far as they possibly could, to pass the Bill in its present shape, with the view that there might be a thorough investigation hereafter into the whole subject.”—[3 Hansard, cccxxxix. 46.]

Whether the Committee that was struck gave satisfaction to anyone but themselves he did not know; but it was certainly the fact that many Gentlemen were very dissatisfied with the result of the labours of that Committee. It had simply given them a codification of the Mutiny Act and of the Articles of War. There was no reason for all this haste. They had gone on with this very confused and stupid old Mutiny Act for a great many years, and they could very well go on with it for one, two, or even three years more. But what they did want to do was not merely to pass an indifferent Bill, but to make the law as perfect as possible. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) asked what was the good of taking evidence? He replied, that there was ground for asking for evidence as to flogging. When England was the only civilized State in Europe which tortured its soldiers with the lash, evidence would surely have helped them to form an opinion whether it was still necessary to disgrace our Military Code with this punishment. It had been said that it was very inconvenient to bring this matter forward now; but the answer to that was perfect. The hon. Member (Mr. J. Holms) was bound to come forward at the time when he thought his object of stopping the Bill was most likely to be attained. He apparently thought the Bill was a mass of confusion, and a conglomeration of impossibilities; and he probably waited till the House was convinced of its imperfections. If his hon. Friend went to a division, he should certainly support him.

Mr. J. HOLMS only wished to say a very few words in reply. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had suggested that he was a rare attendant at the meetings of the Select Committee. The Report showed, however—as the hon. and learned Member would have seen had he taken the trouble to turn to it—that he was present at 10 meetings out of 12, when the evidence was given. He wished, again, to remind the Committee that no answer whatever had been made to the very plain issue he laid before it. That was, that the pledges given by the Government last year, that full investigation should be made into various subjects, had not been kept. No evidence was taken before the Select Committee, except of an official character; although in the Report that Committee themselves said, for instance, that they were of opinion that the power of commanding officers should be defined in the Statute, but that they had not before them sufficient evidence to enable them to decide whether such powers should be exempted. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) said that the rules and regulations had no effect on enlistment, because the class from which their recruits at present were drawn was a class on the verge of starvation. That was precisely his contention; and until the Military Law was changed and improved, they would continue only to get men to enlist when they were driven to do so from starvation. He was invited to put down Amendments; but though he would not absolutely say that the Bill could not be made a good Bill without taking evidence and going into all these different questions, he certainly should decline the invitation, and would reserve to himself the right to take the sense of the House on this matter when the Bill came up for the third reading. He begged to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER asked if it would not be better to leave out the words in line 27, "being an officer or non-commissioned officer?" The words at the beginning of the clause "every person subject to military law" would include everything; while at the end of the clause the punishments were defined, "if an officer, to be cashiered... if a soldier, to suffer imprisonment." The words were mere surplusage; and as his right hon. and gallant Friend had objected, in every other case, to the insertion of the words "non-commissioned officer," because in the Definition Clause it was intended to make that included in the word "soldier," it would be better to leave them out.

Amendment moved, in page 12, line 27, to leave out all the words from the beginning of the line down to before the word "wilfully."

COLONEL STANLEY agreed that the Amendment would make the clause more in accordance with the general arrangement of the Bill.

MAJOR NOLAN would again ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman whether the Committee would be permitted to discuss the prices paid for billeting? He had asked the question several times before; he could not get an answer, and he could not set up a preliminary Committee, as it required an Order from the Privy Council.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON remarked, that they were now about to discuss the offence and the punishment without having settled the law in regard to billeting. The rule hitherto had been to make the law first, and to decide the punishment afterwards.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped that he had already given a satisfactory answer on the subject. The hon. and gallant Gentleman's desire was to discuss the prices of billets, and before the Committee came to the clauses on that subject the matter should be explained. He had been, and still was, in communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject; and before they came to the clauses he would state what course he thought the most advisable.

Mr. P. A. Taylor

Originally, he thought of placing in the Bill words giving authority to the Secretary of State for War to adjust prices from time to time; but that was thought inadvisable. Then it was suggested that the prices should be inserted in the Schedule of the annual Act, and so afford opportunity for revision. The matter was still under consideration, and he could not give any fuller answer at present.

MAJOR NOLAN said, this seemed to him to be the only clause on which he could raise this question. He did not want to discuss the prices, but only to know whether, when they were reached, the Committee would be at liberty to discuss them? Surely on that point the Secretary of State for War and the Chancellor of the Exchequer could make up their minds. If the Committee could not discuss these prices and divide on them, it was very little use to talk about them; and, therefore, he simply wanted to know whether, when they got to the second Schedule, they were to find their mouths shut?

Amendment agreed to.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER suggested the addition of the words, in line 35, of "or other civil officer." It was possible billets might be required for other persons besides the constable. The words were in the old Act, and it was very desirable that they should be in the Bill also.

Amendment moved, in page 12, line 35, after "constable," to insert "or other civil officer."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Offences in relation to Impressment of Carriages.

Clause 31 (Offences in relation to the impressment of carriages, and their attendants).

MR. E. JENKINS moved, in order to put himself in Order, to leave out the 1st sub-section. This clause, at the very least, required some explanation from either the right hon. and gallant Gentleman or the Judge Advocate General, for it did not occur either in the Mutiny Act or in the Articles of War. He wished to point out, also, how very general the sub-section was. It said whoever wilfully demanded any carriage, &c., "not actually required for the purposes authorized by this Act." It did not say required by proper authority, or under proper authority. The purposes authorized later on also seemed to be very general indeed.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had never, either directly or indirectly, contended that nothing new was to be introduced during the process of codification. He had proposed these words because they seemed to him necessary for the protection of the public. He could not conceive a graver offence than wilfully taking animals, vessels, &c., which were not actually required. Of course, the court which tried the case would decide whether the things were actually required. They must deal with the general case; they could not legislate for the particular.

MR. BULWER considered the clause capable of amendment, in that something ought to be said of the intent with which these things were taken. As the clause at present stood, if a man took 21 horses when only 20 were required, he would have committed an offence within the meaning of the Act.

COLONEL STANLEY thought all those points might safely be left to the court martial which tried the case.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. E. JENKINS wished to call attention to the words used a little further on in the clause—

"Constrains any carriage . . . to travel against the will of the person in charge thereof beyond the proper distance."

Those words were very vague. In the original Act the words were "the distance specified by the justices' warrant." It would be, of course, proper to word the clause in its present way; but he thought it might be amended, so that it might read, "beyond the distance specified," or "authorized under this Act."

COLONEL STANLEY had some doubts whether it would be wise to limit the Act in that way, or to make reference to any rules which might be created in pursuance of the Act. It was rather a small matter to put into an Act of Parliament; but, at the same time, he quite agreed with the principle the hon. Member was upholding; and he would either consider the matter and deal with it on the Report, or insert the words now, reserving power to himself to alter them on the Report.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON remarked, that former Acts of Parliament limited the distance to 25 miles. It would surely be wise to insert that provision again.

MR. E. JENKINS only wished to call attention to the vagueness of the words. He would be quite satisfied if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would deal with the matter on the Report.

COLONEL STANLEY replied to the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), that he would not like to commit himself to an undertaking that no vessel should be taken more than 25 miles.

MR. A. H. BROWN pointed out that the clause provided that the road was to be between such places as were specified in the Act, and the distance between such places was carefully guarded by another part of the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR observed, that the clause provided for the punishment of officers and soldiers, but not non-commissioned officers. The last words were—

"And if a soldier, to suffer imprisonment, or such less punishment as is in this Act mentioned."

Had they yet come to a clear understanding as to whether non-commissioned officer was included under the word "soldier?" The Definition Clause 173 did declare soldier to cover non-commissioned officer; but Clause 180 distinctly defined soldier to exclude both officer and non-commissioned officer.

COLONEL STANLEY would venture to repeat, what he had more than once said before, that when they came to the Definition Clause he would bring up words which should make this point clearer. He was not quite sure whether, as a matter of convenience in drafting, it was better to put in the words "non-commissioned officer" wherever wanted, or to include it under the term "soldier." When they came to the Definition Clause he would bring up words to settle the matter. At present, the term "soldier" included non-commissioned officer, except when otherwise stated.

Clause agreed to.

Colonel Stanley

Offences in relation to Enlistment.

Clause 32 (Enlistment of soldier or sailor discharged with ignominy or disgrace).

MAJOR O'BEIRNE thought the clause was carried too far. If a man were dismissed as objectionable from the Navy, they would suppose that would unfit him to serve in the Land Forces. But, some time ago, a man deserted from the Marines, and enlisted in the 32nd. He rose to the rank of non-commissioned officer by exemplary good conduct, and afterwards, on his trial for desertion, it came out that he deserted because he found his life unbearable from sea-sickness. Therefore, if a man were turned out of the Navy because he was "objectionable"—which, however, might really mean that he was a sufferer from sea-sickness—that was no reason why he should be tried and punished very severely for enlisting in another regiment. The Admiralty ought to have power to transfer a man from the Marines to the Land Forces. He moved, in page 14, line 20, to leave out "or as objectionable."

MR. W. H. SMITH explained, that the word "objectionable" was perfectly well understood in the Navy. It did not apply at all to those who were, unfortunately, unable to live comfortably at sea. A man was tried, for instance, for drunkenness, time after time, and at last he would be dismissed from the Navy as objectionable. Of course, it would be very undesirable to enlist such a person in the Army.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT considered that the word "disgrace" alone would be sufficient. He was impressed with the view taken by the hon. and gallant Member (Major O'Beirne), that a man should not be punished for enlisting, although he had been dismissed from the Navy "as objectionable," because this term did not necessarily imply anything disgraceful.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON inquired of the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether the word "objectionable" was used in the discharges of the men dismissed from the Navy? He regarded the word as being too vague.

COLONEL MURE said, a man could not be dismissed from the Navy unless there were very strong objections to his conduct; he could not, therefore, believe that the hon. and gallant Member (Sir Alexander Gordon) would like persons of that character to enter the Army. The clause contemplated cases of a very different kind to those in which the Royal Prerogative was exercised, in the dismissal of officers for infirmity of temper and other disqualifications.

MR. STAVELEY HILL contended that if the clause was intended to relate to persons who, by the Naval Discipline Act, might be dismissed either "with disgrace" or "as objectionable persons," the words "as objectionable" should remain in the clause.

MR. E. JENKINS found that there were words in the Mutiny Act which might be taken to include this offence; but the clause was, in his opinion, an exceptionally severe one. It would be seen that the words—"Or from any portion of the Auxiliary Forces, when subject to Military Law," would apply to Volunteers, who he did not think should be prevented from entering the Army. His objection was to the principle and spirit of the clause; because, as the Mutiny Act provided that a record should be kept of every discharge from Her Majesty's Service, the officers at head-quarters ought to be in a position to detect cases of re-enlistment. They had already passed a clause which rendered a man liable to imprisonment for making a false statement at the time of enlistment; and it would seem to be very harsh that a court martial should try him for the offence of enlisting again. He considered the clause unnecessary, and thought that, before the Report, the matter should receive the attention of the Secretary of State for War.

COLONEL STANLEY regretted the absence of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms), who, taking the strong view which he did with regard to desertion from the Army, would certainly have supported this clause, even if he objected to other parts of the Bill. He (Colonel Stanley) could not but admit that the clause was more stringent in its effect than the law hitherto existing; but its object was to prevent the re-enlistment of men who could not be tried and punished under the Fraudulent Enlistment Act; men who were discharged from the Army under circumstances which rendered them no longer fit for service. With regard to the record of enlistments referred to by the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), he granted that such a register might be kept of soldiers who did not enlist abroad; but there was no possibility of doing so in the case of men who enlisted out of the country, which would render such an arrangement inoperative. The clause under consideration only applied to men who were thoroughly bad—who had been discharged with ignominy from the Regular Army or Auxiliary Forces, or from the dépôt, or other analogous Services, or who had been dismissed from the Navy. Such men, who re-enlisted by deceit, came back into the Army only to swell the record of crimes in different regiments. He trusted that the Committee would allow the clause to pass.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE complained that he had not received an answer to his question as to whether Marines were ever dismissed from the Service because they suffered from sea sickness?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, in his reply to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, he had distinctly stated that such was not the case.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT considered that they should very carefully consider the effect of the clause, which struck him as being too severe. Everyone agreed that it was desirable to prevent the enlistment of bad men in the Army; but he could conceive that the term "objectionable" might be applied to conduct that required no punishment at all. It must be borne in mind that there were points to be considered. A man might, under the Naval Discipline Act, be legally convicted and dismissed from the Service with disgrace. In another case, he might be dismissed as "objectionable." Now, it was not exactly known what this word meant; and it would, therefore, be a serious thing to add it to a penal Statute. He could conceive the case of a troublesome, refractory boy, of not more than 12 or 14 years of age, who perhaps seven years after he had been dismissed from the Navy as objectionable might enlist in the Army. This boy might have entirely changed and become a very well-conducted man; but, all of a sudden, he would find himself liable to penal servitude. He did not think that this provision should be introduced into the Bill; and considered that the best way to meet the case would be to take from every man a declaration that he had not before served in the Army or Navy, and punish him if he made a false declaration, which would be a definite offence. For the reasons stated, he suggested that the clause should be postponed and re-considered.

COLONEL NORTH suggested that the best way to deal with the case of desertions from the Army was by a return to the system of marking, which in former days was the terror of deserters. There was no cruelty whatever in the act of marking a man; but the system had been done away with not by order of the House of Commons, but by the Act of Lord Cardwell, then Secretary of State for War, acting on the recommendation of a Royal Commission, which sat to consider the subject. The object of marking was the protection of the country from a system of fraud practised by men who enlisted first in the Army, then in the Militia, and so on, going from one regiment to the other; and to this effect was the answer given by Mr. Cardwell, when Secretary of State for War, who, when his opinion was asked as to whether marking ought to be regarded as a system of punishment, replied that—"He did not think it ought. It was not for the purpose of punishment, but for the prevention of fraud. So that the second infliction of it was wrong, and he felt no doubt that His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief would be of the same opinion."

He (Colonel Mure) entirely agreed that there was no necessity for the second marking. Again, the Royal Commission which sat to consider the subject had said that the "Use of the term 'branding' had led to the erroneous impression that the marking was done in a cruel manner."

And the Report went on to say that—

"The real object of the marking is not the punishment of the offender, but the protection of the public, who are frequently defrauded of bounty on the re-enlistment of discharged men who have brought discredit on the regiment to which they belonged, and are no longer likely to be useful to the Public Service."

They also stated in their Report—

"It is the system of tempting recruits by bounties, without any previous inquiry into their character, which is the chief cause of fraudulent enlistment; and if, as we have reason to hope, measures can be taken to reform this system, all motive for continuing a practice, which nothing but necessity can justify, will cease to exist."

He considered that at no previous period was more trouble taken than at the present moment to inquire into the previous character of recruits for the Army, notwithstanding desertion was on the increase, and he quoted the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting for January, 1878, to show that unless there was some efficient safeguard of the public purse, the evil of desertion was likely to continue, to the great detriment of the Service. It would be seen, from the Return annexed to the Report, that the number of desertions had increased this year to 2,621, as compared with 2,337 in the year previous. He would remind the Committee that in the year 1871, when marking was abolished, the desertions increased to 1,382, and that since then they had risen to 2,690 for 1872, 2,531 for the year 1873, while for the year 1878 there were no less than 2,560 desertions. In short, in 1870, when marking was the rule, the number of deserters was 3,171; in 1878, 5,416. Then there was the crime of making away with the kit, and the number of these offences had risen from 1,135 in 1871 to 2,772 in 1878. The men who committed this fraud upon the public were described by Sir Henry Thring before the Committee as—"A set of loafing vagabonds in the Army, the most troublesome, I believe, of all military offenders, men constantly going from one regiment to another. They desert from one regiment and enlist in another without giving notice that they belong to the Army, and they thereupon get a free kit and a number of advantages; and so they go on leading a sort of vagabond life."

He wished, also, to point out that besides the cost of the kits of which the public were defrauded—the Secretary of State for War had referred to a case in which a man had enlisted in 13 different regiments, and had, consequently, received 13 new kits—the country had to pay for the enormous expense of taking and punishing the men who were guilty of this crime. His object in suggesting a return to the system of marking was no other than the protection of the rate-payers of the country. He, therefore, hoped that either that system, or some efficient method, would be adopted in future; for, besides the enormous ex-enlistment; but it was enlistment from civil life, and quite distinct from fraudulent enlistment. It appeared to him that the clause, which related to the offence of enlisting a recruit by means of false declarations, ought to be a clause under the general heading of fraudulent enlistments, and that the offence provided for by Clause 34, which dealt with enlistment in the active sense of engaging a man in the Service, might be brought under the head of miscellaneous offences elsewhere in the Bill. Unless this was done, he foresaw that considerable confusion would arise with regard to these parts of the Bill. They were dealing with the case of men who enlisted after being discharged from various branches of the Service with ignominy; and he submitted that the question of the re-enlistment of deserters was not before the Committee.

Sir William Harcourt

THE CHAIRMAN said, that to raise the question of re-enlistment by a man still on the Books of the Army at that part of the Bill would be foreign to the clause before the Committee. There was no doubt that the tendency of the discussion had been to exceed the limits of the clause, and he again pointed that out to the Committee.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, there could be no doubt that the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Sir Henry Havelock) was technically right in setting this discussion on foot; because it was essential that at some point in the Bill the Committee should discuss this very serious question relating to desertion and the sale of kits. That practice had increased, especially of late years; no less than 2,800 kits having been sold, and 5,416 having deserted during last year. Even hon. Members opposed to the marking of soldiers had suggested that something should be done; and it was to that point he wished to call the attention of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. The Bill did not in any way provide for the recognition of deserters, who would, therefore, escape detection, unless something happened to turn up to show that they had been in some other regiment. Something, therefore, was required by which a deserter could be recognized and prevented from passing himself off as not having been in the Army at all. It mattered very little how they were marked; but they must be marked in some way. He, therefore, trusted the Secretary of State for War would seriously consider the question, which was one of deep importance not only to the Army itself but to the general public.

COLONEL MURE thought the discussion then going on was not absolutely regular. It appeared to him that the Committee, not only upstairs but in the House, had been paralyzed in its examination of Military Law. The Committee upstairs were told that they were to receive evidence upon the subject of desertion, but were not to discuss the question. The Committee of the House had passed a Desertion Clause, and yet hon. Members were agreed in desiring that the discussion which had been raised should continue, even though it were irregular. He (Colonel Mure) could not understand how hon. Members could thus proceed, while the great evil of desertion was corroding and eating into the Army. He asked, what it was thought would be the feeling in the Army if it were known that the House was discussing a new Code of Military Law, and that it had passed a clause dealing with desertion without saying one word upon it? It would be felt very deeply; because it was a well-known fact that the best soldiers in the Army complained of the disgrace brought upon them by desertions. The fact was, that the question of desertion had never been seriously taken up by the military authorities. The only thing that had been done seriously was to withdraw from the Army the only protection it had—namely, the marking of deserters, a change which rendered their detection thenceforward almost an impossibility. He believed that a very considerable number of hon. Members would hesitate in going back to a system of marking; there was something about the branding a man in early life repugnant to the feelings, especially in the case of very young men. He (Colonel Mure) would in no way submit to the marking of young men with the letter D, even admitting that they were guilty of the crime of desertion.

MR. E. JENKINS said, the question before the Committee being one which had reference to the enlistment of men discharged from the Service with ignominy, he could not see the relevancy of the remarks of the hon. and gallant re-enlistment in the Army would be entirely in favour of the good soldier—the man who endeavoured to do his duty, and who was now the greatest sufferer by the fact that this fraudulent re-enlistment escaped notice. He thought the Committee was much indebted to the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) for having drawn attention to the subject, and trusted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would devise some efficient means of checking the evil.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT thought it well, as the discussion had turned upon the means by which the offence of fraudulent desertion and enlistment in the Army could be prevented, to point out that those who were instrumental in bringing in the soldiers guilty of that offence, might, in his opinion, be very properly called upon to exercise greater circumspection in the men whom they selected. He had no doubt that in many cases the recruiting sergeants were very well aware that the men enlisted by them had been soldiers before; and he (Colonel Arbuthnot) had himself, on more than one occasion, refused to enlist men who had been brought up by the sergeant for enlistment, because it was evident to anyone that the men knew something of military drill. One good step, he thought, in the right direction would be that a little care should be exercised in the granting of sums of money for enlistments. He quite held with the granting of money to those who discovered deserters; but considered it undesirable that pecuniary rewards should be given to anybody in connection with the enlistment of a soldier, until that soldier had been for some time under examination; and he had himself known of cases in which money so granted had been taken back again.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman was departing from the subject before the Committee in referring to the question of bounties.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT was simply showing how those improper enlistments could best be prevented. But he would pass to another point. The hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) had read from a Report in which it was said that by the system of bounties, without due inquiry as to the antecedents of soldiers, desertion was very much encouraged. He (Colonel Arbuthnot) did not see why a man, on offering himself for enlistment, should not be obliged to bring a character of some sort, or furnish a reference, in exactly the same way as demanded from servants engaged by private individuals. There would be a great advantage in this; because, if reference was given to persons who had known the recruit from his early youth, a stop would be put to the practice of children enlisting as men. It would, by this means, be very easy to discover whether the person presenting himself was of the age which he professed to be, or whether, as was often the case, he was three or four years younger. He ventured to think that the civil magistrates might do a great deal in the way of assisting to stop this practice; but he was aware that the various benches of magistrates took very different views concerning the gravity of the crime, and, in some cases, were inclined to act in an unduly lenient manner, from an unaccountable feeling of opposition to the military authorities. He remembered a case in which, finding that a man taken before them had not received his proper punishment, he had written, pointing out the gravity of the offence, and suggesting that he should have received a proper punishment. A rather sharp letter was received in reply, telling him, in effect, that he, as a civil magistrate, understood the case best. He (Colonel Arbuthnot) wrote an apologetic reply, as magistrate of Quarter Sessions in another county, in answer to which he received a very different letter, and the next two men whom he sent up received considerably more punishment than had been formerly awarded. With regard to the making away with kits, he was not quite sure whether the Bill dealt with the point so far as concerned the receivers, who were as much to blame as those who sold the articles. If that was not the case, he thought some provision should be introduced to meet the case of receivers.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN conceived that it would be departing from the proper subject before the Committee to continue the discussion upon fraudulent re-enlistment, concerning which a great deal would have to be said. The clause appeared to him to be misplaced. It dealt with an offence in relation to

Sir Henry Havelock

ment? He could not think that this was justifiable; and he should deem it his duty to take the sense of the Committee upon the maintenance of this

LORD ELCHO agreed that the questions of desertion and enlistment were very important, and, in his opinion, should not be debated casually, but should be brought forward, as it was proposed to do, on Report. But whether right or wrong, as it at present existed, the enlistment question was most important, for it was at the root of the whole military system. For that reason he trusted that it would have a full and careful discussion. Judging from the reports from the different regiments, there was an absolute necessity that the Government should bring forward some proposition on this subject. With regard to the question of desertion, he should not have thought it necessary to make any remarks, but for some absurd statements which had been made. No doubt, the present prevalence of desertion in the Army was a scandal and a disgrace. In his opinion, there must be something very wrong in our military system which produced that state of desertion. His right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was at the head of a body not unlike the Army—he meant the body of the police. He heard no question raised as to desertion from the police, or as to the necessity of branding the police; and he could not but think that if they tried, by some means or other, they could get men into the Army of the character that there were in the police, and then there could be no question about branding. He was entirely opposed to any branding, and had voted against it on previous occasions. There was something to him absolutely repulsive in having to bolster up their military system by branding men like a herd of cattle; and, although they had been told by his hon. and gallant Friend behind him that they should not look upon branding as a disgrace, but that it should be turned into an element of honour by a crown being affixed on some part of the person—he did not say back or front—of every man that enlisted, whether officer or private, yet that did not, in his opinion, shake his abhorrence of the system. He had no intention of enlisting as a private, nor was it ever likely that he should ever have a commission as a second lieutenant.

VOL. CCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

COLONEL ALEXANDER observed, that he had only suggested that the number of the regiment should be marked on each man.

LORD ELCHO said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman's proposal was that every man should have a number as a sort of convict badge. Now, although he was not likely to go into the Army, he might possibly have a son who would be a second lieutenant; and he should object not only to branding deserters, but still more so should he object, if their system was so bad that they had to brand both officers and privates. He objected to branding with the Crown, or anything else, for the purpose of catching deserters, men who could not be at present apprehended because of the faults of the system; and, a fortiori, he should object to any son of his being branded because he entered the Army. To say that to be thus marked with a Crown was an honour! A strange kind of honour founded in dishonour. For his part, he should raise his voice most emphatically against such a system. The matter ought to be dealt with in a very different way; and the subject was a larger one than could be discussed at that time, when the Bill ought to be proceeded with with all reasonable speed. When the subject was brought on he trusted that it would be discussed in a full House. If the question were dealt with in the way it had been suggested—namely, as a question of vaccination—he thought that some hon. Members would certainly raise very great objections to that.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON understood the Secretary of State for War to have said that he would withdraw this clause.

COLONEL STANLEY observed, that he had not stated that, but had only said that he had no objection to leave out the words to which the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) objected, and to put in certain other words. He might observe that the proposal for branding did not emanate from him; but the provisions of the clause were necessary to meet the case of confirmed bad characters, and enable the authorities to deal with them.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON noticed that Clause 32 was headed "Offences in relation to enlistment," and another clause on page 51 was headed "Offences as to enlistment." He could see no

Q

Gentleman (Colonel Mure), who appeared to be raising a wholly different question.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it did not appear to him that that was the most convenient place for the observations of the hon. and gallant Member to be made, as they did not strictly relate to the subject-matter of the clause.

COLONEL MURE observed, that the subject was most important; and although, according to the ruling of the Chair, it could not then be brought forward, he hoped that it would be fully discussed on Report.

COLONEL ALEXANDER suggested that not only every soldier, but that every officer entering into a regiment should receive a mark. Every second lieutenant on joining, as well as every private, should be marked with the name of his regiment. A great misconception had arisen from the use of the word "branding;" but it was quite unnecessary to use that term. They had heard from the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) that it was absolutely necessary, on the first conviction for desertion, to mark with the letter D; but the court had power to abstain from so doing, if they thought there was sufficient reason. He would not at that point enter into the question of the advisability of using the letter D; but would only say that it was quite distinct from the use of a regimental mark. To the use of the letter D he did not think the House would ever again consent; but he did think it very necessary that every soldier should be marked with the name of his regiment.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR urged the Secretary of State for War to take into consideration the suggestions that had been so admirably urged by the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North). It would be well for a careful inquiry to be made into these matters.

MR. E. JENKINS was sorry that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was not at that moment in the House; but he was glad to see the Judge Advocate General in his place, as he would be able to reply to the observations which he had to make with regard to this clause. The more he considered this clause the less he liked it; and he thought the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) ought by that time to have had some weight, because the hon. and learned Member agreed in supporting this Bill, and was the Chairman of the Committee upon whose recommendations this Bill had been drawn. He wanted to point out to the Committee that this clause affected not every person subject to the Military Law, as the 13th did, but every person having become subject to Military Law. The object was that the military authorities might follow into civil life a man who had been discharged with ignominy; upon his release and entrance into civil life it was sought still to bring him under the provisions of the Act, and to subject him to a military court martial. Surely, the Bill was harsh enough as it stood, without the introduction of such extra punishment as the subjecting a man who had re-entered civil life to a court martial and a sentence of penal servitude. It seemed to him that this clause was perfectly gratuitous; for it provided severe and unnecessary punishment in the case of fraudulent enlistment, which offence was already provided for by another clause. He would take the sense of the Committee with regard to the maintenance of this clause; for the more he considered it the more he thought it was unnecessary, and unduly severe. It was merely an attempt, by imposing penal servitude, to endeavour to dissuade persons from committing crime. Because the organization of the Army was imperfect, and because the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, as he had admitted, found difficulties in registering the name of every person who had been dismissed the Service with ignominy, undue penalties of this sort were to be imposed. It was simply an attempt to prevent, by highly penal legislation, an offence which arose from the want of organization of the Army. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary must see that the clause was too severe; it was a clause against the general policy of legislation, and, indeed, it was admitted to be so. There was nothing in the present Mutiny Act or the Articles of War even remotely akin to it; and he would ask whether, in order to meet the difficulty of persons re-enlisting who had been discharged with ignominy, it was right to introduce a clause of such severity as this into an Act of Parliament? He could not think that this was justifiable; and he should deem it his duty to take the sense of the Committee upon the maintenance of this

Mr. E. Jenkins

LORD ELCHO agreed that the questions of desertion and enlistment were very important, and, in his opinion, should not be debated casually, but should be brought forward, as it was proposed to do, on Report. But whether right or wrong, as it at present existed, the enlistment question was most important, for it was at the root of the whole military system. For that reason he trusted that it would have a full and careful discussion. Judging from the reports from the different regiments, there was an absolute necessity that the Government should bring forward some proposition on this subject. With regard to the question of desertion, he should not have thought it necessary to make any remarks, but for some absurd statements which had been made. No doubt, the present prevalence of desertion in the Army was a scandal and a disgrace. In his opinion, there must be something very wrong in our military system which produced that state of desertion. His right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was at the head of a body not unlike the Army—he meant the body of the police. He heard no question raised as to desertion from the police, or as to the necessity of branding the police; and he could not but think that if they tried, by some means or other, they could get men into the Army of the character that there were in the police, and then there would be no question about branding. He was entirely opposed to any branding, and had voted against it on previous occasions. There was something to him absolutely repulsive in having to bolster up their military system by branding men like a herd of cattle; and, although they had been told by his hon. and gallant Friend behind him that they should not look upon branding as a disgrace, but that it should be turned into an element of honour by a Crown being affixed on some part of the person—he did not say back or front—of every man that enlisted, whether officer or private, yet that did not, in his opinion, shake his abhorrence of the system. He had no intention of enlisting as a private, nor was it ever likely that he should ever have a commission as a second lieutenant.

VOL. CCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

COLONEL ALEXANDER observed, that he had only suggested that the number of the regiment should be marked on each man.

LORD ELCHO said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman's proposal was that every man should have a number as a sort of convict badge. Now, although he was not likely to go into the Army, he might possibly have a son who would be a second lieutenant; and he should object not only to branding deserters, but still more so should he object, if their system was so bad that they had to brand both officers and privates. He objected to branding with the Crown, or anything else, for the purpose of catching deserters, men who could not be at present apprehended because of the faults of the system; and, a fortiori, he should object to any son of his being branded because he entered the Army. To say that to be thus marked with a Crown was an honour! A strange kind of honour founded in dishonour. For his part, he should raise his voice most emphatically against such a system. The matter ought to be dealt with in a very different way; and the subject was a larger one than could be discussed at that time, when the Bill ought to be proceeded with with all reasonable speed. When the subject was brought on he trusted that it would be discussed in a full House. If the question were dealt with in the way it had been suggested—namely, as a question of vaccination—he thought that some hon. Members would certainly raise very great objections to that.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON understood the Secretary of State for War to have said that he would withdraw this clause.

COLONEL STANLEY observed, that he had not stated that, but had only said that he had no objection to leave out the words to which the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) objected, and to put in certain other words. He might observe that the proposal for branding did not emanate from him; but the provisions of the clause were necessary to meet the case of confirmed bad characters, and enable the authorities to deal with them.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON noticed that Clause 32 was headed "Offences in relation to enlistment," and another clause on page 51 was headed "Offences as to enlistment." He could see no difference between these two; and it seemed to him unnecessary to deal with the offences in two places. With regard to the suggestions that had been made, by more than one hon. Member, with regard to branding—and it was nothing else—for officers and soldiers, he was glad to hear his right hon. and gallant Friend state that the proposal did not come from him; but he must ask the Committee to remember that that proposal had come from the Predecessor of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. When he proposed such a system, he (Sir Alexander Gordon) took the liberty of suggesting that he had better drop the question, inasmuch as it was a proposal that would not be acceptable to the House or to the country, and that, in effect, it was to put a mark on every man in the Army because he could not be trusted. The only reason for the proposal was that they could not trust their soldiers; and he hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman might be induced to change his present determination.

Q

Mr. MUNTZ did not remember its being proposed to brand every officer and soldier in the Army. There was some discussion as to branding deserters, and some hon. Member on that side of the House wisely suggested tattooing instead. He thought, however, that if they were to brand or tattoo every officer and soldier in the Army, they would do away with all self-respect, and he certainly could not agree to such a proposal. With respect to the provisions of this clause, everyone guilty of the offence of re-enlistment was to suffer penal servitude. That seemed to him a far more severe punishment than ought to be inflicted for any such offence; imprisonment with hard labour was the worst punishment that he considered should be inflicted. In the case of felony, and other serious crimes, penal servitude was properly inflicted; but it was too severe a punishment to award to every man enlisting again who had been discharged with ignominy.

COLONEL STANLEY explained that the punishment was to meet the case of men who had been discharged as utterly incorrigible, and who had, in all probability, passed the best part of their lives in prison, and who were in every way a nuisance to the regiment in which they had enlisted. Those were the men whose case was intended to be met by this clause—if he might use so strong a word, the case of the men who were the curse of the Army. He trusted the Committee would agree with him as to the necessity for this provision, and that they would consent to leave the words “penal servitude” in the clause. He did not, by any means, say that the punishment should always be inflicted; but it was necessary to have a stronger deterrent upon men who had passed five or six years in prison and enlisted over and over again, and who brought discredit on every regiment into which they came. He did not think that these men were too hardly dealt with if they suffered somewhat severely under this clause. The clause only applied, as the Committee would see, to men who had been discharged with ignominy, and as incorrigible and worthless.

Mr. E. JENKINS observed, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman seemed to forget that the clause applied not only to the Regular Forces, but to the Auxiliary Forces. Perhaps he would inform the Committee how it was possible for a man to be discharged with ignominy from the Volunteers? He stated that the clause was intended to apply to persons who had been dismissed as incorrigible; but the clause also applied to Volunteers. Perhaps the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would state whether that was correct or not? The clause seemed to him to be wider than was supposed.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) forgot that the Auxiliary Forces included the Militia. He did not say that this clause applied to the Militia generally, yet the men who continually committed this offence, when they found that their game was blown in the Line, after about 14 or 15 offences of fraudulent re-enlistment in the Regulars, turned their attention to the Militia. The clause was, doubtless, intended to meet their case. He did not think that the punishment of penal servitude was at all too great for such men. In a case that had occurred some years ago, a man, who had formerly held the rank of corporal, was dismissed, and he re-enlisted no less than 10 times in successive regiments. Such a case as that, in his opinion, showed the necessity of the clause.

Sir Alexander Gordon

usually undergone every other punishment before they were sentenced to penal servitude.

MAJOR NOLAN said, there was one case very well known, for it got into all the papers. A man—the case belonged to the Artillery—carried off some article from a shop. In fact, he wanted to be discharged; but the magistrate refused to convict him, as his object was extremely clear. He took the article in the sight of several persons. That was only one case out of many. Under this clause, a man might have a very good character, and yet be sent to penal servitude. He really did not see why they should impose so excessive a penalty as this, if they did not mean to enforce it. He did not think they would deter men from re-enlisting by this penalty.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the Committee was under a misapprehension as to the purport of this clause. It was supposed that this clause was to meet cases of repeated acts of desertion. It had nothing to do with that. It simply referred to the case of a man discharged from the Navy enlisting in the Army. It only met that case; and there was no law by which they could transport a man if he committed that offence. He believed three months' imprisonment was the most he could get. The House now proposed to increase that to penal servitude, and he should propose to insert imprisonment instead of penal servitude. He believed the discussion had been conducted under a wholly erroneous impression. It was not a case of repeated desertions that they were dealing with.

MR. MUNTZ said, five years' penal servitude was a severe punishment, and ought to be given only under exceptional circumstances; and if it was proposed to leave out the words "penal servitude," and substitute "two years' imprisonment with hard labour," he should have pleasure in voting for it.

MR. BULWER hoped the Committee would be careful what it was about in regard to this Amendment, which he trusted would not be carried. At the same time, he would point out that two years' imprisonment with hard labour was a punishment the severity of which was not sufficiently realized.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he would rather limit the punishment to imprisonment only, and he had moved an Amendment to that effect. Imprisonment must be confined to two years; whereas penal servitude might be given for life.

MR. E. JENKINS said, they had discussed this subject for a long time, but there was no sign of any concession from the front Bench. He wished to point out that this was an attempt to make the law more severe. That was clear. Suppose they were to adopt the Amendment, if his hon. and learned Friend looked to the next clause, he would find that any person making a false statement was liable to a very severe punishment. He wanted to know what was the object of bringing in this clause at all? It was said that it was to prevent persons discharged with ignominy re-enlisting in Her Majesty's Service. He could conceive the case of persons re-enlisting who might really become serviceable soldiers, and he could not see why this exceptional punishment should be introduced aimed at these persons. There was a want of organization in the Army itself, because a record was not kept, not only of those enlisted, but of those discharged with ignominy. It was said there was a difficulty, because in the Colonies and on foreign service these discharges occurred, and no record could be kept at home. That was no answer. A record could be kept, and ought to be sent home and registered; and he maintained that this was entirely an unnecessary clause. It seemed to him that it was an attempt to introduce a drastic remedy.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 93; Noes 35: Majority 58.—(Div. List, No. 94.)

MR. E. JENKINS said, he must repeat that he felt it his duty to protest against this clause. He was very sorry to say it; but it seemed to him that the front Bench on that (the Liberal) side appeared to have entered into the Lobby with the Ministers for the purpose of enforcing this clause. He said the front Bench; but he should rather say the remnants—the relics—of the front Bench had joined Ministers to force on the Committee this monstrous clause. It was an infamous clause, and he protested against it. He asked the Committee to consider what this clause really was. He referred them to Clause 13, Clause

96, and Clause 33; and he asked what could be the necessity of accumulating penalties? It seemed that the object was to subject a man to penal servitude, because, having been discharged with ignominy from the Service, he had once more enlisted; but the truth was, the object of this clause was to make up for the deficiency of the organization and administration of the Army; and he certainly should divide the Committee once more against the clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member had denounced everybody who differed from him in that House. As to what was said about the front Bench, his reply was this—that as the front Bench did not expect the hon. Member to follow them, the hon. Member should not expect the front Bench to follow him on this or other occasions. These things should be reciprocal, and he did not see how the hon. Member was entitled to expect the front Bench on this occasion to obey his behests. The hon. Member spoke of this clause as “infamous,” after it had received the sanction of a considerable majority. This showed a temper which the hon. Member was too apt to display, though ready to disclaim on all occasions.

MR. O’CONNOR POWER said, that, of course, any appeal made by the hon. and learned Member would receive weight; but it was his duty to observe that they had been debating a great many matters not referred to or included in the clause at all. During the absence of the hon. and learned Member, the Chairman had to interfere on more than one occasion in order to restrict the latitude which hon. Members had given themselves in discussing matters which had no reference to the clause. Now, they had just arrived at the discussion of the clause; and if he had sufficient authority, or perhaps audacity, he would venture to correct the hon. and learned Gentleman, and tell him that they had not been debating it three hours and a-half. It was only quite recently they had taken the matter up in earnest; the Committee had refused to limit the words “penal servitude;” and it appeared to him that if the words were not limited—if the word “imprisonment” were not inserted—they ought to limit the term of penal servitude which it was within the power of the courts martial to inflict. He therefore moved as an Amendment, to insert, after “penal servitude,” “not exceeding five years.”

THE CHAIRMAN ruled the Amendment out of Order.

MAJOR NOLAN said, 2,000 were discharged with ignominy every year for misconduct, and very possibly 100 of these might re-enlist; and if this clause was enforced they would give a great number of men a very heavy punishment. Of the 2,000, only 375 were discharged for “good conduct”—that was, discharged free. He believed they were entirely on the wrong road on this question. There was something rotten in the whole system; it was bad administration. It was not the fault of the present Secretary of State for War. What he had done was in the right direction; but there was bad administration.

COLONEL STANLEY neither denied nor accepted the figures given by the hon. and gallant Member.

MAJOR NOLAN said, they were from the public Returns.

COLONEL STANLEY said, it did not follow that the word “misconduct” would include misconduct with ignominy. It was sought to draw a contrast between the discharges which took place for disgraceful conduct and other discharges; but it would be found, when the Committee came to proceed farther on in their labours, that there was a clause allowing men to go to the Reserve, affording facilities for leaving the Service.

MR. E. JENKINS said, before the hon. and learned Member for Oxford left the Committee he must say a word or two with reference to the remarks he had thrown out. He certainly felt it to be his duty to refer to the fact that the front Bench on most important occasions was a vast hiatus. The hon. and learned Gentleman said there must be reciprocity, and that if he was expected to lead others must at least follow.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I beg pardon. I said the opposite.

MR. E. JENKINS: That if we expected him to lead, at least there must be some reciprocity, and we must follow those who lead. That would be true, if there was anything or anybody to lead.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member must have misunderstood me. I did not expect anything.

MR. E. JENKINS: Exactly. The hon. and learned Member is right. He ought not to expect anything, because there is no attempt at Leadership in any manner or form. And I did not venture to suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman was going to lead. That has not been his position heretofore, and the time is far distant, I suppose, when he will be in the position of Leader. The hon. and learned Gentleman—

Mr. E. Jenkins

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: I rise to Order, Mr. Raikes. I want to know whether the observations of the hon. Gentleman are in connection with the Business before the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN: No, they are not. The hon. Member's remarks have no reference to the matter before the Committee. At the same time, I must say that the hon. Gentleman is entitled to some latitude in replying to some remarks which have been made.

MR. E. JENKINS: I was only going to point out, as the question has been raised by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, that if we are to follow we must have someone to lead us. I think we ought to have Leaders occasionally present to show us what our duties are on the question of the day. The hon. and learned Member is a curled darling of the salons. He strolls down from Olympus with his hands in his pockets. A question comes up. He rises—

"Like some tall cliff that rears its awful form, Smiles from the vale, and midway leaves the storm!"

He—

"Assumes the God,
Affects to nod,
And seems to shake the spheres!"

We thirsty souls below the Gangway listen with reverence. He shakes his ambrosial curls and scatters on us a few drops of Olympian dew. We fancy he is Jove; but, in truth, we find he is only Ganymede; and yet he blames us if we do not happen to agree with him. I protest against this. I do not propose to be deterred from doing my duty by any remarks coming from the hon. and learned Member. Coming back to the question before us, I say that this is a drastic clause, and I feel it is a monstrous thing that such a clause as this should be allowed to remain in the Bill; but it seems that the Bill has been arranged or "squared" by the two front Benches, and that it is utterly useless for anyone else to say anything. I will not now divide the Committee, because I know it would not be of the slightest use; but I felt it my duty to make these few remarks. I must, however, point out that the clause makes the law more stringent than it is in the old Mutiny Act, Section 48. There a person must be charged with having wilfully made a false statement in answer to any question directed to be put to him by the proper authorities. This clause, which simply says "to have made a false statement," gave too wide a latitude, and it ought to be restricted within the words of the old Act. I will propose to insert the word "wilfully."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. E. JENKINS said, then they ought to follow the line of the Act, and insert the words "district or garrison."

Amendment moved, in page 14, line 32, after "by," to insert "district or garrison."—(Mr. E. Jenkins.)

COLONEL STANLEY did not see the necessity of inserting these words, as the words court martial would include them all.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT observed, that it would be inappropriate to adopt them, because that would be the old classification accorded to punishment. They put the words "district or garrison" in the old Act, in order to show the magnitude of the punishment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 33 (False answers or declarations on enlistment) agreed to.

Clause 34 (General offences in relation to enlistment).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked why different punishments were inflicted on the officer or non-commissioned officer who knowingly enlisted a man dismissed with disgrace from the Army, and that to which they subjected the man himself? The man was punished with penal servitude, while the others escaped with simple imprisonment. Yet, surely, the offence was greater in the officer or non-commissioned officer, and they ought to be punished at least as heavily as the man, who, perhaps, was induced to commit the offence by starvation, or, on the other hand, might be influenced by a genuine desire to reform his character. They had heard a good deal about one law for the rich and another for the poor; but it did appear to him that this was an instance in which the poor man was severely punished, while the rich man got off easily.

COLONEL STANLEY explained that penal servitude was inserted to meet the case of men of persistent bad character, for whom imprisonment had no terror.

MAJOR NOLAN hoped the Government would withdraw the clause. He thought they did wrong in proposing such a clause as Clause 32, and even now he hoped they would withdraw that also on the Report. It was much better to be right and a little inconsistent than to be wrong merely for the sake of consistency and of making the Bill a symmetrical Bill. He was afraid that desire for symmetry had gone too far.

MR. GOLDNEY added that a man might not exercise his reasoning powers enough in answering, and even this might subject him to this punishment.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON thought that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was a little in error, for Clause 32 was not framed to meet the case of desertion. It would apply to the single case of a man who had been dismissed from the Army. He offered himself to the sergeant, who knew he had been dismissed. He was liable to penal servitude, while the non-commissioned officer would only suffer imprisonment. He should like to move to leave out the words; but as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not accept them it was of no use.

MR. E. JENKINS asked if there was any objection to leave out the words "has reasonable cause to believe?" Supposing a man were brought before the court, how would it be proved that he "had reasonable cause to believe?"

THE CHAIRMAN: That cannot now be done. An Amendment has been made later in the clause, and it is not competent for the hon. Member to go back.

MR. PARNELL said, to make the clause tally with the Amendment of the previous clause, the words "or as objectionable" must be omitted.

Amendment moved, in page 15, line 3, after "disgrace," to leave out "or as objectionable."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Sir Alexander Gordon

Miscellaneous Military Offences.

Clause 35 (Traitorous words) agreed to.

Clause 36 (Injurious disclosures).

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR called attention to an important change which had been made in the clause, consisting of an addition which seemed to him to be a most dangerous one. A military person, according to the clause, in the course of a most harmless conversation on ordinary military questions which usually occupied the thoughts of officers and men in a campaign, as to the state and condition of the Army in regard to men and stores, might be accused of having produced, "or incurred the risk of producing," effects injurious to Her Majesty's Service. Frankly, that seemed to him a terrible opening for many a courts martial. He had served in a country where treachery was common, and where the contents of the magazines was most important, and naturally subject-matters for common talk at messes or private parties, yet he had never known it necessary to put in force the first part of the clause. But, certainly, it was a new thing that officers, for merely speaking to one another about the contents of the magazines or stores, should be charged with "incurring the risk of producing" injurious effects. This creation of new offences was very objectionable, and he would move the omission of the words.

Amendment moved, in page 15, line 25, after "produced," to omit "or incurred the risk of producing."—(General Sir George Balfour.)

COLONEL STANLEY, unless the Committee generally wished the words to be omitted, would prefer to retain them, because it seemed to him that the offence lay in the indiscretion, or in the wilful intention, rather than in the actual act. From a moral point of view, the offences were much the same. It was quite true that under the former Act greater latitude was given to a court martial; but, still, he should hesitate to withdraw the words.

MAJOR NOLAN observed, that the words in the old Act were "either verbally or in writing," leaving out the hypothetical case altogether. He remembered that very Article of War was discussed while he was at the Staff College, that an officer's letters and correspondence would come under it, except that it would be very difficult before a court martial to prove any injury. But if this clause were adopted as it stood, every single officer's letter written home, containing merely a statement where he was stationed or where his regiment was ordered to, would render him liable to a court martial. That was a rule which no country in the world had as yet introduced into its military law. It was, in fact, punishing a man for an hypothetical case. It would be very hard on officers, and might be twisted into a regular means of keeping the war correspondents in the power of the General. He did not suppose a newspaper correspondent, as a civilian, would come under the operation of this clause; or, if he did, that he would be in much danger, for the common sense of the country at home would protect him; and, still, a hasty General might use this power. It was a very serious proposal to introduce.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK could not agree that an offence of this kind should be actually committed before it was punished. That was the very thing they wanted to do. Their aim was that all persons with an Army in the field should feel the imperative necessity which lay upon them of, under no circumstances, making disclosures which might be injurious. Hon. Members forgot also that the court martial had discretion, and certainly would not allow the clause to be strained. The danger suggested was quite chimerical; and, for his part, he thought the caution and reticence imposed on every person by the clause was very wise and necessary.

MR. GOLDNEY said, the clause dealt with the case where a disclosure was made which would incur the risk of producing injurious effects. An ordinary letter could not come under that clause.

MR. HOPWOOD objected that the clause was new; and therefore a stronger case was required to justify the addition of it to the Bill than if it were a part of the old Act. Experience had shown that the clause, as taken from the old Act, was sufficient; and why, then, should these words be imported into it, which were so little susceptible of any definite legal meaning? But the objection was important on other grounds. They knew already that certain commanding officers objected to newspaper correspondents, and that, in some instances, they had appointed members of their own staff for the purpose. It must be true that that was so, or they could hardly have received the intelligence which had been published in some of the newspapers, from places where no civilian correspondent was allowed. But such an officer might inadvertently put something in his letter which might "incur the risk of producing injurious effects," although it by no means came within the positive words of the old clause. Again, there was nothing to designate wilful conduct in the clause, and a man, quite inadvertently, might do something which rendered him liable to this penalty. He did not think a case was made out for the alteration. The Army had done without it for a number of years, and he trusted it would not be pressed.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT admitted that the presumption was against the clause. But suppose a man did reveal a movement of the Forces which, if it reached its destination, would produce most injurious and destructive effects, and would ruin and destroy the whole of the Army, and his communication was intercepted before it reached its destination—should not that man be punished? Apparently not, according to the present law. It seemed to him that these words ought to be put in to meet that case. They could not protect themselves sufficiently by enacting that the man should be punished when the actual mischief was done.

MR. HOPWOOD was quite ready to admit the force of the illustration of his hon. and learned Friend; but, at the same time, he must point out that these words were so vague that they would include an entirely innocent act, which, though it had not, in fact, produced any mischief, might be prosecuted as having incurred the risk of doing so. He submitted that if the changes were to be made some more distinct words should be inserted.

MR. E. JENKINS wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that these words were really directed against newspaper correspondents. Under Clause 167, sub-section 8—

"All persons not otherwise subject to military law, who are followers of or accompany Her Majesty's troops, or any portion thereof, when employed on active service beyond the sea," were made subject to military law, and were, therefore, subject to this clause. [Admiral Sir WILLIAM EDMONSTONE: Hear, hear.] He was glad to hear the chronic cheer of the hon. and gallant Admiral; but he must remind him that this clause affected newspaper correspondents also. If it was not the intention of the Government that it should do so, it was the fault of the draftsman of the Bill, who certainly almost deserved hanging, for every single alteration in the Bill was made with the object of increasing the punishment. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: No, no.] He ought, of course, to withdraw that remark, if that was the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford. Still, he must point out that this clause differed from the clause in the Articles of War. The matter was left in the discretion of the court, but not in such a manner as to allow them to deal with the actual effects injurious to Her Majesty's Service alone. It was left to the military authorities, whose powers were really enlarged by other words which, extending the operation of this penal clause, he strongly objected to. The words were "or incurred the risk of producing," and might include a letter written by a man to his wife, and which she might foolishly publish in the newspapers. If the object of these words was to render the clause more severe than the Article of War, some good reason should be given for it.

MAJOR NOLAN thought the case proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) was provided for by the 5th clause of the Bill. If the Committee wished to go any further into that subject, he was prepared to move the insertion of the words "or intentionally calculated," which would meet the case of a man who meant to give information; but it rested with the Government to say why they meant to punish a man whether he intended to do so or not, and to give a very strong reason for the proposed alteration. He (Major Nolan) believed that the clause was directed against special correspondents; and if that were so, it would, in his opinion, be much better for the Government to state the fact. The Committee was aware that there were certain arguments in favour of a control being exercised over newspaper correspondents; but he thought that either fresh words should be inserted, or that the words "or incurred the risk of producing" should be left out.

MR. A. H. BROWN pointed out that this clause, although it included military correspondents in the words "every person subject to military law," and laid down the punishment to be awarded to officers and soldiers, did not provide, in any way, for punishment of a civilian, who, by writing to a newspaper, for instance, might produce an effect injurious to Her Majesty's Service. The clause, therefore, so far as newspaper correspondents were concerned, who were not subject to military law, was practically inoperative. He was certainly of opinion that, under this clause, no civilian who happened to be with the Army in the field could be punished for making any disclosure which would be injurious to Her Majesty's Service.

MR. STAVELEY HILL referred the hon. Member (Mr. A. H. Brown) to Clause 167, which included, as subject to military law, "all persons who are followers of or accompany Her Majesty's troops," &c.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON pointed out that if it was the intention to try newspaper correspondents by court martial, the Act did not make that provision. It was clearly a defect in the Bill to create an offence, as had very truly been pointed out, and then to omit all mention of the means of punishing those persons who committed it.

MR. MELDON thought the Committee ought not to be satisfied until they were clearly informed whether the clause was intended to meet the case of newspaper correspondents, or of officers' wives who might publish a letter from their husbands in the newspapers. This clause being penal, and creating a new offence heretofore unknown to the law, it lay upon the Government, clearly, to show some necessity, and produce evidence that the law, as hitherto existing, had not worked well. The argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had seemed to him at first sight to have a good deal of force in it. The case had been assumed by the hon. and learned Gentleman of a person writing a letter knowing that it would have a mischievous effect; and it was asked, why should that person not be punished?

Mr. E. Jenkins

The answer was, this was not the intention of the clause. The offence intended to be met was that of a person who never had any intention to write what would result mischievously towards Her Majesty's Forces. Therefore, there was no analogy between the cases of a person who committed a criminal act, and who should be punished under a clause for "giving information intentionally," and the case which was contemplated by the clause of a person unintentionally disclosing information which might produce effects injurious to Her Majesty's Service. It had not been shown that the existing law worked badly; and he did not think that it would be sufficiently safe for the Committee to proceed to the creation of a new offence upon mere surmise.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped the Committee would not assent to the doctrine that wrong-doing was not wrong-doing unless ill come of it. In this case, the court martial was called upon oath to decide that an offence had been committed in regard to the "Disclosure of the numbers or position of any Forces, or any magazines or stores thereof, or any preparations for, or orders relating to, operations or movements of any Forces, at such time and in such manner as in the opinion of the Court to have produced, or incurred, the risk of producing effects injurious to Her Majesty's Service.

He could see no other way than this by which the Service could be safeguarded. He would point out to the Committee that the whole circumstances of war had been so changed by the telegraph at the present day that information was forwarded from one point of the world to another with such rapidity that a person might very well produce effects injurious to the Service without intending to do so altogether. He hoped the Committee would not lose sight of the whole scope of the clause, which involved the honour and safety of the country in time of war. He did not think they were doing too much in demanding that persons should weigh well their words, and consider, before they published them, whether they would be likely injuriously to affect the Public Service.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, the argument used by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman did not apply to the present case; because, if a man placed an obstruction upon a railway, he did so with intent; but the object of the present clause was to get at persons who did not intend to produce the consequences desired to be guarded against. He was prepared to admit that cases of the kind contemplated should be provided against; but the manner of doing so required very careful consideration. The object should be to strike at those who intentionally offended, not at those who, though they offended, did so without intent. During the present Session attention had been called to the case of a correspondent who sent home a report of the proceedings of one of the Generals engaged in the Afghan War, and hon. Members all knew what was alleged to be the consequences of that report. Unless the clause was modified, when the Bill became law, hon. Members would find on taking up the newspapers that no reliance could be placed on the reports of correspondents, because it would be felt that they were awed by the commanding officer from giving any description of tactics, or, indeed, anything of real interest relating to the Army in time of war. This was an extraordinary position in which to place the country at home. But the better way was to say nothing about the necessity of providing against the case at all; for it was well known that everyone admitted to the camp was, of course, more or less under military discipline. He did not go the length of saying that because a man was a newspaper correspondent he should have the right of doing and saying whatever he pleased, quite independently of the Military Code. He could not suppose that any General, having regard to the success of the Forces under his command, would admit correspondents into his camp without placing them under some regulations and some restrictions; but he said that the way in which it was intended to deal with offences of the kind referred to would be injurious to the interests of the country, and would deprive people at home of any reliable or authentic information of what was going on.

MR. BULWER thought, on reading the clause, that it would not meet the views of hon. Members opposite; but he did not think, even if the wording was altered, that the clause should be restricted in any way, so as to fall short of the intention of Gentlemen on his side of the House. He would suggest that the substitution of the following words would meet the view of the Committee:—

“And thereby, in the opinion of the court, produces, or attempts to produce, effects injurious to Her Majesty's Service.”

No one would desire that a person should be punished for having produced injurious effects, perhaps, with the most innocent intention possible.

MR. PARNELL did not think the clause, even if altered, would be satisfactory, so far as regarded newspaper correspondents. It must not be forgotten that the clause was an adaptation of an old Article of War, which had been altered and made more stringent; and at last it had been made to include in its provisions men for whom it was originally in no way intended. He thought that if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman really wished to deal with the case of newspaper correspondents, he should introduce a separate clause for that purpose. Whatever clause it might be necessary to pass with regard to the control of newspaper correspondents, and preventing them making important disclosures, they should be treated as a special class, and be controlled by a special clause; for by subjecting them to the same operation of the same clauses as those which applied to soldiers, they placed them in a position in which no newspaper correspondent ought to be placed. By all means, exact sufficient guarantees that military operations should not be injuriously affected by the articles of newspaper correspondents; but not by the application of the present clause.

MR. E. JENKINS thought that the clause could not have received sufficient consideration from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. The question appeared to him to be whether, by the passing of this clause, the object in view, which was to prevent newspaper correspondents from satisfying prurient curiosity, would be attained. He thought not; for it would be remembered that during the Russo-Turkish War, the Czar ordered that no newspaper correspondents should go to the front, with this result—that even he found that it was absolutely necessary to yield to public opinion, and let them accompany the Army. In that case, it was perfectly certain that information came from the Turkish Army which was read in the Russian Army, and vice versa. He thought the best regulation for correspondents of the Press was to put them on their honour. But if the clause, as at present, remained in the Bill, he put it to the Committee whether such men as Archibald Forbes would enter a camp, and whether he would not telegraph home all the information he wanted to send without placing himself under the operation of the Act? The points raised seemed to him to be of such importance that, in view of the discussion which was coming later on, he would move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”—(Mr. Edward Jenkins.)

COLONEL STANLEY said, the issue was a comparatively small one, and he trusted that the Committee would come to a decision upon the words—whether they were to stand part of the Bill or not.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR pointed out that the Duke of Wellington was placed in the same difficulties with regard to correspondence from Spain—not only subordinate officers, but officers of very high rank were known to have expressed their opinions about the Army and its stores in a manner far from satisfactory either to the Duke or to the nation; but instead of trying to punish the writers he appealed to their good sense, and pointed to the fact that much of the information obtained by Napoleon was got from letters sent home from the Army. The disordered state of the Crimean Army and its dangerous condition were all pointed out in private letters, and thereby saved from the impending destruction. As it was now 11 o'clock, he hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would agree to report Progress, according to the arrangement made earlier in the evening.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I said I would report Progress; but, of course, I could not fix the time to a few minutes; that would depend upon the progress made. We do not propose to go beyond this clause, which, I understand, has been under discussion for a considerable time; but I think it is only fair and reasonable that the present clause should be finished.

Mr. Bulwer

MR. O'CONNOR POWER submitted that the arguments put forward against this important clause had not been answered. He supported the Motion to report Progress.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK suggested the insertion of the word "wilfully," before "discloses."

SIR HENRY JAMES thought, as the point raised was obviously a difficult as well as a delicate one, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would do well to re-consider the clause and bring it up on Report.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 38; Noes 146: Majority 108.—(Div. List, No. 95.)

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?"

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, the clause had attracted much attention during the Division, and several hon. Members, who had just entered the House, had expressed their wish to state their opinions upon the subject. He therefore hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in order to keep his engagement with the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), would support the Motion which he then made that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. O'Connor Power.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, there was really some difficulty with regard to the wording of the clause; and as at about that hour it had been agreed that another measure of considerable importance should be introduced, he did not think the Government would gain much by going on with the clause. If some time were spent in considering how the Government could amend or deal with the clause the time would not be wasted.

COLONEL STANLEY said, if the clause were agreed to he would assent to the omission of the words in question, on the understanding that words of a similar meaning should be introduced on Report.

MR. HOPWOOD could not assent to such a bargain as that.

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that in that case he could not agree to the omission of the words.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think hon. Members opposite must have seen that there is every desire, on the part of the Government, to afford them facilities for expressing their views upon this Bill; and, therefore, I think the proposal of my right hon. and gallant Friend is very fair and reasonable. It was understood, at the beginning of the evening, that we should endeavour to report Progress about this time, in order to allow the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) to bring forward his measure, and it was right that such understanding should be acted upon. I hope we shall be allowed to finish this clause; but the difficulty raised is one which appears to render further consideration desirable; and what my right hon. and gallant Friend proposes is that the words objected to should be omitted for the present, and that he should consider the Amendment to be brought up on Report.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER confessed himself ashamed to enter into any such bargain. He was, however, willing to withdraw his Motion that the Chairman leave the Chair.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that why he had objected to the proposal as it was at first made was because, if the Committee assented to its terms, it must be taken to agree to the clause in substance, in which case all the arguments of the evening would have been wasted. He had deemed it right to state that he, for one, could not be bound in that manner.

MAJOR O'GORMAN wished to say that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not in any way fulfilled his promise to the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don); but with regard to the main subject he also desired to say a few words. He begged leave to point out that it must be all the same to an Army whether it was cut to pieces in consequence of news published to the world by guilty hands, or whether it was destroyed through information derived from innocent parties. Therefore, he maintained that both those people who were really culpable, and those who might not seem to be culpable, should receive precisely the same punishment; and that all information as to proceedings of the Army in the field, which might be made use of by the enemy, should be utterly repressed by law issuing from the House of Commons.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

M O T I O N .

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE O'CONOR DON, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill upon University Education, Ireland, said, his first duty was to thank the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for affording him an opportunity of making the Motion he was about to make at an earlier hour than he himself could command. He felt that in making this Motion, and in asking leave to introduce a Bill dealing with University Education in Ireland, he was undertaking a great responsibility. The question was one which had baffled the greatest statesmen, and had tried the strength of the strongest Governments; and at first sight it might seem extreme folly for any private Member to attempt to deal with it. Yet, perhaps, in this, the apparent weakness of the instrument, consisted its real strength; and although he and those who were associated with him had no strong Party at their back, yet, on the other hand, they had no prejudices to conciliate or to fear, and if they were wanting in the strength possessed by a strong Government, they were freed from the anxiety lest their action in the matter should break up their majority and destroy their strength. In addition to that, they possessed the no small advantage that the Bill they introduced was of no Party character, and that its success or failure could not in any way affect Parties in the House; and, consequently, all temptations to raise difficulties, in order to accomplish Party triumphs, were taken away. It was, fortunately, not necessary for him to enter at any length into a consideration of the urgency of the question. The want of legislation had long been admitted, and had been recognized by almost every Government that had come into power during the last 20 years; and the numerous attempts which had been made to settle it, whilst they proved the inherent difficulties connected with the question, established equally incontrovertibly the necessity for legislation. The position of affairs which, six years ago, had been declared to be scandalously bad, continued to be as scandalous to the present day; and if any change at all had taken place, that change tended rather to increase and intensify the inequalities than to remove them. Fortunately, also, it was not necessary for him to argue that a settlement was demanded by all sections of the Catholic community in Ireland; and although he remembered the time when it used to be asserted that no grievance existed on this subject except a clerical grievance, that assertion would no longer be made. Two very remarkable documents had been lately laid on the Table of the House, one emanating from the Catholic community in Ireland, and bearing 1,100 names that no one could deny represented the wealth, respectability, and intelligence of Catholic Ireland; the other coming from the other side of the Atlantic, and attesting the results which had arisen there in the Dominions of Her Majesty from an honest and successful attempt to meet demands similar to those which now came, and for years had come, from Catholic Ireland. These two documents took away all necessity for entering on any elaborate arguments to prove that the demand for a change existed, or that an honest endeavour to meet it would be unsuccessful. He had said that if the state of things had at all altered since 1873, the alteration had been in the direction of increasing rather than diminishing the necessity of dealing with the subject. Last Session an Act had been passed which could not be left to stand alone. Last Session the Government introduced a measure, and successfully carried it, which would immensely increase the demand for University Education, and would intensify the injustice which arose out of the present state of things. He was happy to say that the Irish Intermediate Education Act had turned out a great success. Already the Board had received a large number of applications from candidates for examination, and of these a considerable number were students in the senior grade, who would be turned out on the world next summer ready for entering on a University career, and aided impartially by the State in bringing them up to this point. But under what conditions would they be then left? Some of them would be able to take advantage of existing University institutions; others, holding conscientious convictions which would prevent their adopting that course, would have to stand back, would have to terminate their educational career, and give up all the advantages which their more fortunate and more favoured rivals could enjoy. He asked in what state would these young men find themselves, or what would be their feelings? Hitherto their conscientious convictions had not interfered in any way with their progress or their success; and whether they attended a Protestant school, or a Catholic school, or a purely secular school, all the advantages of the Intermediate Education Act were thrown open to them, and the institutions which successfully instructed them were treated equally impartially by the State. In a couple of months the first fruits of the Intermediate Education Act would be reaped, the necessity for further facilities being given for the attainment of the advantages of University Education would be made more painfully evident, and the inequalities at present existing more clearly demonstrated. They had all hoped, before the commencement of the present Session, that the Government would deal with the question. Everything pointed in this direction. The success of the Bill of last year; the promises with which it had been introduced; the remarkable statements of the Lord Chancellor in "another place;" the admission which he there made that the Bill he was introducing represented merely the walls of the edifice, and that the roof, in the shape of a University Bill, would have to be put on hereafter—led all to believe that the edifice, so successfully built up to the roof, would not be left long uncovered, especially when it was to be inhabited immediately, and when, within the year, the want of the roof would be made manifest to many of those who had entered it. In addition to that, there were various other indications that the subject was one that was to be dealt with. Mysteriously suspicious articles began to appear in some of the public journals. Journals known to be in the confidence of the Ministry began to develop a remarkable interest in the question. Admissions began to be made which went so far in recognizing the justice of previous demands as almost to startle such an old upholder of these demands as himself, and everyone became convinced that the Government had really determined to grapple with the question. In addition to this, rumours were circulated that negotiations—or, if that word were objected to, he would say informal communications—were opened between certain Representatives of the Government and others who represented certain Catholic views on the question; and although these rumours might not have been fully justified, or the articles in the journals might have been strained beyond their legitimate significance, yet he thought he would not be altogether wrong in saying that the belief that the Cabinet did intend to deal with the question was not altogether unfounded. However, shortly before the Session opened, the aspect of affairs completely changed. The journals seemed to receive new inspirations. What was believed just and expedient and possible a few months before became fraught with difficulties and dangers, and the existence of the injustice, or the necessity for removing it, became matters of apparently much less consequence. It was under these circumstances that the Session opened. The total absence of all reference to this important subject in the enumeration of the Government proposals induced his hon. Friend the Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue) to press the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the point, and then it was authoritatively announced that the Government would not deal with it. Under these circumstances, what was to be done? The subject could not be allowed to drop without at least a protest, or an attempt at a settlement. Immediately the man who had most right to speak, whose authority in regard to it was most universally respected, and whose loss was so generally deplored in the House—he meant his hon., learned, and lamented Friend the late Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt)—gave Notice of two Motions—the one a Resolution, the other a Bill. Shortly after, he was struck down with that illness which since had proved so fatal; and it became evident that even if the recovery which was then so much looked forward to took place, yet for a long time he would not be able to take his place in the House, or to follow up his Motions. After waiting a little to see whether his hon. and learned Friend was likely soon to rally, he (the O'Connor Don) was pressed to take the Motion up, as delay could no longer be permitted. At length, he consented to do so. In doing so, he was quite alive to the difficulties of the position—difficulties immensely aggravated by the unfortunate illness of his hon. and learned Friend. There was no man more capable of dealing with this subject than he was; no man who took a greater interest in it; no man who more thoroughly understood it in all its bearings. A distinguished University student—a man whose whole career, as a student, as a Professor, as a member of the Governing Body of a University, marked him out for peculiar fitness in devising University legislation; his withdrawal by illness was about as great a blow as the withdrawal of the Government itself; and he felt, and he was sure almost all other hon. Members felt, that if the difficulty of the situation was great before, it became doubly great when they were all deprived of the wise counsels and experienced advice of the great Irishman who had lately been taken from them. They were, however, fortunate in one respect. Before his hon. and learned Friend was struck down with that illness which, during the last few months, prevented his giving any attention to public affairs, he had committed to paper some views as to the way in which this question ought to be approached. To a certain extent, they had the benefit of his opinion; and he was sure he was not weakening his case for the Bill when he stated that those who drew it up had been materially aided by the suggestions of Mr. Butt, and that, to a very great extent, and so far as those opinions were known, his hon. and learned Friend's views and opinions were followed in the drafting of the Bill. The first question which those interested in the matter had to consider was, whether they would proceed by Resolution or by Bill. Many arguments might be adduced in favour of the former course; but, as he did not wish unnecessarily to occupy the attention of the House, he would not touch on them. Eventually, they decided to proceed by a Bill, and they came to that determination mainly for two reasons—first, because they really meant business, because they really desired to have the question settled, and because they believed it could be settled. Secondly, because they did not want that it should be any longer said that their strength consisted in objecting, and that they did not know what they wanted, or how to form a scheme to carry out what they wanted. If they desired merely a discussion, if they wished merely to put on record a further protest, a Resolution would evidently be the best course to adopt. It was obvious, he thought, that if they had no chance of carrying a measure, placing their views in the definite shape of a Bill would be a very hazardous experiment; and, therefore, in adopting that course, they gave an earnest of the sincerity of their wish to settle the question, and an earnest of the sincerity of their belief that it could be settled this Session. In framing the Bill the same object was kept in view, and they had made its provisions as moderate and reasonable as they possibly could, seeking for nothing but what the absolute necessities of the case demanded. He wished to say, in the outset, that this Bill was not his Bill, in the sense of being his own personal proposal; it was not the Bill exclusively of the community to which he belonged; it was a measure arrived at by communications with Friends on both sides of the House, holding the most opposite political views. It was essentially a compromise, arrived at after mutual concession, and must not be taken in any sense as embodying the separate views of the Roman Catholics, or containing all that they believed they were justly entitled to. In speaking of his action in the matter, he had used the plural number, and he had done so advisedly; and when he mentioned, as he would shortly do, the names of the hon. Members who were joined with him in its introduction, he thought the House would be of opinion that he had rightly used the plural number, and that the Bill was deserving of every attention that could be given to it. In attempting to deal with the question in the shape of a Bill, naturally, the first point they had to consider was, whether they would at all touch existing institutions, whether they would endeavour to open and enlarge their spheres, to re-cast their constitutions, and make them embrace other and newer bodies within their fold. He himself entertained a very strong feeling in favour of that course. Theoretically, the arguments in favour of it were irresistible. They had been urged, he need not say most eloquently, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich in 1873; and he was bound to say that, if practicable, the establishment of one great National University for Ireland was the solution that would most please him. But they had to look to what was practicable; and, certainly, in the hands of private Members, a Bill for destroying the University of Dublin and the Queen's University, re-casting their constitutions, and building out of them a new institution, would be, to say the least of it, impracticable. What the late Government and the right hon. Gentleman had failed to bring about they might be forgiven for declining to attempt. But if they could not deal with the two existing Universities, might they not deal with one or other of them? Might they not take the older and grander of these two institutions, and try to mould it so as to meet the requirements of the country? His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Butt) had tried to do this, and he, too, had failed. He (the O'Connor Don) had the honour of being associated with him in that attempt, and he could not but admit its absolute failure. There then remained the other alternative, of taking the Queen's University and re-modelling it—abolishing it, in the first instance, and re-constituting it on another basis; and as this proposal had formed the subject of much discussion, he would be obliged to consider it at more length. He admitted that there were many arguments to recommend it, and if the subject were to be dealt with by a Government, he thought that probably that was the line of settlement they ought to look to. But, as private Members, they felt enormous difficulties in their way, if they attempted completely to upset and transform any existing institution, no matter how weak it might apparently be. The moment any existing institution was touched, that moment a whole host of little private interests came into play, and opposition was created which no private Member could hope to cope with. Besides that, he wished hon. Gentlemen, who believed that the abolition of the Queen's University was the proper course to adopt, to remember some of the difficulties they would have to encounter. They could not, of course, propose to destroy the Queen's Colleges, and absolutely to disendow them; and if they continued endowed, as they now were, how could equality be established between them and unendowed Collegiate institutions? Or, even if this difficulty could be got over, there remained the important question of the government of the new University. What were they to do with the existing Senate, or Governing Body of the Queen's University? Were they to abolish it, and if they were, were they to abolish the principles on which it was constituted? They should remember that one of the principles of its constitution was election; that it had amongst its members gentlemen elected by the graduates of the University; and if they abolished the existing Body and its elected members, would they also abolish the principle of election? Could they take away from the graduates the rights which, under Royal Charter, they possessed; or was it desirable, even if they could do so, to destroy the principle of representation? On the other hand, if it were not destroyed, how could equality be established? For years and many generations of students the inequality would exist, not merely as to pecuniary matters, for that inequality might possibly be redressed; but as to representation on the Governing Body, and for many generations the students of the Queen's Colleges would have absolute control over the whole elective representation on the Governing Body of the University. The truth of the matter was, there were inherent difficulties in the way of amalgamating old and new institutions, and, small as had been the success of the Queen's Colleges, yet, with their 35 years' start, and their hundreds of fully-finished graduates, it would be a difficult task to place absolutely new institutions on terms of equality with them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had, in 1877, most eloquently portrayed the disadvantage of establishing a new University. He had pictured to them the new University lagging behind its older and more favoured rivals, lame and halting. He (the O'Connor Don) could not deny the truth and force of his picture; but would it not be merely a transformation of personages and a change of name, if they attempted to set up side by side in the same University new Colleges, unendowed and unsupported, devoid of prestige, wanting in all the advantages arising out of the influence of old students, and, having set them up, if they asked them to compete with, and to be on terms of equality with, their older and more favoured rivals? Would they not have the new Colleges lagging behind, lame and halting, and would not the injustice and the inequality, which was to be remedied, be only the more apparent by bringing into such close contact the institutions so differently treated? For these reasons, then, they had come to the conclusion that whatever Government might do, or whatever might be hereafter done, they had no course open to them but to propose the erection of a new University, and to leave all existing institutions as they were. In adopting that course, they were fortified—very strongly fortified—by the opinion of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Butt), who, before he was struck down by illness, had placed his views on this point on record, and had very clearly expressed his opinion that it would be a great mistake to attempt a settlement of the University Question on the lines of a reconstruction of the Queen's University. He (the O'Connor Don) would next proceed to consider what they proposed should be the constitution and functions of this new University. It was to consist of a Chancellor, Vice-Chancellor, and a certain number of senators. The total number fixed in the Bill was 24. The Chancellor, Vice-Chancellor, and other senators were to constitute the Senate of the University. They proposed that the first Senate should be named in a Schedule to the Bill. For obvious reasons, that Schedule would be presented to the House a blank. Of course, no gentleman could be asked to allow his name to be placed in it until the main provisions of the Bill had received the sanction of Parliament. Besides, neither he nor those who were associated with him desired to take on themselves the selection of the names; they wished to leave that in the hands of the Government. If it were thought more expedient, they would not press to have the names given at all in the Schedule; but would leave the selection to be a subsequent act performed by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He did not believe they could leave the selection in better hands than those of the present Lord Lieutenant, than whom no man took a deeper interest in the settlement of the question, and in whom every class in Ireland that would be affected by the Bill had the greatest confidence. But if the House desired, as they had done in regard to the Intermediate Education Act, to learn the names of the Senate before the Bill was passed, it seemed to him that it would be more in accordance with precedent to enter the names in the Schedule. They proposed, in the next place, to constitute a body to be called Convocation, and they created it on the same lines as Convocation was created in the London University. In filling up vacancies on the Senate caused by deaths or resignations, they proposed to follow the precedent of the Queen's University. They proposed that one-fourth of the Body should be elected by Convocation, and that until the full number of elected members—namely, six, was reached, every alternate vacancy should be filled by the Crown and by election. After the full number was reached, they then proposed that on the resignation or death of an elected member his place should be filled by election, and that all other vacancies should be filled by the Crown or the Lord Lieutenant. To the Senate thus formed they proposed to give very ample powers. In a general way, they proposed to intrust to them the carrying out of the intention of the Act—namely, the promotion of University Education in Ireland; but, following out the precedent of the Intermediate Education Act, they proposed to indicate the particular mode in which such education should be promoted—namely, by holding examinations for Matriculation and for Degrees; by granting Exhibitions, Scholarships, and Fellowships, and other rewards, to successful students; and by granting result fees and other advantages to the Colleges producing them. They proposed that the University should be divided into four Faculties—the Faculty of Arts, the Faculty of Medicine, the Faculty of Law, and the Faculty of Engineering. The Arts course they fixed at four years, and, including the Matriculation examination, they proposed that there should be five examinations for all students who went through the complete course. At the end of the third year they proposed that the degree of B.A. should be attainable; and for such students as went in for the Master's Degree they proposed that another examination should be held at the end of the fourth year, when the degree of M.A. would be conferred on those proving worthy of receiving it. Following, then, the precedent of the Intermediate Education Act, they proposed that for every 10 students who passed the Matriculation examination, one Exhibition should be assigned of the value of £20, to be held for the three years' course, up to the taking of the degree of B.A., provided the student continued his University course for that time; at the end of the first year's course they proposed that for every 10 students who passed, one Exhibition of the value of £30 should be assigned, said Exhibition to last during the second and third years of the course; at the end of the second year's course, they proposed that Scholarships of the value of £50 a-year for three years should be granted in the proportion of one for every 10 students, to be retained on the condition that the scholar obtained his degree of B.A. at the end of the third session, and his degree of M.A. at the end of the fourth year. In addition to these Exhibitions and Scholarships, they proposed that a certain limited number of Fellowships should be established. They suggested 20, to be held for five years, and to be given away in the following manner:—Four of them to be competed for each year at the examination for the degree of B.A.; so that in the fifth year the full number of 20 would be complete; and as the term of the holders of the first four would then terminate, there would be four vacancies to be filled up in the following year, and subsequently, in this manner, the full number of 20 would be always kept up, provided there were competent students seeking them. To the holding of these Fellowships certain conditions were to be attached. To retain his Fellowship, the Fellow should take out his degree of M.A. in the following year, and he should be resident in or attendant at, or a Tutor or Professor in an affiliated College for the remaining four years, or by the special authority of the Senate, he should spend the remaining four years in the pursuit or promotion of science or literature, in any manner the Senate might determine. They proposed also that there should be Exhibitions in the other three Faculties. An Exhibition of £20 for every 10 students who passed in the Faculty of Law, to be held for the three years of the Law course; a similar Exhibition in the Faculty of Medicine, to be held for four years; and a similar one, in Engineering, to be held for three years; the attainment of these Exhibitions, and their retention, to be dependent on the students passing all the necessary examinations in a satisfactory manner, and with sufficient merit. These were the chief proposals they had to make with regard to rewards to the students themselves. He now approached a much more difficult branch of the subject—namely, the assistance in the way of pecuniary grants to the institutions which produced the students. They did not propose that the new University should itself be in any sense a teaching University. At the same time, they thought that it should be something more than a mere Examining Board, that its functions should be more extended, and that, although not undertaking teaching itself, it should strive to promote and directly assist higher education and teaching in other and independent institutions. The real want they had most to meet was the want of good Professors in the unendowed Colleges. No solution of the University Question could be satisfactory which did not supply this want; and if they were not prepared directly to recognize or to endow distinct Colleges, which would be carried on in accordance with the religious convictions of a vast number of people, yet they must in some shape or form supply the want, and enable these independent institutions to secure the teaching power so absolutely necessary. Under the Intermediate Education Act, one means of meeting this difficulty existed. By the payment of results fees to the heads of those institutions, a means was afforded to them for providing in some way for the want; but it would be a mistake to apply this system just as it stood in the Intermediate Act to University Education. There was one essential difference between University Education and the intermediate and primary school education. For the former, they required Professors of the very highest class—men who could not be got without paying them very well, and who, when got, should not have their time thrown away on a mere handful of students. Were they, then, to adopt the system of paying result fees to every institution in the country which sent up University students, they would probably be doing more harm than good. They would be dividing and scattering over the country the literary strength, which, to accomplish any real good, should be united, and they would be rendering the establishment of University training, or of any College which could in the true sense pretend to be a University College, impossible. The consequence would be that they would have a few scattered students from almost all the large intermediate schools; but the results fees received by any particular institution would be far too small to do any real good towards University teaching or towards securing the services of competent Professors; and whilst they would do little or no good to the institutions receiving them, they would prevent the establishment of real Colleges, in which a sufficiently large number of students would be collected to render it possible to secure the services of the best Professors, and thus injury, instead of benefit, might be the result of the experiment. For these reasons, they had come to the conclusion that the pecuniary advantages to be conferred on institutions or Colleges should be confined to a few, and that the result fees and other advantages to which he would presently allude should be restricted to a limited number of Colleges, to be selected or affiliated by the Senate. For the purpose of affiliation, they proposed to define a College in such terms as would exclude—First, all the Colleges of existing Universities; second, all institutions in receipt of result fees under the Intermediate Education Act; and, third, all institutions which had a smaller number than 20 students over the age of 18 years pursuing the course of study prescribed by the Senate for examinations under the Act. Any College complying with the latter condition, and not being an intermediate school or College in connection with an existing University, would be eligible for affiliation by the Senate. No doubt, some objections might be raised to the proposed exclusion of the intermediate schools, and it might be said that whenever pupils distinguished themselves those who taught them ought to be rewarded; but, after much consideration, they had come to the conclusion that there would be no hardship in requiring the heads of any educational institution to determine whether they would class that institution as a school or a College; and if they selected the former and reaped the advantages derivable from it, they had no right to come under a University Bill and claim the rights of Colleges there. They proposed not to interfere in any way with the students. These might come from any school or College, or no school or College; they would be equally treated, and no difference would be made in their regard. With regard to results fees, they did not propose that any should be paid on the Matriculation examination. Until the student had passed that examination, the University training or teaching had not commenced; and, consequently, the institution whence he came was entitled to no payment. After the first session of the University course, they proposed that payments should be made on the following scale:—In the first year, for a simple pass £20, for a pass with honours £30. In second year, for a simple pass £25, and a pass with honours £35. On taking the degree of B.A., for a simple pass £30, and a pass with honours £40; and on taking the degree of M.A., for a simple pass £35, and a pass with honours £45. Besides this, they proposed that when students from any College had taken either Exhibitions, Scholarships, or Fellowships, the College should receive in each such case double the amount of results fees. They also proposed similar results fees in the professional Faculties of Law, Medicine, and Engineering. At first sight, perhaps these results fees might appear large; but when it was recollected that, according to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, every student educated in the Queen's College, Galway, cost the State £77 a-year, and every one carried on to a degree in Arts cost £231, whilst every graduate in Law cost £308, he thought the amount would appear insignificant. At all events, he need scarcely say that the actual amounts were matters of detail. He was not absolutely bound to them; but he hoped that if Parliament were disposed to approve of the principle, it would not attempt to carry it out in a niggardly spirit. He now came to another important proposal in the Bill. Remembering that the real want they had to supply was a good and efficient teaching staff, and that it would be desirable to secure the services of the best possible Professors in secular subjects, they proposed to meet the want in another way besides the results fees. After all, the results fees pre-supposed the existence of the Professors, an assumption on which they could not safely proceed, for it was not founded on fact. University Education in Ireland could not really be promoted, unless this assumption was turned into a fact, and he thought it might be done without any departure from the principles on which alone they sought public aid. He believed there would be no departure from these principles in giving power to the Senate to pay salaries, not exceeding a certain limited amount, to a limited number of Lecturers or Professors in secular subjects, who should be bound to lecture or profess in some one of the affiliated Colleges, and who might be presented to the Senate from such College, provided that there should be only one such University Professor on any given subject of the University course in any one College, and provided also that such Professor should have at least 15 students attending his lectures. This, he was bound to say, they considered was a point of the greatest importance. It was almost essential in the commencement, in order to give new institutions a start; and as they did not object to any provision being inserted to secure that the money so given should be spent on purely secular teaching, and, if necessary, that the lectures should be open to students of all religious denominations, he trusted that this proposal might find favour with the House. These were the main provisions so far as grants in aid of University Education went. There were one or two minor provisions for permitting the Senate to give assistance towards the erection of laboratories, museums, and libraries in affiliated Colleges; but he did not think it was necessary to dwell on them in detail. The next point they had to consider was, what would be the probable amount required for carrying out this scheme, and whence it was to come? As to its amount, he believed that, at least in the commencement, it would not be nearly as much as might at first be imagined. They believed, from calculations that had been made, that £30,000 would amply cover all expenses; but they proposed in this respect, also, to follow the precedent of the Intermediate Education Act, and to leave the amount to be estimated by the Senate, limiting it so that it should not exceed a certain sum. In fixing this limit, he felt sure the House would not desire to proceed in a niggardly spirit; and when they remembered that close on £50,000 a-year, in one shape or other, was spent on the Queen's University and Colleges, he did not think it would be unreasonable to ask that a capital sum of £1,500,000 should be set aside for the purposes, if necessary, of the new University; and he need scarcely add that that capital sum they proposed to take from the same fund which had already been marked out and selected by the Government for an almost exactly similar purpose last year. They proposed, in fact, in this Bill, exactly similar finance clauses to those in the Bill of last year, merely substituting the Senate for the Board, and increasing the limit from £1,000,000 to £1,500,000. He had now gone over all the main provisions of the Bill, and he would endeavour to close his remarks as speedily as possible. He had said in the commencement that the Bill was not his Bill. He had spoken throughout in the plural number; and when he told the House that there were associated with him in the introduction of the measure the hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlow County (Mr. Kavanagh), his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), the noble Lord the Member for Waterford County (Lord Charles Beresford), the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw), and the hon. Member for the County of Meath (Mr. Parnell), he thought he had said enough to prove that the Bill possessed no Party tendencies, and that it was one which was likely to receive the support of nearly all the Irish Representatives, and certainly one deserving of the greatest attention which the House and the Government could give to it. They offered the Bill not as a final one, or as of a large and comprehensive character. They believed it would be a step in the right direction, which, if passed, might render it more possible hereafter to deal with the question on the large scale suggested in 1873 by the late Government. He would himself desire to see an amalgamation of Universities, and the establishment of one great National University for Ireland; but, strange as it might seem, he believed that result might be facilitated rather than impeded by the establishment of a new University now. It would be very difficult, he thought, to unite together Bodies starting on terms of inequality, and to place together, under the same University, endowed and unendowed Colleges—old and new institutions—Colleges with a large number of ready-made graduates, and Colleges without such. The inequality apparent in the commencement must for generations exist, and the injustice apparent in such inequality must always offer one of the greatest obstacles to such a settlement. They presented the Bill also as a reality, as something they desired not merely to discuss, but to carry. Of course, he knew that private Members could not carry it without the assistance of the Government; but he trusted that if the House and the Government approved of the principle, they would render every facility to its becoming law. Irrespective of the urgency of removing the gross wrong inflicted on so many young men, it was desirable that the subject should be settled in some way, and not bandied back and forward between rival Parties. If this opportunity were lost, and this offer rejected, he would look with anything but pleasure to the future. Matters could not be allowed to stand as they were, and if there were not levelling up in some shape or form, an agitation for levelling down would, he feared, be commenced, the end of which it would be hard to see. In such a struggle the interests of education would be the first to suffer, and he most sincerely trusted that Her Majesty's Government would, by a wise forethought, prevent such arising; and now, when a Bill was presented, arrived at by mutual concession, and devoid of all Party character, he hoped it would not be rejected, and the opportunity be allowed to pass away fruitlessly, either through indifference or English prejudice. Thanking the House for the attention they had given to him, he begged to move for leave to introduce the Bill.

Major O'Gorman

MR. KAVANAGH said, that he had no wish to enter into a discussion upon the Bill which his hon. Friend had asked leave to bring in. He had already given the House a sketch of the proposals embodied in the Bill. The question raised by that measure was one of the greatest importance; but he did not wish then to pursue the subject further than to state the reasons which had induced him to join with his hon. Friend in undertaking the Bill. For a long time it had been felt that this question should be dealt with, and dealt with in a manner which, although it might not be the most pleasing and acceptable to the heads of the different religious denominations in Ireland, yet would enable them to avail themselves of such advantages as the provisions of the Bill gave them, without sacrificing their conscientious scruples and religious convictions. He had hailed with pleasure the introduction into, and the passing through, the House last Session of the Intermediate Education Act, not so much on account of the benefits which he believed that Act would confer, as with the hope that it would prove the prelude to legislation on the part of the Government on the much greater question which had been brought under their notice that night. But the Speech from the Throne delivered at the opening of the Session, and the statements which had been made since then by Ministers, showed that that was not to be the case. It was only then that, at the suggestion of the hon. Member for Roscommon, he had consented to join with him and others in endeavouring to bring before the House, in the shape of a Bill, a proposal of a practical and reasonable character, which they hoped would obtain the support of all moderate sections of opinion, and by so doing might, perhaps, ultimately lead to a settlement of an important question that had been so long open. He frankly admitted that their chances of success might not appear to be very brilliant, and that they had not undertaken an encouraging task. Perhaps their attempt might even be designated as a foolhardy one, and they themselves might even be described as those who "rushed in where angels feared to tread." But, however that might be, he could only say for himself that he considered the proposals brought forward for discussion were moderate and reasonable; and if their endeavours even tended directly or indirectly to facilitate the ultimate settlement of the question, he should feel sufficiently rewarded. It could not be denied that, at the present period of the Session, and looking at the state in which the Order Book was, that it would be impossible for private Members, without some assistance from Her Majesty's Government, to find the requisite opportunities for the proper discussion of this Bill. Unless they got some help to bring forward the discussion of the measure, it was utterly impossible to hope that private Members could get it through in the time at their disposal; but he did hope that if Her Majesty's Government were not opposed in principle to the measure, they would give such assistance as would enable them to have a debate upon the second reading, and then to take the opinion of the House upon the merits of this proposal. He begged to second the Motion of the hon. Member for Roscommon.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that he only rose for the purpose of supporting the appeal of the hon. Member for Carlow that the Government would give such facilities as were consistent with the pressure of Public Business to enable the House thoroughly and carefully to consider the Bill which had now been brought before it. Although the subject was a complicated and difficult one beyond measure, there could be only one opinion as to the clearness and the ability with which his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon had explained the measure; there could be but one opinion that it was an advantage to them that they should have an Irish statement of what Irishmen—who were the most interested—considered to be the proper manner for meeting this most difficult question. It was a question that had tried the strength of Governments, and had tried the strength of Parties, almost beyond their powers of endurance; and he thought that it was a very great advantage that they should have the subject brought before them by those men who were most deeply interested in it. He would not, on that occasion, give any definite opinion concerning the Bill, except to say that it was evidently framed with a wish to be a moderate measure, and with a care for the feelings of Englishmen as well as for those of Irishmen. He did not think it would be possible to give an actual opinion on the measure until it was before them; and he merely rose for the purpose of joining in the appeal to the Government to fix a day for the consideration of the measure.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD said, that having studied the draft of the Bill most carefully, he really thought that the judgment of the House of Commons would be favourable to it. The question of University Education in Ireland touched so very many interests and raised so many important questions in detail, that it would be impossible for any private Member to expect to get a Bill on the subject through this Session; but he hoped that the earnest endeavour of the hon. Member for Roscommon to bring in his Bill would receive the sanction of the House. This was a question which required settlement, and it had more danger connected with it than any other Irish matter. The Bill which the hon. Member wished to introduce was made out on the exact lines of the Intermediate Education Act which was received last Session by the House with almost unanimous approbation. If that Bill were right, surely a Bill for higher education made out on the same lines would be right. It must be the earnest wish of all hon. Members of that House to settle a question of this class, which provoked such bitter feelings even by its very mention on the other side of the Channel; it must, therefore, be the earnest wish of everyone to see it put at rest for ever. Nobody could deny that the subject was one which required legislation almost before any other subject before the country at the present moment. In fairness and justice to a very large proportion of the people of Ireland—he meant the Roman Catholics—these claims should be fairly considered. They wished for a University giving them equal advantages with people of other denominations. The question had often been thought out, but never fairly argued on the floor of that House. He himself would go even further than this Bill proposed to do, for he would support a Bill brought in for a Roman Catholic University. It was true this University might become Roman Catholic one day; but he would support any Member who brought in a Bill for the purpose of founding one now, for he believed that a Roman Catholic University would come sooner or later, the same as the Roman Catholic vote came in years gone by. But, although he would support any Member who brought in such a Bill, yet he did not think that such a Bill would be of any use, for it would lead to such strong opposition that it would have no chances of passing. As he was, however, anxious for something to be done, and he thought that the Bill which the hon. Member proposed to introduce would not meet with such opposition as the Bill for a Roman Catholic University, he would support it. He did hope that the Government would see their way to support this Bill. He thought that what the hon. Member had said had been most reasonable and moderate; and he did trust that the House of Commons would see its way to give its judgment in favour of the Bill.

MR. COURTNEY observed, that the noble Lord had struck the note which must be heard again and again in this controversy, however much they might try to avoid it, when he spoke of the wish to have a Roman Catholic University. The question that arose in his mind, having listened to the very clear exposition of the Bill which his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon had given them, was how did this proposed scheme meet the demand which they had heard so often? He did not see how, in the shape described by the hon. Member, it would be satisfactory, nor how it would meet the demands which they had heard made, or how the present scheme differed from the existing system of University Education in Ireland so as to remove the objection now entertained to the present system. The first part of the Bill proposed to establish a Senate, which would be an Examining Body, and have power to give certain prizes to students when satisfied that their education was completed, and they had finished their three years' course. That part of the scheme, at least, did not differ in any particular from the constitution of the Queen's University. His hon. Friend expressly said that the Senate—upon the position of which the whole character of the Bill depended—would be appointed in the same way as the present Senate of the Queen's University was appointed. So far, then, as the power to hold examinations and to give away prizes were concerned, the result would be precisely the same as the present system of the Queen's University, with this addition—that the students might enter for examination who had not gone through their course of education at the Queen's Colleges. In that respect, the scheme would be what the Queen's University was proposed to be made, as amended by the Supplemental Charter of 1866. So far, the proposal of the Bill would correspond with the amended scheme; but that scheme did not give satisfaction at the time to the people of Ireland, any more than it gave satisfaction to the Queen's University. He did not see how his hon. Friend would thus satisfy the demand which it was the sole object of this Bill to meet. There was, it was true, a different part of the scheme, which he proposed to call "affiliation" of the Colleges to this University. Upon that point, he confessed that he had great difficulty in understanding the explanation given. No existing College, according to what had been said, could be affiliated; and none of the existing institutions which received, or might receive, any grant under the Intermediate Education Act, could be admitted to be affiliated. He would ask, therefore, if there were any institution in Ireland at the present moment which could be affiliated? There might, perhaps, be one institution—namely, that upon St. Stephen's Green—which could possibly be affiliated; but he did not know of any other. Certainly more than 20 students were pursuing their course of education there; and if the rules were complied with, they might be able to go to the proposed University for examination. Not only would the prizes be given to those students, but salaries would be paid to the Professors in those affiliated Colleges. It was proposed that the lecturers should be paid for lecturing on secular subjects, and he understood it was provided that lectures so paid for should be open to students of all creeds. There was, in fact, to be a Conscience Clause, so that all students might come in and attend these lectures. Was it also intended that these students should be allowed to be members of the affiliated Colleges, or were they to come in as outside students attending the particular lectures? If they were to be allowed to be members of the affiliated Colleges, he saw no distinction whatever between the proposal of the present constitution and the Queen's Colleges. But if they were to come in as outside students attending the lectures, there would still be, as far as he could see, little distinction. If there was no distinction, how would this scheme satisfy those aspirations which it was the professed object of the Bill to realize? The hon. Member might be able to explain the difficulties which occurred to him on a future occasion; but, at present, it seemed to him that certain elements in the problem had been passed over; and he did not see how the scheme would satisfy those demands to control not only the education, but the moral life, of the student, which were insisted upon by the Roman Catholic Hierarchy of Ireland.

Mr. FAWCETT observed, that there was a difficulty in discussing a Bill which they had not seen. In making that remark, he was not referring to the observations of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), and he must not be understood to express any opinion upon that Bill. In the observations which he should make, he would only ask the hon. Member for Roscommon to explain certain points which were not quite clear to him in what they must admit was otherwise a very clear and able statement. It would be paying the hon. Member for Roscommon a poor compliment to judge of his Bill before seeing it; and they ought to be particularly careful on this subject, remembering what took place when the late Government, in 1873, introduced their memorable Bill, and the somewhat foolish position in which some very distinguished Members of that House placed themselves. They listened to the extremely able speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and became quite enthusiastic; but some of those who began by blessing ended by doing exactly the reverse. He should not have uttered a single word on that occasion, had it not been for a remark of the noble Lord the Member for County Waterford (Lord Charles Beresford), who spoke with some responsibility, as his name was upon the back of the Bill. In reference to his remarks, he wished to express a word of caution. The noble Lord said that that Bill was drawn upon the lines of the Intermediate Education Act; and, as that Act was passed by a large majority of that House, he seemed to think that the House was obliged to support beforehand a Bill on University Education drawn upon the same lines. With reference to that remark, he would make two observations. In the first place, no doubt, the Intermediate Education Act of last Session was supported by a large majority; but there was a small minority who had very strong objections to certain parts of that Bill. But that was not the point. An Irish University Bill might be drawn on the same lines as an Irish Intermediate Education Bill; but that was not the slightest reason why those who supported an Intermediate Education Bill should necessarily support an Irish University Education Bill drawn on the same lines. An Irish Intermediate Education Bill dealt with a field unoccupied—there was no system of Intermediate Education in Ireland until last Session; but with regard to Irish University Education, the thing was entirely different. The one ground was not occupied; but in the case of the other edifice they wished to erect, they would have to consider how it would influence the University institutions which were already in existence. He should not express any opinion as to what might be the effect of that measure, considered from the point of view that there were at the present moment two distinct Universities in Ireland; he would only point out to the House—and he thought the House would agree with him in this obvious remark—that it did not necessarily follow that those who were in favour of the Irish Intermediate Education Act would necessarily be in favour of an Irish University Education Bill framed, as had been stated, on the same lines. Further than that, he would express no opinion, favourable or otherwise, with regard to the Bill; but he was sure that his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon would only consider that he was expressing the general opinion of the House when he complimented him upon the extremely candid way in which he put his proposals forward. After the candour with which he had approached the subject, they would all feel it due to him, when the Bill was printed, to endeavour to approach the matter in the same spirit of candour; and he was only expressing the opinion of many English Liberals besides himself when he said that they had but one object in view, although they might differ somewhat as to the means of carrying it into effect—namely, the promotion of University Education in Ireland.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY thought the hon. Member for Roscommon would not ask anything better from the House or the country than that his Bill should be considered simply on its merits. He only rose for the purpose of deprecating any discussion upon the matter until the Bill was before the House. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) was certainly mistaken in his statement that there was no scheme of Intermediate Education in Ireland until the Government measure of last year. He would inform him that there were plenty of intermediate schools in Ireland, but, unfortunately, they were not devoted to the education of the people of the country, but only of one section of it; and the measure adopted by the House of Commons, and introduced by the Government, was designed to fill up the hiatus which existed in that education—and which also existed at that moment in University Education in Ireland—and which arose from the fact that they could not force persons who had conscientious scruples to receive their education in schools or Colleges in which the scheme of education and the whole government of the institution was opposed to their religious convictions. The scheme that had been brought forward by his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon was designed, as he had observed, to fill this hiatus existing in University Education. No one denied that there was ample means for secular education in Ireland, and plenty of University Colleges; but the people did not fill them. Under that state of circumstances, the Bill now introduced shortly was this—That people who desired to have a University degree could get their education in their own Colleges; and if they brought to an examination an adequate stock of learning, they could obtain that degree—that was the real basis of the Bill of his hon. Friend. It was the system of payment by results. The people were to be allowed to receive their education where they liked; but when they came to the test of an examination, then they were to come up to the standard before they could receive their degree. That was the whole basis of the Bill. It had been most carefully designed to avoid trenching on the religious prejudices and religious feelings of hon. Members on either side of the House; and he thought, when the Bill was considered, it would be found to be one based upon moderation and prompted by a desire for peace, and intended to insure to the people of Ireland, who so long had had reason to complain of being denied the privileges of education, which were so freely extended to the subjects of Her Majesty in other parts of the Kingdom, all the necessary means of obtaining degrees without doing a violence to their religious feelings.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Everyone must acknowledge both the importance of the question which has been brought to our notice, and also the clearness and moderation with which the hon. Member for Roscommon has explained the provisions of the Bill he desires to introduce. Everybody must feel that the House is indebted to him for the pains he has taken and the endeavour he is making to contribute to the solution of a very difficult and important problem. There is also, I think, a general feeling in this House, in which I agree, that it would be impossible for us to express any opinion upon a measure of that kind until we have had an opportunity of seeing the Bill in print, and of giving some consideration to it. As has been well observed by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), it is impossible to judge an important scheme of this kind at first sight, and it will be well that some time should be given in order that the scheme should be considered in all its bearings. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will introduce his Bill to-night; and I have no doubt the House will gladly accord him the right to do so, in order that we may shortly have it before us in a shape which will enable us to give it full consideration. It will probably be some little time before the House will have any opportunity of expressing its opinion. The hon. Member will be able, by conidering the arrangements of the Order book, and after communication with his friends who may desire to help him, to find a day when he can bring his measure before the House, which, I have no doubt, will give it a careful and attentive consideration, and make a most candid examination of all his proposals. I think that I should be doing wrong on the present occasion, if I were to do more than express my obligation to the hon. Member for the pains he has taken in preparing his measure, and to assure him that his proposals will be received and considered by Her Majesty's Government with all the attention and care which they so well deserve.

Mr. Fawcett

MR. MELDON wished to say one or two words with reference to this subject, without entering upon the discussion of the merits of the Bill. The peculiar combination of names of hon. Members introducing the Bill would show the House that they had gone a long distance in the way of effecting a compromise. But he must state that, so far as he was aware, the Bill had not yet been considered either by the ecclesiastics or by the laity of Ireland; and it was impossible upon that occasion to give any pledge that the Bill would be accepted either by the clergy or by the laity of Ireland. He said that the more emphatically, inasmuch as he had not heard the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer give any intimation whatever that the Government were prepared to meet them in the long way in which they had travelled towards a compromise. He wished it to be considered, therefore, that the clergy and laity of Ireland, so far as he knew, had not been consulted with reference to the Bill. Having said so much, he might state that, in his opinion, in the interests of University Education, and judging only from what he had heard from his hon. Friend with reference to the Bill, that it seemed to be one which would give satisfaction. He said this, not only in consequence of what had fallen from his hon. Friend, but because he knew the Bill to be introduced was one that met with the approval of the late Mr. Butt, who had many opportunities of consulting, not only with the laity, but with the ecclesiastics of Ireland. The lines upon which the Bill was founded were perfectly neutral; and he should be surprised if the Bill did not receive, as it was intended to do, a favourable reception. He must not, however, be understood to say that the matter had been considered, or that they, in any way, pledged themselves to accept the compromise which was offered.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that he would make one observation with regard to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), as he had no desire that the explanation he had given of the Bill should be in any way misunderstood. It was proposed by the Bill, with regard to affiliated Colleges, that power should be given to the Senate to pay the salaries of certain Professors professing purely secular subjects in the affiliated Colleges. That was the full provision of the Bill; but he stated that if that was not thought sufficiently secure, having regard to the sentiments of the people of England, he would not object to the insertion of a provision that the lectures so paid for should be open to all, irrespective of their religious beliefs. That was the statement made by him; and when his hon. Friend said that, if this were so, the Lecturers in affiliated Colleges would be in no different position from those in the Queen's Colleges, he ventured altogether to differ from him; and he thought that those who most understood what at present existed in Ireland would differ from him essentially. He could not tell how it was that the hon. Gentleman saw no difference. The hon. Gentleman referred to the College upon St. Stephen's Green as being one of those which might be affiliated with the proposed University. Well, he asked, was there no difference between that College and one of the Queen's Colleges? The lectures given by Professors in St. Stephen's Green at the present moment were open to any student who chose to attend, irrespective of the religious belief of such student; yet, surely, no one would say that this did away with all difference between that institution and a Queen's College. He thought he had said sufficient for the present in answer to the point made by the hon. Member for Liskeard. With reference to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it must be remembered that a private Member had no opportunity of bringing his Bill on as an Order of the Day except upon Wednesday. But all the Wednesdays up to the end of the Session were occupied; and even if he could secure a Wednesday, the right hon. Gentleman might consider it unreasonable to take the Bill on an early day. Supposing he said next Wednesday, would the right hon. Gentleman consent to it?

[The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Yes.] If they were not able to secure Wednesday for the second reading of the Bill, and were not able to bring it on, say, within the next three or four Wednesdays, would the right hon. Gentleman hold out any hope of the Government giving up a day for its consideration? For if they were unable to secure any Wednesday within that time, there would be no chance of their getting the Bill through a second reading without the assistance of the Government. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Major Nolan), who had the first Order for next Wednesday, offered to place that at his disposal. If the Government would consent to the Bill being taken next Wednesday, he would bring it on on that day, and he hoped that it would be in the hands of hon. Members on Saturday morning.

MAJOR NOLAN remarked, that he was willing to allow his hon. Friend to take Wednesday for his Bill, on condition that the Government would come to the necessary agreement upon the subject. He would only give up next Wednesday, on condition that the Bill which was next in order would also make way for his.

THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that the Government were in no way masters of the proceedings on Wednesdays, and it was not in their power to say whether or not the Bill would be taken that day. He did not, however, see any objection to the course which was suggested—namely, that the Bill should be put down for Wednesday, May 21st, with a view to getting it discussed then.

MR. COURTNEY thought that to take the Bill next Wednesday would be very rapid work. They were told that the Bill was unknown to the clergy and laity of Ireland, and yet they were asked to discuss it on that day, by which time it could not possibly have been considered by those most interested in it.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that the whole proposition with regard to this Bill struck him favourably, although he had, of course, not yet considered the details of the measure. He had listened with very great attention to the statement of his hon. Friend in moving the introduction of the Bill, and he might say that he considered it would commend itself to the people of Ireland. He did not think the objection of the hon. Member for Liskeard was an important one, and he was in favour of the Bill being taken next Wednesday.

MR. ERRINGTON stated that he was willing to give up his Bill, which was second in the Order Book, in favour of the hon. Member for Roscommon. That seemed to be the only day on which he would have any chance of bringing it on.

MR. PLUNKET was bound to agree with the hon. Member for Liskeard in thinking that it would be impossible to consider the Bill in all its bearings by Wednesday, particularly remembering the great number of persons interested in the subject. The hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) had stated that the Roman Catholic clergy and laity of Ireland had not yet had an opportunity of considering it. He would point out, therefore, to the hon. Member for Roscommon that if he insisted upon bringing on his Bill upon that day, no final Resolution could be arrived at with regard to it. It was necessary to consider the Bill very fully; and he would suggest to the hon. Member that he would make the Bill much more acceptable in the long run, and much more likely to conduce to the higher education of Ireland, if he did not fix the second reading at such an early day as Wednesday next.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT observed, that the hon. Member for Roscommon had said that he would be precluded from bringing his Bill on, except on Wednesday next, unless the Government gave him a day. As he understood his hon. Friend, he would have postponed bringing the Bill in on Wednesday if the Government would have given him a day at a later period. No doubt, Wednesday was an earlier day for the consideration of the question; but it must be taken then, unless the Government would give a day later on.

MR. SULLIVAN thought that it was undesirable that the Bill should be taken next Wednesday. It was an attempt at a compromise, and anything like a compromise upon a question such as this ought not to be hurried through the House. The people of Ireland might not agree with the measure, and it would be far better to give them an opportunity of studying it closely at first. He would also point out to the hon. Member for Roscommon that there was no chance of his carrying his measure through that Session unless the Government really and earnestly gave it facilities. If they wished to do so, they could easily find him a day; and there was no reason why the second reading of the Bill should not be taken before Whitsuntide. The Bill would be distributed on Saturday, and would be in the hands of Irish Members on Monday next; but they could not communicate with their constituents and receive their replies before Tuesday or Wednesday. There was no reason for pressing on the Bill if the Government would give a day for its consideration; and he must remind the hon. Member that the Government alone could secure the passage of the Bill that Session, and without their aid it would be hopeless for a private Member to try to carry it.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the Bill would not be in Ireland before Monday; but, still, there was a very sound and general idea of the provisions of the measure spread throughout Ireland; and he was very much surprised that hon. Members usually so conversant with matters as the hon. and learned Members for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) and Kildare (Mr. Meldon) should be so behind-hand in their knowledge upon the present occasion. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), he could assure him that the Queen's University had a very sharp and watchful staff in Dublin who would deal with the merits of the Bill; and he might feel certain that it would be canvassed by men quite capable of finding out its defects. He hoped that the hon. Member for Roscommon would push his Bill on as rapidly as possible; and he trusted that the Government would endeavour to facilitate his doing so. As sacrifices were being demanded all round, he had no hesitation, for his own part, in saying that if the Government would enable this question to be discussed, hon. Members would, in return, consent to put aside for a time some very important and engrossing questions which they had engaged to bring forward.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to make better provision for University Education in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by The O'CONOR DON, Mr. KAVANAGH, Mr. SHAW, Mr. MITCHELL HENRY, Lord CHARLES BERESFORD, and Mr. PARNELL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 183.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MEDICAL ACT (1858) AMENDMENT
(No. 3) BILL [Lords].—[Bill 121.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be read a second time
To-morrow, at Two of the clock."

MR. E. JENKINS protested against the Bill being set down at that time. The hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had likewise intended to oppose its being set down for such a time; but he was not then present. He should take the sense of the House upon the question of so interfering with the convenience of hon. Members as to set this Bill down for a Morning Sitting.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 16: Majority 23.—(Div. List, No. 96.)

HARES (IRELAND) BILL.—[Bill 165.]
(Mr. Richard Power, Colonel King-Harman, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Herbert, Mr. French.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Richard Power.)

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he should like to know what this Bill was about.

MR. RICHARD POWER said, that the Bill was simply to give a close time for hares in the same way that there was a close time for partridges, snipe, and other animals. It was a very short Bill, and he was really surprised that the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle should offer any objection to it. It was not a Bill directed against poor people, but it was a Bill for the people, and it was asked for by the tenant farmers of Ireland. The Bill would benefit everyone—it would benefit the landlord, the tenant, and the hares immensely. The spring was the time when these animals were so wantonly destroyed, and during which it was proposed to protect them. Looking at the names on the back of the Bill, he was the more surprised that there should be any objection to it—some were Liberals, some Conservatives, and one was a Home Ruler; and the owner of the first name on the Bill entertained political opinions which no one entertained except himself.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

TRUSTEES RELIEF BILL.—[BILL 145.]

(Mr. Wheelhouse, Sir George Bowyer, Sir Eardley Wilmot, Mr. Isaac.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be read a second time To-morrow, at Two of the clock."—(Mr. Wheelhouse.)

Mr. COURTNEY objected to the Bill being taken at 2 o'clock in the morning, and this was not the first occasion on which he had had to raise a similar objection. The consequence of Bills being set down for a Morning Sitting at 2 o'clock was to compel a number of hon. Members to wait about for the possibility of the matter in which they were interested being taken. He had no objection to the Army Regulation and Discipline Bill being taken at the Morning Sitting; but he did not see that there was any reason to encroach further upon the time of private Members.

Mr. WHEELHOUSE observed, that there was no reason why this Bill should not be taken as was proposed. It was a Bill to relieve trustees—

Mr. SPEAKER reminded the hon. and learned Member that the Question before the House was, whether the second reading of the Bill should be fixed for that day at 2 o'clock.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, the sum of £6,694,816 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Richard Power

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

METROPOLIS (WHITECHAPEL AND LIMEHOUSE) IMPROVEMENT SCHEME AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order of one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State for the modification of a Scheme confirmed by "The Metropolis (Whitechapel and Limehouse) Improvement Scheme Confirmation Act, 1874," ordered to be brought in by Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY and Mr. Secretary Cross.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 184.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 16th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS.—Second Reading—Local Government Provisional Orders (Abtton-under-Lync, &c.) * (79).
Committee—Report—Pier and Harbour Order Confirmation * (73).

FOREIGN POLICY OF HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, the Notice I have given is a Notice of Motion, and the Motion which I now beg to make is for Copies of the latest Reports from Her Majesty's Consuls and from Her Majesty's Ambassador at the Porto upon the prospect of administrative reforms in the European and Asiatic Provinces of Turkey.

My Lords, when I placed this Notice on the Table of the House, I did it in the confident expectation that I should be able to congratulate Her Majesty's Government and your Lordships, when I addressed you to-night, on the execution, or, at least, upon evident steps being taken for the execution, of the 22nd Article of the Treaty of Berlin. I rejoice to say that in that expectation I have not been disappointed. My Lords, I attach no importance whatever to the change which has been made in the interpretation of that Article of the Treaty by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. I think, indeed, that it would have been better if the noble Marquess had admitted that the interpretation which he put upon that Treaty was not a perfectly natural one. No one, in my opinion, can read it without coming to the conclusion that it was intended that the evacuation of the Principalities by the Russian Army should be concluded by the 3rd of May; but, my Lords, as I have said, I attach no importance to the change which has been made in the interpretation of that Article. We have received accounts this morning through the public papers which I think make it plain that it is really the intention of the Russian Government to commence bonâ fide the evacuation of those Provinces, and I accept the solemn assurance which has been given to us by Her Majesty's Government that they fully expect that by the 3rd of August there will be no Russian soldier at this side of the Pruth. My Lords, I rejoice at that fact. No noble Lord opposite, no Member of Her Majesty's Government, can rejoice at it more than I do. It gives us at least a hope that the curtain is about to fall upon what has been a scene of terrible violence and bloodshed.

But, my Lords, that being so, the 3rd of May is unquestionably an epoch in this great Eastern Question. It appears to me that we have arrived at a time when it is possible to look back over nearly four years of negotiations and of war—and to estimate what has been lost and gained during that eventful time in the political history of this country. My Lords, in commercial life we all know there are times when men take stock of their proceedings. If noble Lords opposite should object to an illustration taken from commercial life, and should say—as perhaps they will—that we are no longer, under their rule, a nation of shopkeepers, but a nation of warriors, then I will say that even warriors, at the end of a campaign, look to the roll-call of the living and the dead, and that it is worth while to look to the history of those four years and to see what are the political ideas which have perished in the conflict, and what are the political opinions which still survive.

My Lords, the first thing I see in looking back over these four years is the immense Parliamentary success of Her Majesty's Government. I can assure noble Lords opposite that I am not inclined to underrate that success. On the contrary, I place it at its very highest value. Her Majesty's present Government came into Office with a majority not so strong, I think, as that which carried Sir Robert Peel into power in the famous Parliament of 1841—not so large as the late Government had on coming into Office—but still a majority that made them one of the most powerful Governments of recent times; and the striking fact is this—that that majority goes on increasing, and that, too, with especial reference to their conduct of foreign affairs. Every attack upon them has been successfully repulsed. I am not now speaking, of course, of debates, for we all think we get the best of it in debates. I am speaking of actual Divisions as the test of Parliamentary success. Every attack upon the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government has been repulsed on Divisions. We have not been repulsed, indeed, by what is called a fire of precision; we have been beaten rather by a sort of Zulu rush. We have been mobbed. Our order has been broken, our camp has been taken, and we have been assailed right and left. I do not know a more signal proof of the success of Her Majesty's Government in their foreign policy, so far as Parliament is concerned, than the fact that they have thrown out two of their most eminent Colleagues without the smallest effect upon their power. One of those Colleagues is a very highly-gifted Member of your Lordships' House, who conducted the Colonial affairs of the country for some time with much distinction (the Earl of Carnarvon); the other is my noble Friend who sits on the cross-Benches (the Earl of Derby), who, as all your Lordships will admit, is a man of great ability and power, and whose power and great ability are acknowledged not only by his own Party, but by all Parties in the country. Those two distinguished men have been thrown out of the Government, and that without any more effect upon the position of the Government as regards the foreign policy from which they dissented than if they had been two Junior Lords of the Treasury. I say, my Lords, that that is a very remarkable proof of the Parliamentary success of Her Majesty's Government; and it is one of the most striking facts connected with a review of the last four years.

But there is another circumstance which strikes me very much, and it is this—that the Members and adherents of the Government, although they have had this immense success, are by no means peaceful and contented in their minds. They ought to be overflowing with the milk of human kindness. They ought to treat us, their opponents, who have been so often beaten, with the utmost tenderness and courtesy. But, my Lords, there is not much proof of any such frame of mind in the language of the Government or of their supporters. On the contrary, their recent utterances appear to me to have shown not only asperity to us, but a tone of positive mortification and disappointment. If, instead of being a triumphant Party, they were a defeated faction, the language of noble Lords opposite and of their supporters could not have been more full of wrath and anger than it has been. I will give your Lordships two examples of this—one contained in the language of a noble Lord, a Member of this House, whom I have now the honour to address, and who is the inheritor of a distinguished name (Earl Stanhope). There is a Society, it seems, including not a few Members of this House, which is called the Patriotic Society. It assumes that the Party to which it is allied possesses a monopoly of patriotism. Well, my Lords, on this Eastern Question I entertain strong opinions, and have not refrained from maintaining them in this House; but I have never said that patriotism is confined to this side of it. The members of this Patriotic Society, however, appear to think that their opponents are necessarily unpatriotic persons. Well, my Lords, the other day this wonderful Patriotic Society got up an Address to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, Sir Henry Layard. My Lords, I will not speak of the terms of that Address; but I find that, in spite of the tremendous successes to which I have referred, the noble Earl opposite, on behalf of this Society, spoke of the action taken by noble Lords on this side as the cries of faction and of jealous Party spirit; and the noble Earl added, speaking to Sir Henry Layard, that he had to uphold the honour and interests of England in the presence of people who could with some show of reason have insisted that this country had failed to fulfil the contract we had entered into on their behalf—in other words, that we had broken faith with the Turkish Government.

My Lords, I very much rejoice at this most frank confession. I have often said that the real object of many noble Lords opposite was to engage this country in a war in support of Turkey; and I rejoice to see that, on the authority of the Patriotic Society, a noble Earl, the inheritor of a most distinguished and illustrious name, has been frank enough to declare his opinion that England was guilty of a breach of contract in not having assisted the Turkish Government to maintain its oppressive rule over her Christian subjects. Well, but I pass from this Patriotic Society, and come to a noble Lord who is a Member of Her Majesty's Government. I remember two years ago, in the heat and hurry of debate, I was induced—unfortunately, I think—to use rather a rough expression with regard to the course taken by the noble Marquess, then the Secretary of State for India, now the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in going down to Manchester and making a speech to the cotton interest there, on which occasion he gave, I thought, some rather incautious promises. I said on that occasion that the noble Marquess had been “on the stump.” I will not repeat that expression in reference to the speech delivered by the noble Marquess the other day, before the members of the Registration Society for the Conservatives of Middlesex; but if the noble Marquess will allow me, I will say that he has made what is sometimes called in the newspapers an “extra-Parliamentary utterance.” Now, this extra-Parliamentary utterance does not show at all that serene and lofty spirit which I should have expected from a Member of a Government which has such a triumphant majority, and which has so easily beaten us in all our encounters. It is very true we have committed the great crime of differing from the noble Marquess; but I beg to remind him that it is legitimate in Parliament for the Opposition to differ from the Government; and really, con-considering his success, I think he might have treated us with some decent courtesy, and observed the amenities of Parliamentary life. After all, in differing from the noble Marquess, we have not committed such a great crime. I have now been upwards of 30 years in public life, and I never knew a Minister more difficult to understand, or to follow. For instance, the other night, when he came down to the House to explain in dulcet tones the entire fulfilment of the Treaty of Berlin, he shone like the peaceful evening star. But sometimes he is like the red planet Mars; and occasionally he flames in the midnight sky, not only perplexing nations, but perplexing his own nearest friends and followers. We have differed from the noble Marquess; but we have not differed from him more than he has differed from himself. We have differed from him no more than Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary at Constantinople has differed from the Foreign Minister, or than the author of the famous Circular in the Treaty of San Stefano has differed from the author of the secret Agreement with Count Schouvaloff. We have differed from him, it is true, but not more than the noble Marquess differed from himself when he denounced the study of small maps, and when afterwards he sat a humble disciple at the feet of those two great captains of Russophobia, Sir Henry Rawlinson and Sir Bartle Frere. My Lords, what does the noble Marquess—this great Minister with a triumphant majority, who ought to be able to speak of those who differ from him with courtesy and respect—what does he say? He says—“In a critical moment in the nation's life, when aggression on our interests”—that is, the interests of England—“seemed to be imminent, public men were found to come forward and maintain the interests of those by whom their country was threatened.” This is very like the language of the Patriotic Society. I do not know whether the noble Marquess is a member of that Society; but his language reminds me of it. He distinctly accuses the Members of this House who venture to differ from him, not more than he has differed from himself, as being unpatriotic enough to assist the enemies of their country. That, I think, is not language which ought to be used by a Secretary of State. The noble Marquess went on to speak of certain public men, of whom I am one, as having described “sharp curves.” My Lords, what does this mean? It means that Turkey having been given 20 years to reform, and having become worse instead of better, we have said that the experiment of 1856 has failed. The radius of our curve was 20 years; but the radius of the curves which have been described by the noble Marquess himself has been somewhere about three weeks or a month. I want to know what is the secret of all this angry and disappointed language? Cannot you enjoy your triumphs in peace? Why mangle the bodies of the dead like the Zulus? What is the secret of all this rancour? Do you think we are like the dry bones in the vision of Ezekiel—that we are likely to rise up soon an exceeding great army? Or is there another cause for it? Are you conscious that while your opinions have triumphed in Parliament, our opinions have triumphed in the world? Is this the secret of your dissatisfaction and of your mortified tone? I will try to assist you in searching into your own consciences. I want to know what you have accomplished with your great majorities, your ringing cheers, your Imperial perorations? What have you done for England and for the world—for the freedom of the East and for the limitation of the power of Russia? What has been the net result of your four years of triumph? Have you done what you intended to do, or is your pretext to the people of England in regard to the Treaty of Berlin one great political imposture?

My Lords, my first proposition is this—that looking back to the results—and my Motion has respect to results only—looking back to the results, so far as they have been attained, of those four years of negotiation and war, you have entirely failed in the objects which you had in view. What were these objects? Of course you will say, “the interests and honour of England.” But these are our objects too. Still, I do not doubt that the interests and honour of England were your objects. I have never said one word in this controversy, heated as it has been, nor should I allow myself to say one word, against the patriotism of noble Lords opposite. But we have our own opinions of what the interests and honour of England are; you have yours. It is fair that we should fight them out. But when we come to define what your objects were, you must not use the language and forms of speech which do well enough in perorations. You must come to business. Now, I ask you what were your objects? My definition of them is this—to retain, as far as you could, something substantial of the Turkish Empire, and to resist, as far as you could, any substantial gains to Russia. Well, my proposition is that you have failed in both these objects—entirely and absolutely failed. My Lords, the Treaty of Berlin—and let the people of this country understand it, for they do not understand it at present—the Treaty of Berlin is nothing but the Treaty of San Stefano with a few comparatively unimportant modifications. Under the Treaty of Berlin, of which you are so proud, Russia has recovered the Bessarabian Provinces on the Danube; she has recovered Kars, which has been called the key of Turkish Armenia; she has gained, for the first time, a large slice of the Asiatic Provinces of Turkey; and, above all, she has gained the harbour of Batoum, which has been the object of Russian ambition for many and many a day. And what is the cumulative effect of these gains to Russia. My Lords, I will describe it in language which may possibly be familiar to the House, language which, though Russophobic in its character, still contains a good deal of truth—

“The compulsory alienation of Bessarabia from Roumania, the extension of Bulgaria to the shores of the Black Sea, which are principally inhabited by Mussulmans and Greeks, and the acquisition of the important harbour of Batoum, will,” says the writer, “make the will of the Russian Government dominant over all the vicinity of the Black Sea. The acquisition of the strongholds of Armenia will place the population of that Province under the immediate influence of the Power that holds them; while the extensive European trade which now passes from Trebizond to Persia will, in consequence of the cessions in Kurdistan, be liable to be arrested at the pleasure of the Russian Government by the prohibitory barriers of their commercial system.”

These are the words, not of an opponent of the Government, but of the noble Marquess himself, in his celebrated Circular of the 1st of April, 1878. Of all these consequences, which have you averted? Every one of them stands exactly as he described them except this

The Duke of Argyll

—that the Russian Frontier has been removed from the town of Bayazid, and from a certain valley (with a name not easily pronounced), which leaves the caravan route from Trebizond for the moment free. Does anyone think this makes any substantial alteration in the gain of Russia? It has given Russia a great slice of country and a mountain barrier behind which her Armies are perfectly safe; and, at the first moment of alarm, she can take that route which you professed to have saved. Another change which is presented to the people of England as a modification is that which relates to the port of Batoum. The Russian Representative said—“If you will concede that, we will express our intention to make it a free port;” and the noble Marquess and the noble Earl said, with effusive joy—“We are too delighted to accept the assurance of His Imperial Majesty; we think it makes the greatest possible difference in the case.” I say, in the presence of noble Lords learned in International Law, that the assurance of the Emperor of Russia to make Batoum a free port does not prevent Russia from making it a fortified port, and from making it the head-quarters of the Russian Fleet which will command the Southern coasts of the Black Sea. This modification of the Treaty of San Stefano is nothing but a mere blind. By this Treaty of Berlin, of which you say you are the authors, and of which you are so proud, Russia has acquired a position in which you will very soon hear of Todleben being hard at work, and when the next war arises you will find it to be a powerful station of the Russian Fleet.

Well, but I pass from the direct gains of Russia, and I come to those which are indirect. You have always gone upon the principle that whatever is lost to Turkey is gained to Russia, and, under your management, that is perfectly true. I admit the principle, under your management; but I limit it to that. If Provinces had been taken from Turkey by your assistance, you might have done something to resist Russia; but the tendency of what you have done is to place power in the hands of Russia. What are the losses of Turkey? She has lost for ever her Danubian Frontier—the bank of that great historic river, her first line of defence, which has so often been the means of resisting invasion. That has been abandoned for ever. It was an axiom, indeed, of the great Napoleon, that a great river could never prevent the passage of an invading Army; but the Danube, as a defence of Turkey, was re-inforced by a powerful Quadrilateral of fortresses, which are also gone for ever.

Wonderful to say, such is the power of delusion which the Government have had over the people of this country that the clause in the Treaty which provides for the destruction of the Danubian fortresses is looked upon as if it were a clause which redounded to their honour, and which they were anxious to see carried into effect. The noble Marquess, the other night, spoke of the destruction of these fortresses in such a way as to produce an impression in the House and out-of-doors that it was a provision in the interest of Turkey and against the interest of Russia. This clause about the Danubian fortresses is taken directly from the Treaty of San Stefano; and so anxious were the Russians about the razing of these fortifications that it was provided for in two separate Articles of the Treaty of San Stefano, with this condition added—that no new fortresses were to be raised on the banks of the Danube. Can there be a clearer proof that this clause in the Treaty of Berlin was inserted in the interests of Russia, and that your anxiety to see it fulfilled is one that will be heartily seconded by the Russian Emperor? These were two of the great losses of Turkey, and, consequently, under your management, two of the gains of Russia. The Danubian Frontier is gone, and these great fortresses—one of which, Silistria, in the hands of the British during the War of 1856, resisted successfully the Russian invasion—are gone for ever. Another gain to Russia and loss to Turkey is the extension of Serbia and the erection of a new Principality, the constitution of which in its very essence is hostile to the Turkish Government. Occupying the Danubian Frontier, the new Bulgaria will now have on the West the enlarged country and population of Serbia intimately connected with it in common interest, and certain to make common cause with it in any future contest with the Turks. These two conterminous Provinces give the power of entrance into the very heart of Turkey. Bulgaria, in the possession of Sofia, turns the Balkans on that side; Serbia, by her increased territory, gives an entrance into the very heart of the Roumelian Province of Turkey; and these are the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin, which, according to you, have saved Turkey and have resisted Russia.

But this is by no means all. When the noble Earl and the noble Marquess were returning in triumph from Berlin, among the pæans of their supporters, they published a wonderful Blue Book—Parliamentary Paper, No. 37, 1878—which consisted of one page—a map showing “the territory restored to Turkey.” It was like the advertisement of a second-rate theatre—“Immense success! Triumphant success of the Government in the territory restored to Turkey!” With this interesting map there were only two lines of letterpress, which informed us that all Bulgaria contained only 17,000 square miles taken from Turkey together with the fortresses, while, on the other hand, no less than 30,000 square miles had been restored to Turkey. It sounds very fine; but let us inquire into the facts. Of the 30,000 square miles boasted of as restored to Turkey, a large part consists of Eastern Roumelia; and in what sense is that restored to Turkey? The Governor must not be a Turk; but, by the Law of Europe, by the Treaty of Berlin, he must be a Christian. Let us understand the significance of this distinction in the East of Europe. Christians and Mahomedans, Hindoos and Christians, can, and do, live together in peace and amity under the British Government and under the Russian Government; but you cannot get a Turkish population to live under Christian rule, or a Christian population to live under Turkish rule in the East of Europe. One has been too long accustomed to absolute rule, and the other to the evils of that rule. It was perfectly right to say that the Governor must not be a Turk—but that means that the authority of that Government is for ever separated from the authority of Turkey. Then, the Sultan is not even free to choose the Christian who is to be Governor; he cannot nominate him except with the consent of the Powers; and that is not all, but the internal government is taken from the Sultan and, under the guarantee of Europe, the Province is to enjoy autonomous institutions. The principle of the Treaty is, that the people of Eastern Roumelia should be entitled to their complete autonomy in all internal affairs. It is, then, a mere quibble to say that in the full sense of the words this Province has been restored to Turkey. But even that is not all. The Sultan is not even to be allowed to put any troops within the territory except on the Frontier. The Militia is to be Native; and we know, from the ordinary sources of information, that the Mussulman population to a large extent have left the Province. Therefore, I say that in no proper sense of the words has this part of the 30,000 square miles of territory been restored to Turkey. You call it the direct government of the Sultan; but there never was a form of words more delusive. Now observe, my Lords, I am not now assuming you are going to fail in securing the execution of the Treaty of Berlin; on the contrary, I am supposing you will succeed in executing the whole of that Treaty—that you will succeed in carrying into effect the whole of its intentions; but what is the result? Can you really pretend to the people of this country that, under these circumstances and conditions, the 12,000 or 15,000 square miles of Eastern Roumelia out of the 30,000 square miles you profess to have restored to Turkey can in any sense of the words be said to have been so restored? I say, practically, that Province is withdrawn from Turkey; and I say, further, that, under your management, its influence has been added to that of Russia. One of the most wonderful sayings attributed to the noble Marquess—I do not know whether correctly or not—in his speech the other day to the Registration Society, to which I have already adverted, was when he enlightened the Conservative electors of the City of London by actually using this illustration—he said, setting aside details into which he would not enter, that the relations between Eastern Roumelia and the Sultan will be very much like the relations between the British Colonies and the Queen. I am about to visit the greatest of our Dependencies—the Dominion of Canada—and I shall be curious to learn whether the people there recognize this new doctrine in political philosophy, that the relations between Canada and the Queen are very much the same as the relations which have been established under the Treaty of Berlin, between the people of Eastern Roumelia and the Grand Turk.

But I go further. Setting aside Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia, is it really true that the rest of the territory has been restored to Turkey? Not a bit of it. The Treaty of San Stefano stipulated, in the 15th Article, that Turkey should no longer be independent, even in its most purely internal affairs. It stipulated that Turkey should give political institutions to all her European Provinces similar to those of Crete, which, practically, involve considerable independence. Under the Treaty of San Stefano, therefore, the whole of Turkey was put under promise to Russia, and to the other Powers behind Russia, that certain privileges should be given to every one of the populations. That was a stipulation in the Treaty of San Stefano which made Russia the mistress of Turkey. What have you done with that? Have you thrown that out? Not a bit of it. You have adopted it in your Treaty of Berlin. You have put Turkey under a promise to all the Powers, for the whole of the rest of her territory, that she shall give Constitutions similar to that of Crete, and you retain in your own hands the power of judging whether she has or has not fulfilled that obligation. I say, under these circumstances, you have restored no part to Turkey. You have followed slavishly the Treaty of San Stefano. You have adopted all its main Articles, and by these Articles you have made Turkey a subject Power.

But, perhaps, it may be said—"It is very true we have adopted the provisions of the Treaty of San Stefano, but we could not help ourselves, and Turkey is now for the first time under Treaty obligations in regard to its most internal affairs; but, at least, we have substituted Europe instead of Russia." That would be a very fair answer if it were true; but it is not true. Under the Treaty of Paris of 1856, it is true that something like an Europe was constituted separate from the individual Powers; but under the Treaty of Berlin there is no Europe. What you have done is this—you have added your right to coerce Turkey to the right which Russia had already acquired for herself; but you have not constituted any joint authority. The Treaty of Paris provided that recourse was to be had to the United Powers before any one of them went to war with Turkey. You made no such provision. Under the Treaty of Berlin each and all the Powers have their separate rights of direct recourse against Turkey; and they may claim the fulfilment of the promise made not to Europe only, but to each and all the Powers. And, what is more, I believe the noble Marquess was a special opponent of a provision which was suggested by Russia that there should be some machinery for carrying into effect the intentions of the European Powers. The noble Marquess resisted this—on what ground I never could really understand—but, whatever his ground, the effect is this—that each and all the Powers have, severally and separately, their recourse against Turkey in case of quarrel. Now, under these circumstances, I maintain that the Treaty of Berlin in all essential respects—so far as the independence of Turkey is concerned—is nothing but a copy, with slight, comparatively unimportant, and sometimes mischievous, modifications of the Treaty of San Stefano. Well then, perhaps, the noble Marquess may say—"But then we have the Asiatic Convention." I must say, in regard to this Asiatic Convention, that I never did feel the objection to it which I have felt to many other parts of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. It had, at least, this great advantage—that it confessed it to be quite wrong and impolitic to guarantee to Turkey any part of her Dominions without a corresponding promise of reform. It gave up the doctrine of the patriots in this country that it was for the interests and honour of England to maintain the Turkish Government, whether it reformed itself or not. It admitted the principle that if we guaranteed Turkey in her territory she was bound to assure us of good government. The only objection I had to it was that it was impossible to execute it. But look at the bearing of the conduct of the Government as to this Convention. I have already referred to the importance of the harbour of Batoum. If any one thing is certain in regard to this Eastern Question, it is this—that if England had chosen to insist, she might have prevented Russia acquiring Batoum. We had our Fleet—a very powerful one; Turkey also had a Fleet of considerable power, under the command of a distinguished English officer; while Russia has no Fleet in the Black Sea; and it certainly would not have been impossible to prevent Russia acquiring Batoum, if we had employed our Fleet and the Turkish Fleet to prevent it. But the Government came to the conclusion that it was not for the interest or honour of England to go to war with Russia to prevent her getting the harbour of Batoum. The noble Marquess, in a speech the other day, said they gave up many things for the sake of peace. By all means—it was quite right to give up Batoum for the sake of peace. But you, who declined to go to war for the harbour of Batoum, took revenge on future Governments by a Convention which compels future Governments to go to war with Russia if she acquire a single scrap more of territory in Asia Minor. Conceive the rashness of that transaction. You exercised your own freedom, and I think wisely, in determining not to go to war even to prevent the most important acquisitions being made by Russia on the shores of the Black Sea; but you determined as far as you could to impair and hamper the freedom of future Governments of England, and to compel your country, very possibly under most disastrous circumstances, to go to war with Russia if she should make any future acquisition even round the slopes of Ararat. Is this a foreign policy of spirit and dignity?—is this a brave foreign policy? It seems to me a foreign policy founded on, and essentially involving, a conspicuous example of political cowardice. You have no right to revenge yourselves on posterity for the rebuff you have received in submitting to Russia. You ought to have left the hands of the future English Governments as free as they were before; and I cannot conceive any Convention made by an English Government less worthy of them than this Convention, which you know you cannot execute, but which will be a serious embarrassment to those who come after you.

The Duke of Argyll

My Lords, I have not yet done with this wonderful Treaty of Berlin. It leaves Russia in full possession of the enormous subsidy which was imposed upon Turkey by the Treaty of San Stefano. That subsidy amounts to something like £50,000,000. "Oh!" you said, "we have taken care that this engagement to Russia shall not be a prior obligation." Prior to what? It may not be prior as regards other creditors—that may be true; but it is prior to many other important purposes on which Turkish Revenues ought to be employed for the improvement of the government and the happiness of the people. Russia may not be before other creditors, but she is before the Native population of Turkey. The noble Marquess came down the other day and told us that the reforms in Turkey depended upon the finances of Turkey; and so they do. But how does this apply as regards the subsidy? Why, Russia is enabled to checkmate the reforms of Turkey. Then look at it from another point of view. Look at the power it gives to Russia over Turkey. Are you sure, since the complete subjection of Turkey to the political domination of each and all of the Powers, that Russia will have no access to the Porte which is closed to you? Russia has nothing to do but, with a wink of the eye in the Palace of the Sultan, to say—"We shall not insist this year upon more than half the interest, provided you do so-and-so," and it will be done. Depend upon it, this subsidy is an instrument in the hands of Russia which she will know how to use. I am not inclined to blame the Government for every departure from the Treaty of Berlin. What I said before I repeat—that there would be no loss of honour or of credit, but the contrary, if the Government should agree to the modification of that part of the Treaty of Berlin which related to the garrisoning of the Balkans. The noble Marquess told us the other day, if I understood him rightly, that this clause was not compulsory, but permissive—that it was in the power of the Sultan to put those garrisons in; but it was not in the power of the Sultan to bar his right to do so if he liked. But what does this come to? The Sultan might do it, or not do it; but he could not bargain his right away. But by a private agreement with Russia he could bargain to abstain from the exercise of his right, and I believe he would be wise to do so. I believe these hostile garrisons in the midst of a hostile population will be no real gain to Turkey; and I hope if the Government comes to that conclusion, in concert with the other Powers of Europe, that it will not insist on that Article of the Treaty.

The Duke of Argyll

There is only one other part of the arrangements made by the Government to which I wish to refer, and that is the Convention with regard to Cyprus. Just before the announcement was made of the acquisition of Cyprus I had been reading a very interesting work, not of a political character, on the Island of Cyprus, by the American Consul, Mr. Cesnola. It contained an account of the antiquities of Cyprus; but, incidentally, and entirely without reference to political affairs, it mentioned circumstances which gave a most horrible idea of the misgovernment of the Island under certain Pashas. The author added to the innumerable proofs we have already had from independent sources of the corrupt character of the Government of Turkey. Therefore, I must confess, when I heard of the acquisition of Cyprus by England, I was very much disposed to say—"Well, at least, here is one more corner of this fair world redeemed from the Government of Turkey." And as I did not see much harm in it, it was one of the arrangements made by the Government in which I was inclined to acquiesce. But, as a means of resisting Russia, it was a bad joke, and worse than a bad joke. It was a mere bait. It is true that great nations like great landowners have sometimes such a desire for territory that they are ever eager to acquire more. The noble Marquess and the noble Earl knew their countrymen, and they took them in their weak point. The rejoicings in the country and the Press at this acquisition of Cyprus reminded me very much of the joy that some Member of your Lordships' House, with 200,000 or 300,000 acres, might experience when he heard that his agent had bought some old woman's cabbage garden.

I turn now to sum up the results of what you have done. The first result I apprehend is that Turkey is gone—gone for ever. The noble Earl at the head of the Government said, I believe, a year and a-half ago, that great Powers might exist with the loss of Provinces—that England had lost Provinces, and why should not Turkey lose them. But Turkey has lost more than Provinces—she has lost that which is essential to Empire, she has lost her independence. Do not deceive yourselves with fine phrases—Turkey as an Empire is dead and gone. The next result from the conduct of the Government is that the future of Turkey is left in complete confusion, with the most dangerous liabilities to this country. I do not know whether many of your Lordships realize this fact—at least I believe it to be a fact—that besides the clauses of the Treaty of Berlin which are taken verbatim or substantially from the Treaty of San Stefano—and these are the most important and most operative clauses—it must be held that all the rest of the Treaty of San Stefano which is not affected by the Treaty of Berlin survives as between Russia and Turkey. [The Marquess of SALISBURY dissented.] The noble Marquess shakes his head; but I have seen a despatch from himself in which he says we have no right to interfere with regard to the subsidy, because it was part of the Treaty of San Stefano, and did not contravene the Treaty of Berlin or the general law of Europe. Therefore, I have a right to infer that those parts of the Treaty which are not against the general law of Europe and the Treaty of Berlin remain intact. Then there is another point, and that is the identification of the interests of the populations of the South-East of Europe with Russian interests. That I regard as a far more formidable result of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. It was an important question whether the new Principalities should or should not be independent of Russia. I maintain that the identification of the feelings of the population of those Principalities with Russia has been due mainly to your conduct. Have your Lordships read the account of the last day's proceedings of the late Bulgarian Assembly? The name of England was never mentioned; all the enthusiasm of the day was for the Czar. The cheers were all for the Russian Army, and the Russian Emperor was treated as the Liberator of the country—which, indeed, he has been. All the gratitude of the country is given to Russia. My Lords, look at the actual results under the operation of this Treaty? Who has been elected Prince? The nephew of the Empress of Russia. Do you think there is no meaning in that act? You may regret it, but you cannot help it. By the large portion of the public which has been supporting you and egging you on, and which has given you your great majority in Parliament, that will be considered a significant fact. And you and your agents are still busy at work teaching the Christian populations that their only safety lies in clinging to Russia. At the beginning of my speech I referred to an address of the Patriotic Society. How does Sir Henry Layard reply to it? Why, he indulges in unmitigated abuse of the Bulgarians. The Government of England are pledged to support this new Principality, in regard to which our Ambassador uses this language—

"However bad the Turkish Government may have been, it was a controlling body. You have now established a Bulgarian Nationality, which, I fear, will be far worse than the Turks."

Now, I do not say whether that is true or untrue; but is that the kind of language which you ought to encourage on the part of the Ambassador of England? Sir Henry Layard is an old personal friend of mine. I have received kindness at his hands, and I admire the ability and the energy of his character; but—and I say this painfully as a public duty—a man who goes back to Constantinople at this time to see to the execution of a Treaty which provides for this new Nationality violates in a grave manner his public duty when, being the Representative of England, he tells us that the Bulgarian Nationality will be worse than the Turks. Well, I sum up the results in Europe by saying this:—That with this Treaty of Berlin, which is a pale copy of the Treaty of San Stefano, we can afford to smile at your Parliamentary victories and to laugh at our own defeats. It was our desire—at least, it was mine—that Turkey, as an Empire in Europe, should be destroyed. You have done that; or, rather, Russia has done it for you, and you have not ventured to interfere. You have given your sanction, because you could not help it, to all the main provisions of the Treaty of San Stefano, which reduce Turkey to a dependent State. I am not dissatisfied. Like a man who looks at some great savage beast which has received its death-wound, but which is still capable of mischief, I say—"Hold back! Do not sacrifice another life by putting him out of his pain. Internal bleeding will do the rest. Let him alone to die." As regards the flourish of the Government, when they returned from Berlin saying that they brought back "Peace with Honour," it seems to me that it was "Retreat with Boasting."

My Lords, if I had not taken a prominent part in this question, and been responsible for discussions on it out-of-doors, I should have shrunk from the labour which I have undertaken to-night; but I feel I should be guilty of shirking a public duty if, having said a good deal out of this House, I were to flinch from submitting my opinions to the test of discussion, and to the fire of debate. I have still, therefore, to deal with results in Asia. On the subject of the War in Afghanistan the noble Earl at the head of the Government made an appeal to me last night to which I wish most heartily to respond. In looking back at these four years, there is no part of the Eastern Question on which the Government has been more loyally supported, and on which they have had a more triumphant majority in this House. I am not at all surprised at that. It seems to be perfectly natural in the circumstances. This House was not consulted until it was too late, and many noble Lords on both sides said to themselves—"Here is the Government committed to a war. It is too late for us to interfere, and we must, in the circumstances, support the Government." I perfectly understand the motive under which the majority voted; but we must look back a little to what was done before. I am not talking of the results which are still in the future, but of things which have been done, and which cannot now be undone. I wish the House to remember that the history of the Afghanistan Question is distinctly divided into two separate parts. First, there was the diplomatic quarrel which ended in April, 1877; and then there was the subsequent quarrel with respect to the Russian Mission, which was the more immediate occasion of the war. I wish to make a few observations respecting the diplomatic quarrel which ended in April, 1877, and as to which Parliament was never informed. It was kept a profound secret from both Houses of Parliament—studiously kept secret. The first result which I find in the conduct of the Government is this. They have made a most offensive imputation against the Mahomedan subjects of the Queen. It is very singular that in all the public discussions of this question that I have seen the point to which I am now referring has hardly been noticed. The whole quarrel with Afghanistan arose out of the determination of the noble Marquess that we should have Englishmen, and not Mahomedans, as our Agents in Afghanistan. There was no quarrel with the Ameer about Native Agents. He would have had as many Mahomedan Agents as you like. "No," said the noble Marquess, "we cannot trust these Native gentlemen; their accounts are so incomplete, and I doubt whether they are perfectly faithful. We must have Englishmen." And that was the cause of the quarrel. I myself have had the honour of being Secretary of State for India, and I deprecate the mischief likely to arise from the doctrine that we cannot trust the Native Mahomedan gentlemen in India even to give us correct and faithful information. I believe it to be entirely untrue and unjust. I believe that the Native gentleman who was our Agent at Cabul for many years, and who was chosen by my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Northbrook) as a gentleman of ability and high honour, was as honest and as upright a man as regards information as any English gentleman you could get. Indeed, Lord Lytton himself was obliged to compliment him, at a later stage of the proceedings, on the conduct he pursued. I believe that this diplomatic quarrel—which, be it remembered, led ultimately to the war, on the sole ground that the Ameer would not receive British officers—was a cruel and unjust charge against the Mahomedan gentlemen who are subjects of the Queen.

There is another result which I am very sorry to have to mention, but which I feel bound to mention, and I shall be very glad to have a satisfactory answer from the Government. It is one result of the conduct of the Government in this Afghanistan Question that it can be said, with too much truth, that the Government of India had shuffled with its public engagements. I maintain that by the 7th clause of the Treaty of 1857, entered into with Dost Mahomed, the father of Shere Ali, we were bound not to press British officers upon him. The rest of the Treaty was more or less temporary, but that was a surviving clause. Lord Lytton himself, after some attempts at evasion, was obliged to confess it; and I say that the diplomatic pressure which you placed on the Ameer was a direct violation of the 7th clause of that Treaty. Then, there is another consequence which I think is a very serious one, and that is, the most injurious and invidious distinction which has been made between Treaty obligations and obligations under solemn promises of the Viceroy of India. In India we are dealing with half-civilized peoples, to whom the forms of European diplomacy are not familiar. Many of our obligations rest upon the words of Viceroys and Governors General; and the distinction made by Lord Lytton between Treaty obligations and obligations under the solemn promises of Lord Mayo, Lord Lawrence, and Lord Northbrook, was a distinction most injurious to the honour of the British Crown.

There is yet another result of your proceedings in the East. It is that the British Government has been found to be capable, and the Secretary of State for India to be capable, of something very like double-dealing in negotiation. That is a very serious charge. I quite admit that; and unless I am able to give chapter and verse for this accusation, I shall certainly retract it. If the noble Marquess can prove that I am mistaken, I shall publicly withdraw it. But I think it my duty to say here, and in his presence, what I have said elsewhere in regard to his conduct in this negotiation. I can put in a nutshell what I have to say upon it. The late Ameer, Shere Ali, made two demands upon the British Government in 1869 through Lord Mayo—the one was for a dynastic guarantee in favour of the succession of his son, Abdoolah Jan, and the other was for a military guarantee, irrespective of conditions, against invasion from Russia or any other Power. The policy of Lord Mayo at that time, and the policy of Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet, was simply this—to tell the Ameer, Shere Ali, openly—"We cannot give you that dynastic guarantee. We cannot give you that military guarantee." My complaint against the noble Marquess is this—that he said—"We can give you this guarantee;" and then that he set about by ingenious devices to keep that freedom in the hands of the Government which he professed to give away. That is my charge, and I found it on the Instructions sent by the noble Marquess on February 28, 1877. Just let me read to the House the account which the noble Marquess gives of that dynastic guarantee. We know that what the Ameer wanted was that the boy Abdoolah Jan, the son of his favourite wife, should be guaranteed by the British Government as his successor over the head of Yakoob Khan, his older and abler son. Lord Mayo said—"We cannot give you that guarantee." What did the noble Marquess say? He said that former Governors General and former Governments had been guilty of using "ambiguous formulæ" to the Ameer, and no wonder the poor man had been disappointed. We will give a guarantee for the succession of Abdoolah Jan. The noble Marquess then addressed private and secret Instructions to Lord Lytton—Instructions so secret and so private that they were actually, by a most unconstitutional exercise of power, withheld from the Council of India. The noble Marquess gave to the Governor General personally—not in Council, the Constitutional form—these secret Instructions; and here is what he says about this dynastic guarantee—

"The frank recognition of a de facto order of succession established by a de facto Government to the Throne of a foreign State does not, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, imply or necessitate any intervention in the internal affairs of that State."—[Afghanistan, No. 1 (1878), p. 158.]

That is to say, Lord Lytton was to pretend to give a guarantee for the boy Abdoolah Jan; but he was privately instructed that it need not, and did not, involve any intervention in the internal affairs of Afghanistan.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY asked where the term "dynastic guarantee" occurred.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: The words "dynastic guarantee" I do not use as a quotation, but as a descriptive phrase; I use it as a description of what was meant. What the Ameer wanted was a guarantee for the succession of this boy. What the noble Marquess directed Lord Lytton to do was to offer a British guarantee, which was to look like what the Ameer wanted, but with a private explanation that it did not involve any interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. That, I think, is not a fair way of dealing. But this is not all. Look at the military guarantee. The noble Marquess instructed Lord Lytton to go as far as he could in giving the guarantee which the Ameer wanted against invasion by Russia or any other Power; but he distinctly said to Lord Lytton—"You must keep in the hands of the British Government the freedom which we must always keep to judge of the times and the circumstances under which we are to help the Ameer."

Why, that is exactly what we said, and in consistency with that we said, "We cannot give you either of these guarantees." The noble Marquess, on the contrary, went about devising means by which, consistently with keeping his freedom, he should appear to give the promises required by the Ameer. The result was a systematic endeavour to represent to the Ameer that he was being offered something wholly different from that which we were really proposing to give him. Accordingly, in the interview which took place between Lord Lytton and Atta Mahomed, our Agent at the Court of Cabul, the Viceroy told Atta Mahomed distinctly that he was authorized by the British Government to give the Ameer Shere Ali that which he had asked in 1869; and, at a later period, Atta Mahomed was again told to inform that unfortunate Prince that we were willing now to give him all that Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook had refused. When Lord Lytton gave that assurance three times, he had in his possession documents which proved that what he was then offering was wholly different from what the Ameer had asked for. And what did Lord Lytton himself say? After all these conferences were over—after the Ameer had seen through all your pretexts, and had refused your pretended boons—Lord Lytton wrote home to the Government from India, in a despatch of the 10th of May, 1877, that, after all, he had offered to the Ameer nothing but what Lord Mayo had already given. I say that unless these facts can be refuted by the Government they justify the imputation which I have made against them. My point is shortly this—that while pretending to give what we (the late Government) had refused, you carefully reserved to yourselves the very freedom which was necessarily inconsistent with the giving such a guarantee.

There is one other result of your proceedings in regard to Afghanistan to which I also allude with very great regret. It is not one for which the noble Marquess has any personal responsibility, except that the Government to which he belongs has sanctioned the proceedings of Lord Lytton. I know very well the difficulty of throwing overboard, especially in the face of an Opposition, a Governor General whom you yourselves appointed, and to whom you gave secret Instructions such as those to which I have referred. But I am sorry to say that one consequence of these transactions is that in personal conferences with the Princes of India they can no longer trust that a Viceroy will treat them with common fairness, or will quote their arguments with a decent regard to accuracy. I will not weary the House with the details which I might quote in support of this assertion; but I may say that I never go back to those conferences at Peshawur between Sir Lewis Pelly and the late Noor Mahomed without a feeling of shame and humiliation. We have all the fairness, all the dignity, and all the truth on the side of the Mahomedan and the Afghan, and we have everything that is the opposite to these on the side of the Englishman and the Christian. My Lords, depend upon it that, whatever may be the result of your negotiations with Yakoub Khan, it will remain indelibly fixed in the history of India that the Ameer Shere Ali had only too good cause to say that he had now a deep-rooted distrust of the good faith and sincerity of the British Government.

I have one other consequence of this policy to bring before the House, and it has nothing to do with personalities. ["Hear, hear!"] I am glad to have that cheer. I ask noble Lords in candour to say whether they think that the way in which negotiations are conducted by Secretaries of State and by Viceroys with foreign Princes is a matter of a purely personal nature? Do Secretaries of State and Viceroys not represent the Crown; and is it a matter of personal interest only that the Crown should not be perfectly straightforward in its dealings? I deny the inference to be drawn from those cheers that we have no right to enter into these matters. They are matters of grave public interest.

Another consequence, and I think a most dangerous consequence, of the conduct of the Government in respect to Afghanistan is that you are willing to saddle the people of India with the cost of wars which, by your own confession, are not required for their protection. I say "by your own confession," because, when you withdrew your Agent from Cabul secretly and without telling Parliament, knowing that you were not entitled to go to war, you fell back on the doctrine which we have always maintained on this side of the House, that our position in India was so secure that it was quite unnecessary to be alarmed about the state of Afghanistan. Our military Frontier was so strong that we could afford to watch and wait. This was our doctrine. Your doctrine was the opposite—that our Frontier was bad, and our position dangerous. But what did you say when the Ameer defeated you in negotiations, and when you did not dare to go to war for the enforcement of your demands? You said—"We will watch and wait. We will not go to war with the Ameer because he will not receive an Envoy. We are confident in our position." In a conversation on October 10, 1876, Lord Lytton said to our Agent, Atta Mahomed—

"As matters now stand, the British Government is able to pour an overwhelming Force into Afghanistan, either for the protection of the Ameer, or the vindication of its own interests, long before a single Russian soldier could reach Cabul."

And he illustrated this statement by "Detailed reference to the statistics of the Russian Military Force in Central Asia, and the British Military Force in India, showing the available troops of either Power within certain distances of Cabul."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, 1878, p. 183.]

Observe what a careful statement this is. And what does Lord Lytton say in the despatch of May 10, 1877? He says, the further course of Cabul politics

"We cannot foresee, and do not attempt to predict. But we await its natural development with increased confidence in the complete freedom and paramount strength of our own position."—[Ibid., 172.]

Here is a confession, on the part of the Government of India, that our position was one of "paramount strength," so that we could afford to be indifferent to the conduct of the Ameer. Well, that was our doctrine. Since the subsequent war arose out of the Russian Mission—which was a mere blister put to your side in consequence of your conduct in Europe—you have no right to saddle the people of India with the expenses of that war. It is a war, by your own confession, not necessary to their defence. I will not go into the somewhat intricate subject of Indian finance; but I will venture to say this—that if there ever was a time when it was most of all unjust to burden the people of India in such a way, it is when the Indian finances are in such a critical state as they are now. We all know the enormous additional burdens which are now imposed by the loss through exchange and by successive Famines. The Government of India has been obliged to impose additional taxation for a Famine Fund. To charge the expense of this war upon the people of India is, therefore, not only inexpedient, but most unjust. It will be a lasting result of your policy that the people of India will be afraid of your casting upon them the cost of all your anti-Russian passions and panics. I do not want to say anything about the future on account of my promise to the noble Earl (the Earl of Beaconsfield); but I believe no possible settlement of the Afghan Question can fail to increase the military cost of our Indian Empire. I should be very glad if I could say anything to support the Government in their immediate object of establishing peace with Yakooob Khan. I have no hesitation in saying that if Yakooob Khan is wise he will agree to almost any reasonable conditions. He is a child in our hands. But the facility with which Afghanistan has been overrun is a proof of the truth of our arguments, and not of yours. It shows that we were able to do it at any moment.

Thenoble Earl at the head of the Government, in a speech at the beginning of the December Session—which I deeply regret I could not be present to hear—condemned, in a very eloquent passage, what he called the "peace-at-any-price" Party. My Lords, my withers are unwrung. I am not one of those who are in favour of peace at any price, and I hope I shall not say anything that will be shocking to the House when I say something about my own feeling with regard to war. It seems to me that on all sides there is a certain amount of insincerity in the language too often used on this subject. When we speak of a war which we approve we talk of its glories. When we speak of a war of which we disapprove we talk of its horrors. Can we not be honest with ourselves on this matter? Can we not admit that war is—not seldom, but very often—by far the least of two evils? I see no signs of the Millennium. Europe is ringing with the tramp of armed men. Men of science are devoting all their time to the invention of some new weapon of destruction. I see no dawning of the day when nations shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning-hooks. War—dear as are all the lives it sacrifices, many as are the hearts it breaks—war is a necessary evil. I do not blame the Government for having armed the country. What I do blame it for is for having armed it at the wrong time and in a wrong cause. In the earlier stages of this Eastern Question, when I think a firm attitude and a few firm words of England might have saved the world from untold horrors, this Government was no better than a respectable Committee of the Society of Friends, with all its helplessness, but without its principles. I understand the policy of my noble Friend on the cross-Bonches (the Earl of Derby). It had its own reasonableness; and, if it had been pursued with consistency, even its own amount of dignity. You might have said, as he said to Turkey—"You have been delinquent and refused to reform, and we leave you to your fate. We will provide for British interests, and nothing else." What I blame the Government for is this—that after they knew British interests would be respected by the Emperor of Russia, they armed the country and very nearly went to war; and the effect was this—that England armed, or appeared to arm, for the sole purpose of resisting the extension of freedom to the Christians in the East of Europe. You have alienated them, and you have failed in supporting Turkey, or in resisting Russia. The consciousness of this is telling on your temper. My Lords, I understand the rancour of the language to which I referred at the beginning of my speech. I understand the mortification with which, in spite of all your Parliamentary triumphs, you look back upon the Treaty of Berlin, which, as I have said, is little more than the Treaty of San Stefano. My Lords, you are beginning to be found out. The people of this country—or at least that portion of the country on which you have relied—are beginning to see that you have not obtained for them what they expected. It is not we, the Members of the Opposition, who are accusing you. Time is your great accuser; the course of events is summing up the case against you. What have you to say—I shall wait to hear—what have you to say why you should not receive an adverse verdict at the hands of your country, as you certainly will be called up for judgment at the bar of history?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, you are aware, and the noble Duke has just reminded you, that at this moment the Ameer of Afghanistan is a self-invited but honoured guest in the English camp, with the avowed object of negotiating a Treaty of peace and friendship with the Queen of England. I must say that, under those circumstances, when I heard of the intended Motion of the noble Duke, and that he was going to call the attention of the House to the results of our foreign policy in Europe and Asia, I think I had some reason yesterday to remind him of that state of affairs to which I have referred, and to leave it with confidence to his discretion—as I left it then—to observe a statesmanlike silence in the circumstances now existing. My Lords, I have been deeply disappointed in these expectations. At this very moment, when such questions as those to which he has referred—such, for example, as the appointment of a European Resident in the cities of that Sovereign—when such questions are still under consideration, are at this very moment the subject of negotiations, the noble Duke has thought it proper, referring, as he said, only to the past, to treat these subjects in a manner—and in a manner which in the present conditions of communication may in 24 hours be known in those parts—which certainly may gravely affect the carriage of those negotiations. When I consider these circumstances—when I remember the position of the noble Duke—a man so eminent for his ability and exalted in his position, a man who has more than once been the trusted counsellor of his Sovereign—when I see such a man come forward with a criticism which I will not call malevolent, but which certainly was envenomed, attacking the policy of the Government, which at this moment must be being weighed and scanned with the most intense interest abroad—I must say that I am astonished. My Parliamentary experience has not been little; but, certainly, in the course of that experience, I remember no similar instance of a person placed in so high a position adopting, under similar circumstances, the course which the noble Duke has thought it right to take. For the reasons which I gave yesterday, I shall certainly not follow the noble Duke into the subject to which he has referred. My noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury), when he addresses your Lordships, will find that, although for the moment he may have to sacrifice the gratification of vindicating his personal honour, there are still some matters with respect to Afghanistan to which the noble Duke has referred to which it is necessary for him to allude. I, however, shall not touch upon them. Unfortunately for us, and, perhaps, still more unfortunately for the noble Duke himself, he was not present at those debates in reference to Afghanistan which took place in this House. Those of your Lordships who were present at those debates can scarcely accept as accurate the picture which the noble Duke drew of those discussions. Your Lordships have been told by the noble Duke that you were obliged to consent to a hurried Vote, moved by Her Majesty's Government, who had already committed this country to a certain policy with regard to Afghanistan, without having consulted Parliament. Your Lordships will recollect that, on the contrary, the subject of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in reference to Afghanistan was discussed for three nights in this House; and that when, with your indulgence, it fell to my duty to wind up the debate upon that occasion—and that after our policy had been criticized and assailed for three nights—I proved, by the production of a despatch written by the late Viceroy of India, that if the distinguished Leaders of the Opposition had been in Office, they would have pursued exactly the same policy which we conceived and which we had the courage to pursue. The result of that debate was that when the matter came to a Division, one of the largest majorities we have ever had in this House sealed with its confidence and its approbation the conduct of Her Majesty's Government.

The Duke of Argyll

My Lords, I will endeavour to follow the noble Duke through the subjects which he dealt with in the order in which he introduced them. The noble Duke, as some compensation for the attack which he made upon our Indian policy, commenced his address by congratulating us. The noble Duke congratulated us upon the great fact that, in part fulfilment of the Treaty of Berlin, the evacuation of Bulgaria and Roumania had been commenced. The noble Duke, in congratulating us on that circumstance, said that it was true, at the same time, that the version which he now gave of the obligatory provision in the Treaty of Berlin respecting the evacuation of those Provinces was not that which we had originally given of it, still that the fact that the evacuation had commenced was so satisfactory that he must congratulate us upon our success in bringing about an agreement under which Russia was to be allowed three more months in which to complete the evacuation. I cannot accept the compliments of the noble Duke. I have always placed upon the 22nd clause of the Treaty of Berlin the same interpretation which I understand the Government of Russia now does. My noble Friend and myself, who have worked together in these transactions, have, I believe, never differed upon any single point in reference to the Treaty except this—I certainly understood that when nine months were appointed for the occupation of these Provinces by the Military Forces of Russia, that period should not include the time allowed for the evacuation of them, which was to commence at the termination of that period of nine months. Occupation and evacuation are different things, and if the evacuation were to be commenced within the nine months the period of the occupation would be proportionately shortened. But holding, as I do, that view of the subject, that is no reason why we should agree to an unreasonable length of time being taken in conducting the evacuation of those Provinces, or to anything affecting the fulfilment of the Treaty. The noble Duke treated, as a matter of course, and as a subject upon which there could be no possible difference of opinion, that Her Majesty's Government have agreed to extend the time for the evacuation of those Provinces to the 3rd of August.

There is not the slightest authority for any statement of the kind. What we are bound by is the view now taken by the majority of the Signatories of the Berlin Treaty, to the effect that the evacuation is to commence on the 3rd of May; and it is to be completed within a reasonable time—which may be computed in weeks rather than months, but, at all events, in a moderate time, as compared with the statement which the noble Duke has made. Therefore, the noble Duke, who prides himself upon his memory, has actually complimented Her Majesty's Government upon a circumstance which, if correct, would have been a disgrace to them.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I used the words of the noble Marquess himself, when I mentioned the 3rd of August.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I certainly never said that the Russians had a right to protract the evacuation for three months.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: The noble Duke then goes on to complain very much of the manner in which he and his Colleagues and Friends have been treated, not in, but out of this House, and, in so doing, he exhibited that sensitiveness which I have already more than once observed is peculiar to the present Opposition. On this point, I did not think that the evidence of the noble Duke was adequate to the occasion. He quoted an extract from a speech of my noble Friend, and he also quoted from the anonymous correspondent of an unknown Society, the name of which I did not catch. But, my Lords, when a subject of this character is brought before your Lordships on a solemn occasion, are charges such as these of the noble Duke to be alleged as charges against Her Majesty's Government? I do not myself much care what people say about me, and I have not much time to make remarks about others; but, certainly, some distinguished Members of Her Majesty's Opposition have appeared in different parts of the country, and, by the elaborate expositions they have made, seem to have spared no time in the preparation of their attacks upon Her Majesty's Government. Upon that subject I will say nothing further than this—I make no charge against either of the two noble Lords the Leaders of the Opposition in either House of Parliament. Their conduct has at all times, throughout the critical four years to which the noble Duke has drawn attention, been such as was to be expected from gentlemen and distinguished statesmen who felt the responsibilities of their position. That, however, cannot be said of all the Members, nor even of all the distinguished Members, of the Party. Although I shall notice nothing of a merely personal nature, I must say that it is much to be regretted that, after so solemn an act as the Treaty of Berlin, of which we have heard so much already to-night, and of which I must myself say something, had been executed—after so solemn an act, and when united Europe had agreed to look upon that Treaty as some assurance for the maintenance of peace and for the general welfare of the world, that certain Members of the Opposition should—not once, or twice, or thrice, but month after month—habitually declare to the world that the Treaty was utterly impracticable, and have used such external influence as they might possess, to neutralize its action, and throw every obstacle and impediment in the way of carrying it into practical effect. Look at the probable result of such action. If statesmen such as these have pledged their opinion over and over again that a Treaty is impracticable, and they after become responsible Ministers, they will be called upon by those who do not wish the Treaty to be fulfilled to carry their opinions into effect.

"Then," says the noble Duke, "I come now to business. You have negotiated a Treaty, but what have you done for Turkey?" And the noble Duke for a considerable time—for more than half-an-hour—made an impassioned appeal to the House, with a view of showing us what ought to have been done for Turkey. From a Minister responsible, I believe, for the Crimean War, such a speech might have been expected—and, in fact, the strongest part of the oration of the noble Duke was an impassioned argument in favour of going to war with Russia in order to preserve the settlement made at the end of the Crimean War. "Well," says the noble Duke, "What have you done? See the losses to Turkey which you have brought about. There is Batoum, a most valuable harbour, which, whatever may be the engagement they have made by the Treaty of Berlin, will be fortified by the Russians. Do you mean to say, if you had acted with sufficient vigour with your great Fleet in the Black Sea, aided by the powerful Fleet of Turkey, that you could not have prevented Russia taking Batoum?" Well, no doubt, we could have prevented Russia taking Batoum, as we prevented Russia taking Constantinople. But the point is this—is the noble Duke prepared, or was he prepared, to go to war to prevent Russia taking Batoum—a port which, with derision, the noble Duke describes as one which Russia has made a free port, and with that we, the English Plenipotentiaries, were satisfied. But the noble Duke quite forgot to say that it was not only made by the Treaty of Berlin a free port, but a port essentially commercial—words which have some meaning, and which the Signatories of the Treaty of Berlin will always remember. The noble Duke says, also—"I can see what will happen in Batoum. It will be a free port, but a fortified one. It will be a strong place, and will control the commerce of Persia." But all this was said long before even the Crimean War—all this was said of the Treaties of 1828 with regard to the harbour of Poti. The very same expression was used, and England was warned that, by obtaining the harbour of Poti, Russia had obtained such a commanding position that the Black Sea would be entirely at her mercy. The noble Duke quite forgot to tell us this—that under the Treaty of Berlin the finest port in the Black Sea, the port of Burgas, was restored to the Sultan. This the noble Duke, who is so candid, omitted to bring to your Lordships' recollection. "Well," then says the noble Duke, "how can you reconcile yourselves to the fact that you have agreed to the destruction of the Danubian fortresses—that Quadrilateral of the East which would have commanded the Danube?" One would suppose, from the way in which the noble Duke had spoken to-night, that there had never been any war between Russia and Turkey—one would suppose that Turkey had never been utterly vanquished, and that the Armies of Russia had never been at the gates of Constantinople. All must be arranged as the noble Duke would have arranged it upon this Table. Surely the claims of Russia were something. Russia, whether right or wrong, had to be considered. However we might approve or disapprove the casus belli and the policy of the war, whatever differences of opinion there might be upon these and similar points, no one could deny for a moment that Russia had completely vanquished Turkey; and to suppose, in these circumstances, that everything was to be left exactly in the same position as at the beginning of the war is an assumption which I think your Lordships will agree is not a very reasonable one. But look at the merits of the case. These fortresses, under the new disposition of territory, would have become Bulgarian fortresses, our policy being to maintain the Turkish Empire—a policy, allow me in passing to remind your Lordships, which is universal in Europe, because every one of the Great Powers who have signed the Treaty of Berlin agreed in this one point—that there was no substitute for the Turkish Power, and that that Power, though it might be reduced, should still be substantially maintained. Were we, then, to leave in the new Bulgarian State this powerful Quadrilateral to menace the Turks and to weaken their authority? Why, of course not. "But," says the noble Duke, "the proposal to destroy these fortresses was made by the Russians themselves." It matters little, but I believe the noble Duke is inaccurate in that respect. The proposal to destroy the fortresses of the Quadrilateral was not a new one. It had been made on previous occasions, and it was always put forward by Russia herself as a concession, and in order to show that the Russians themselves did not wish to obtain these powerful strongholds. Then, says the noble Duke—"You have by the Treaty of Berlin, which is but a revised edition of the Treaty of San Stefano, established Servia as an independent State, and increased its territory!" But the situation of Servia before the war with reference to its connection with the Porte was one of virtual independence. The Porte certainly was the Suzerain, and possessed a claim to a very small tribute—in reality a nominal one, for it was never paid. To pretend that the public acknowledgment of the independence of Servia was a great blow to the Turkish Power, which it was our policy to maintain, is really trifling with so serious a subject as that which is now before your Lordships. Fourthly, the noble Duke says that of all the mockeries by which we have deluded the people, who are, according to him, so easily deceived, the greatest mockery is the arrangement made concerning Roumelia. The Sultan, according to the noble Duke, has no more to do with Roumelia than he has with Roumania itself, and he compares its position with that of the Turkish Power when she was permitted to occupy the fortress of Belgrade. But the noble Duke forgets the fact that, by the Treaty of Berlin, the political and military authority of the Sultan in Roumelia is not only asserted, but secured. It is not simply that he has the right—a right which, no doubt, he will find an opportunity as early as possible of exercising—of occupying the Balkan chain; nor is it simply that he has the power of occupying Burgas, the most important port in the Black Sea. Although we have secured autonomy for Roumelia, and although she has got the blessing of a scheme of local government, which I trust will soon be tried, and which apparently—so far as I can judge—is admirably adapted to the circumstances of the case, the political and military authority of the Sultan is not only asserted, but secured. The noble Duke says that Roumelia is to have a Militia and Gendarmerie of her own; but he forgot to state the conditions, in accordance with which, all the officers of the Militia and Gendarmerie must be appointed by the Sultan, and hold their commissions from him. Well, these are the different points by which the noble Duke has endeavoured to show that, as regards the settlement of Berlin, the interests of Turkey and of the Sultan have been neglected and injured by Her Majesty's Government. My Lords, when the noble Duke first gave his Notice, his intention was to call the attention of the House to the results of the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government in Europe and Asia. Well, yesterday, we heard from the noble Duke that he would confine himself to the past and not trench upon the future. But how you are to judge of a policy, if you are not to treat of the future which is to be the result of that policy, I really find some difficulty in comprehending. If the noble Duke will allow me to say so, when he talks of a "policy," policy depends, of course, upon the circumstances to which the conduct of responsible men is applied. Let us take a larger and more candid view than the noble Duke has taken of those important matters of four years' duration in the East. What led to this Treaty of Berlin? It was four years ago, the noble Duke reminds us, when certain disorders first arose among the border-populations of Turkey in Europe. After months of disorder, during which there were communications between the Powers, there came the famous instrument called the Andrassy Note. That was in December, 1875, and was the commencement of these diplomatic campaigns and wars. I am sure your Lordships do not wish to hear much about the Andrassy Note; but I believe the noble Duke has completely misapprehended the whole situation—the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, and the principles on which their policy was established. The Andrassy Note was a very elaborate mode of ameliorating the subject-populations in European Turkey. Well, the first feeling of Her Majesty's Government was not to accept that Note. They remembered their engagements under the Treaty of Paris, and they knew the danger which might occur from again disturbing the settlement then made. But, my Lords, when we investigated that document, we found really that the Porte was not called upon to make any concession or to enter into any engagement which they had not by previous irades themselves undertaken to concede and to act upon. Well, it is possible that our fear of contributing to the disturbances in Europe might have prevented our even then acceding to that Note. It was at the solicitation of the Porte itself, when it heard that there was a possibility of England holding out, that we ultimately acceded. I believe, my Lords, that after the Andrassy Note there was a bona fide attempt on the part of the Porte to meet the difficulties of the case. But, consider what was the condition of affairs at that moment. Those disturbances were in the Border Provinces of the Turkish Dominion in Europe; the Central power was wonderfully relaxed; the Provincial administration was incompetent and corrupt; the Chiefs in the mountain districts were always at civil war and plundering all their neighbours who did not resist them; and in this state of affairs it was thought some decided action should be taken; and after a few months a proposition was made in the form of the famous Berlin Memorandum, which if we had agreed to, we should have joined the other Powers in making war upon Turkey. We refused to do that; and Parliament and the country entirely sanctioned our declining to accept the Berlin Memorandum. My Lords, almost simultaneously with the introduction of the Berlin Memorandum there occurred the assassination of the European Consuls at Salonica. Soon afterwards there came a revolution in Constantinople, the deposition of the Sovereign by force, and other circumstances of the most painful nature, which I need not recall to the recollection of your Lordships. Well, after this came the Bulgarian insurrection; and after that the Servian declaration of war against Turkey, which ended in the complete defeat of Servia by Turkey. Then what did Her Majesty's Government do? It was at that time, when Russia, having interfered, in consequence of the prostrate state of Servia, with her Ultimatum, and by her menace forced Turkey to make peace, or grant an armistice equivalent to peace, with Servia—it was then that Her Majesty's Government came forward with a proposition which became celebrated, and that was to establish autonomy in those Provinces which had been so long the scene and theatre of this reckless misgovernment. And then the noble Duke says that our conduct has been such that we have necessarily lost the affections and confidence of the then subject-races of Turkey. My Lords, it was my noble Friend on the cross-Benches (the Earl of Derby) who had the honour of making these distinct propositions with regard to Bosnia and Herzegovina which were ultimately to be applied to Bulgaria. And let me remind the noble Duke, who speaks of us as on all occasions neglecting the interests and not sympathizing with the fortunes of the Christian races, that we were the first Government that laid down the principle that the chief remedy for this miserable state of affairs was the introduction of a large system of self-government, and, above all, of the principle of civil and religious liberty.

The Earl of Beaconsfield

My Lords, I am obliged, on an occasion like the present, to very much curtail remarks which I would wish to place before you; but it is necessary, after the speech of the noble Duke, that I should remove impressions which are absolutely unfounded—that I should recall to your recollection what are the principles on which the policy of Her Majesty's Government is founded, and show your Lordships that the noble Duke has entirely mistaken that policy. He has—unintentionally—placed before you a description of affairs utterly unreal, imputed to us motives which we never acknowledged, and conduct and feelings towards others which we never shared. Now, has there been any inconsistency in our policy? When war between Russia and Turkey was so imminent that it was a question of hours, my noble Friend upon the cross-Benches (the Earl of Derby) proposed that there should be a Conference at Constantinople, at which my noble Friend near me (the Marquess of Salisbury) should be our Plenipotentiary. Has the noble Duke, who studies these matters—who not only makes long speeches, but writes long books about them—has the noble Duke ever heard, or has he forgotten, the Instructions given to my noble Friend near me by my noble Friend on the cross-Benches—Instructions as to the course he was to pursue at the Conference at Constantinople? I cannot, my Lords, venture to refer to those Instructions which lie before me at any length; but I may remind you of some of their salient points. In one paragraph my noble Friend was instructed that it became requisite, in the then crises, to take steps, by an agreement between the Powers, for the establishment of reform in the Turkish Provinces which would combine the elective principle with external guarantees for efficient administration. Then the means are indicated by which that state of things might be brought about. Well, my Lords, that is but a specimen to show the purport of those Instructions, which completely mastered the application of the principle of autonomy; and no Government in Europe at this Conference was so ready, so prepared, or so practical in its propositions by which the welfare of the subject-races and a general reform of the administration of Turkey could be effected as was the Government of England, so represented at the Conference by my noble Friend. And yet the noble Duke comes down here and makes an inflammatory harangue, and speaks of the deplorable consequences which he fears will arise—that we have lost for ever the confidence and affection of the subject-races of Turkey by our utter disregard of their feelings and neglect of their interests. Why, my Lords, if I were to read to you this Minute of my noble Friend near me of the proposition which he himself made as regards Montenegro, Servia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Bulgaria, and the reforms that might be established in all the Provinces of Turkey, you would see that at the Conference of Constantinople he endeavoured to have carried into effect, as much as he possibly could, the policy we had laid down, both in the Instructions given to my noble Friend, and in the propositions for establishing autonomy in Bosnia and the Herzegovina which were made by my noble Friend on the cross-Benches some months before. Well, my Lords, you know very well what occurred. We failed—not England only—but Europe failed in preventing war. Our objects were two-fold. We wished to maintain Turkey as an independent political State. That was the common opinion of Europe. It is very easy to talk of the Ottoman Power being at the point of extinction; but when you come practically to examine the question, there is no living statesman who has ever offered, or pretended to offer, any practical solution of the difficulties which would occur if the Ottoman Empire were to fall to pieces. One result would probably be a long and general war; and that alone, I think, is a sufficient reason for endeavouring to maintain as a State the Ottoman Empire. But, while holding as a principle that the Ottoman Empire must be maintained, we have always been of opinion, and held it as a principle of English policy, that the only way to strengthen it was to improve the condition of its subjects. My Lords, I do not say this out of vague philanthropy, or any of that wild sentimentalism which is vomited in society which is sometimes called political. No, my Lords, it was our conviction that that was the only means by which the maintenance of the Ottoman Empire could be secured; and we have acted accordingly. Until the war commenced we consistently endeavoured—first, to prevent war, and, secondly, to ameliorate the condition of the subject-races of the Porte; and when the war took place, we determined that when peace was negotiated it should not be negotiated without the knowledge and sanction of Great Britain. We are told, my Lords, that the Treaty of Berlin did nothing for the Sultan. Looking to the first object of our policy—which was the maintenance of the Sultan—let me show what our signature to the Treaty of Berlin produced as regards the political position. Bulgaria was confined to the North of the Balkans, instead of the arrangement that was made under the Treaty of San Stefano; Thrace, Macedonia, and the littoral of the Ægean were restored to the Sultan; the Slav Principalities of Servia and Montenegro were restricted within reasonable limits; the disturbed districts of Bosnia and Herzegovina were placed under the administration of Austria, which was thus offered as a barrier to Slav aggression; and Eastern Roumelia was created with an organic Statute which, if wisely accepted by the people of that Province, ought to make them one of the most prosperous communities in the world.

The noble Duke tells us that the Treaty of Berlin is a political imposture, and that we are found out. Let me place before your Lordships very briefly what was the state of affairs effected by the Treaty of San Stefano, and what was the state of affairs effected by the Treaty of Berlin—remembering that the noble Duke dinned into our ears that the Treaty of Berlin was but a copy of the Treaty of San Stefano. At the time the Treaty of San Stefano was signed the Russian Armies were at the gates of Constantinople. They occupied the greater part of the East and North of European Turkey. A vast Slav State was to stretch from the Danube to the Ægean shores, extending inwards from Salonica to the mountains of Albania—a State which, when formed, would have crushed the Greek population, exterminated the Mussulmans, and exercised over the celebrated Straits that have so long been the scene of political interest the baneful and inevitable influence of the Slavs. That was the state of affairs when the Treaty of San Stefano was signed; and the British Government, with great difficulty, but with equal determination, succeeded in having that Treaty submitted to the consideration of Congress—the Congress of Berlin. And what were the results of that Congress? I have placed before your Lordships the main features of the settlement of San Stefano. Let me now place before your Lordships what were the results of the Treaty of Berlin. In the first place, the Russian Armies quitted their menacing position at the gates of Constantinople. That City, notwithstanding many promises, was not entered. The Russian Armies gradually retired, and at last quitted Adrianople and all that district, and they are now evacuating Bulgaria and Roumelia in consequence of the Treaty of Berlin. Bulgaria itself, by the Treaty of Berlin, becomes a Vassal and tributary Province of the Porte. Eastern Roumelia becomes a Province governed by an organic Statute which secures local representation, provincial administration, civil and religious liberty, and many other conditions and arrangements which it would be wearisome now to enter into, but which some day, and shortly, I am sure your Lordships will read with interest. The condition of Crete was very unsatisfactory and perplexing, but it was met by an organic Statute which has the sympathy of the whole population. Montenegro, by the Treaty of Berlin, got that accession of territory which really was necessary to its existence, and that access to the sea which was necessary to its prosperity. Serbia obtained independence by fulfilling the conditions of the Congress of Berlin—that the independence of no new State should be acknowledged which did not secure the principles of religious liberty in its constitution; and Roumania also would have been equally acknowledged, had not difficulties arisen on that subject; which, however, will be overcome, I have reason to believe, and which certainly England, and no doubt the other Signatories of the Treaty of Berlin, will endeavour to overcome. Well, my Lords, I think, after that, it cannot be said that the Treaty of Berlin is a mere copy of the Treaty of San Stefano. I think, after that, it cannot be denied that it is one of those great public Instruments which, in all probability, will influence the life of Europe, and possibly have an even more extended influence for a considerable time. I look upon it as an Instrument which has in it that principle of evolution which we hear of in other matters equally interesting. I believe it will not only effect the reforms which it has immediately in view, but that it will ultimately tend to the general welfare of mankind. The noble Duke laughs at the idea of our effecting any beneficial change in the administration of Asia Minor. Well, my Lords, there is nothing difficult or great that is not laughed at in the beginning. The noble Duke is not the man whom I should have thought would have discredited the attempt that is making. But nothing has been done in this direction, says the noble Duke. Well, in the first place, if the noble Duke supposes that the regeneration of Asia Minor is to be like the occupation of Bulgaria, an affair of nine months, he entertains views of Oriental life and character which I venture to deny. But are there are no symptoms of change, and change for the better, even in Asia Minor? I think the fact that an eminent statesman like Midhat Pasha has been recalled from exile and appointed Governor of Syria—the first Governor appointed for a term of years which cannot be capriciously reduced—is one on which we may congratulate ourselves; and I have reason to believe that the influence of that statesman on his Government is not slight. We must also remember that, under the Treaty of Berlin, there are a variety of Commissioners of Demarcation settling the boundaries of the different States and Provinces, and so carrying out a work of incalculable value. That, also, is being accomplished in consequence of that Treaty. The noble Duke has, through his attack on the Government, made a warlike speech. He has told Turkey that she has in us an Ally on whom she cannot depend. He has told Russia that she has only to pursue her policy of aggression, and that it will be accepted by the English Government. And, as far as I can understand him, the noble Duke does not treat with any disapprobation the policy of Russia in that respect. Now, I wish to speak in another tone, but a sincere one, in regard to Russia. I think I can, as an English Minister, appeal with pride on behalf of my Colleagues and myself to the fact that those great results in regard to the policy which we recommended were, perhaps, not uninfluenced by the presence of a magnificent British Fleet in Eastern waters, and by the firm tone in which Her Majesty's Government communicated with St. Petersburg. Notwithstanding, I willingly acknowledge there has been, on the part of Russia, a spirit of wise forbearance, and I believe that she is sincerely anxious to bring about in that part of the world which has been the scene of all these disasters and distressing circumstances a state of affairs which, not only for her own sake, but for the sake of all, we should assist her in bringing about. My Lords, I feel I have trespassed on your attention; but the noble Duke made so serious and so elaborate a charge upon the Government that it was impossible for me to be silent. I have not, perhaps, said many things I ought to have said, and I may have said some things which I ought not to have said; but this I know—the noble Duke says we are a most powerful Government; but, says he, "If you are a most powerful Government, it is only because you are powerful in Parliament." Well, that is a state of affairs which it is not very easy to parallel in the history of this country. I know that in Opposition men indulge in dreams. I have had experience of Opposition, and I hope it has left me, it may be a wiser even if a sadder man. I know that there are mirages that rise up before the political eye which are extremely delightful and equally deceptive; and I say, knowing of what materials the Parliament of England is formed, knowing whom I address now, and knowing who sit in the other House, where I was once their companion, I cannot but believe that the large majorities which the noble Duke has dwelt upon have been accorded to the present Government because it was believed they were a Government resolved to maintain the fame and strength of England.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that in whatever way the Conference of Constantinople was looked at, it must be admitted to be a failure, and that the result had been to put a weapon in the hands of Russia. We should have found some common mode of action in regard to the affairs of Eastern Europe and Asia; instead of which, the policy of Her Majesty's Government had placed in the hands of Russia to carry into effect the resolutions of the Conference of Constantinople. He had always maintained that we should never have gone into the Conference unless we were prepared to insist upon the Sultan carrying out what the European Powers desired. But we did nothing of the kind. We left the execution of our resolutions to Russia, and so strengthened the hands of her enemy. The noble Earl the Prime Minister had accused the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) of advocating a warlike policy; but, as he understood the noble Duke, his meaning was this—there was one of two courses open; either they must pursue the policy of the Crimean War, and support the Ottoman Empire against its enemies by force—or they must recognize the fact that, after a long trial, the Crimean War policy had broken down, and some other means must be taken to secure, if possible, their interests in the East. Noble Lords on that side of the House had also been accused of favouring the projects of Russia. On the contrary, they did not take into consideration what were the interests of Russia—the only question they looked to was what was for the interests of this country, and how they could best be maintained; and what they complained of was, that Her Majesty's Government, after laying down certain principles, had allowed Russia to carry them into effect; and in the name of those principles Russia had used force, and had weakened the Ottoman Empire by the course she had adopted. The British Fleet was ostensibly sent to the Bosphorus for the protection of British subjects, and it might possibly have strengthened the Turks in their determination to resist Russia, but he did not think it produced any effect on the situation beyond, perhaps, causing embarrassment to this country. He differed from the noble Earl in regarding the erection of Servia into an independent State as a trifling matter. Servia represented a considerable nationality and great interests in that part of Europe; and although the complete independence of Servia might not diminish the direct resources of the Porte, it dealt a moral blow at the position of the Ottoman Empire, and it enabled the new State to negotiate directly with foreign Powers. No one could deny the importance of the change made by erecting Bulgaria into a semi-independent Principality. No doubt, now that Bulgaria was practically independent, it was an advantage to the Porte that the Hungarian fortresses should be razed; but was fallacious to look at the action of a particular period. What his noble friend (the Duke of Argyll) had done was, by looking at the general results of war and of our policy, to compare the position of the Ottoman Empire when these great transactions commenced with the position in which it is now. The noble Earl had referred Roumelia, and stated that it remained under "the direct political and military authority" of the Sultan. This was, no doubt, the phrase used in the Treaty, but it was no more than a mere phrase, and the Plenipotentiaries must have laughed in their sleeves when they wrote down. What was this direct political and military authority of the Sultan? It consisted in this—that the Governor General was to be a Christian appointed by the Porte, but with the assent of the Powers. That was the "direct political authority" of the Sultan—his direct authority was limited by the assent of the Powers. Then as to the direct military authority of the Sultan, the Porte was not to interfere in the military administration of the Province, except at the invitation of the Christian Governor General. He believed they could be very fortunate if they had not provided in these Articles a new source of anxiety, perplexity, and danger to the Porte. Bosnia and Herzegovina were taken away from the Porte: how could that be considered an advantage to Turkey?

The Earl of Beaconsfield

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD said, he had not represented that as an advantage to Turkey, but that the arrangement made with Austria was satisfactory to Turkey, and that was an advantageous arrangement for which they were indebted to the Treaty of Berlin.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he regarded it as a source of satisfaction that Austria had advanced in that direction; but, looking at the whole result of the Ottoman Empire, no one could doubt that the severance of this large province was a misfortune to Turkey. It was said that in Asia Minor there was a prospect of considerable reforms being effected; but the noble Earl said they could not be effected in the short period of nine months. It was not a question of nine months—there had been a period of 20 years since the Treaty of Paris, and during that 20 years not only had no progress been made, but there was unmistakable evidence of retrogression. They had now given a new guarantee of Turkish territory, stipulating that it should be accompanied by reform of the Turkish administration. He utterly disbelieved in such reforms being effected. They might be talked about or negotiated about, but he did not believe in their execution. Let their Lordships observe our position under the Article which provided for reforms in Armenia. The Porte was periodically to make known the measures taken in the way of reform to the Powers, who were to superintend their execution. Were the measures taken to prevent the aggression of Russia to be jointly superintended by Russia and ourselves? Russia was entitled, jointly with us, to superintend the reforms to be made. That was one of the most extraordinary stipulations he had ever heard of in any Treaty. He had no expectation whatever that the Treaty would be carried into effect—the thing could not be done—but he looked with apprehension to the position which this country would occupy hereafter when the Treaty was a dead letter. That position would not be an honourable one. His noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll) had said that he saw no reason to be dissatisfied, on the whole, with the results of the Treaty of Berlin. But what did his noble Friend mean? He meant that the results of the Treaty, so far from being what the Government had put forward for the admiration of Europe and the gratitude of this country—namely, the preservation of the independence and integrity of Turkey—had, on the contrary, been in the direction indicated by the opponents of their policy. They (the Opposition) did not wish that Russia should put her foot on the neck of Turkey—what they did wish was, that Her Majesty's Government with Russia should so co-operate in promoting the happiness of the populations as to secure the gratitude of the Christian States which would succeed to the Ottoman Empire.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I should have preferred not to make any observations in this debate, and I do not know that I need trouble you at any length, for I think that to the least practised Member of your Lordships' House it will be obvious that, in the speech which he has made, the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) was only flogging a dead horse. I must say, however, that I look with some alarm on the precedent the noble Duke has set. If every distinguished Member of this House who spends his winter on the shores of the Mediterranean thinks himself entitled to make, when he comes back, all the speeches he would have made had he remained at home, I fear the time left at our disposal will be very limited. My Lords, the noble Duke commenced by saying that his sensitive nerves had been much afflicted by the bad language which noble Lords sitting on these front Benches have used, and dwelt upon the language which he thinks they ought to use—and then he proceeded to give an example of it. After rebuking us for the harsh nature of the remarks that some of us have addressed to him, he said that we had “duped the English people;” that we had been “guilty of political misdemeanours;” that we had been “guilty of political cowardice;” that we have been “shuffling with our public engagements,” and “double-dealing with the Native Princes;” and that, compared with us, the Native Princes, Hindoo and Mahomedan, were fair-dealing and truth-telling people. I think, after that catalogue of flowers of oratory, we are still in debt, and that if the balance is to be struck there is still a large amount of bad language due from this side of the House to the other. Indeed, if we take into account all that has been said, not by irresponsible Members of the other House, but by Members of weight and position—Members of the late Government—I think there will be a perfect bankruptcy on our side. I am not going to attempt to make up the deficiency. I acknowledge that we are greatly in debt, and I feel that it would be impossible for me in that respect to compete with the noble Duke; but I would wish to justify in the calmest language I can command my observation that the noble Duke did execute “a very sharp curve” in the autumn of 1876. More than once the noble Duke has, in this House, represented that the Crimean War was undertaken with a view to give Turkey, more than 20 years ago, an opportunity of reform. I remember the debates at that period—it is rather hard work, but I have refreshed my memory on the subject, and examining the speeches of the noble Duke, who was then a responsible Minister, and those of Lord Palmerston, as well as those of other leading men, I cannot find a trace of the theory that the Crimean War was undertaken for the purpose of giving time for Turkey to reform. It was undertaken for the purpose—for the sole purpose—of repelling the aggressions of Russia on the Ottoman Empire.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I have never stated that it was undertaken for the purpose of giving Turkey time to reform. I said that Turkey had had that time to reform.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: When the Tripartite Treaty, so definite and distinct in its provisions, was concluded which bound England, in conjunction with Austria and France, to defend the independence and integrity of Turkey, no hint was given that it was to depend upon Turkey progressing in the path of reform. On the contrary, that idea about the reform of Turkey was introduced, apologetically as it were, to calm the apprehensions of Mr. Cobden and to soothe the nerves of Mr. Milner Gibson, but was never held out as the object of the Crimean War. But I will cite a Member of the Government at that time, who was responsible for the Crimean War, and who will, least of all, be suspected of bellicose instincts. Mr. Gladstone said—

“With respect to the objects for which the war had been undertaken, it appears to me that my right hon. Friend has quite misunderstood them in the construction which he gives to the terms ‘independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire,’ and to the guarantee of that independence. I apprehend, what we sought to secure by the war was not the settlement of any question regarding the internal government of Turkey. . . . The juxtaposition of a people professing the Mahomedan religion with a rising Christian population having adverse and conflicting influences presents difficulties which are not to be overcome by certain diplomatists at certain hours and in certain places. It will be the work and care of many generations—if even then they were successful—to bring that state of things to a happy and prosperous conclusion. But there was another danger—the danger of the encroachment upon, and the absorption of, Turkey by Russia, which would bring . . . such a danger to the peace, liberties, and privileges of all Europe—that we were called upon absolutely to resist by all the means in our power.”—[3 Hansard, cxlii. 95-6.]

The Marquess of Salisbury

That was the language of Mr. Gladstone in 1856. There was no talk then of "bag and baggage." But what I wish to insist upon is this—that those Ministers who were responsible for maintaining the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire by war maintained that policy through the 14 years that elapsed up to the time when the Franco-German War broke out, and they were called upon to examine the results of the Crimean War and the work of 1856. They then confirmed deliberately everything done and stipulated in 1856 without a single word about these reforms of Turkish institutions which, five years later, seemed to them so all-important. The noble Duke said it was the business of the Opposition to oppose. Of opposition in this House I should not complain; but what was the history of the year 1876? In June, 1876, if one of those dictionaries of contemporaries, which are published now-a-days, had occasion to describe the opinions of the noble Duke, it would have said that he was one of the authors of the Crimean War, the object of which was to defend the independence and integrity of Turkey against the designs of Russia: and that so far he had not altered his opinions. That was the case up to June, 1876; there was scarcely a hint given, either by him or by Mr. Gladstone, of any modification of opinion until Parliament separated. But when Parliament separated, and it was no longer possible to summon it, then arose that tremendous "Bulgarian Atrocity" agitation, which was dictated, I fully believe, as regards those who were, in the first instance, responsible for it, by the purest and most unmixed feeling of philanthropy and humanity. But what was done by the Opposition of that day is something unique in our history. At the moment when this country seemed threatened by a foreign Power, and when it was impossible to ascertain by a Constitutional test what the opinion of the country was, they produced a false impression of that opinion by plunging the country into a tremendous agitation by which they tried, without success, to wrest the control of foreign affairs from the hands of Her Majesty's Government, and, unfortunately, with more success, to impress upon foreign Powers the conviction that the policy of the Crimean War was abandoned and that England would witness the destruction of Turkey unmoved. Mr. Fox was deeply blamed because he sympathized with and supported those who were in arms against his country; but, at least, Mr. Fox differed from some of his later disciples, in that in so doing he was supporting opinions which through his whole life he had maintained. We complain, not only of a conversion right round, and of a conversion at a critical moment, but of a conversion which was so timed that it produced a fatally misleading impression upon foreign Powers—an impression which it was materially impossible for the Government at that moment to counteract. I do not for a moment suggest that these things were intended by the noble Duke and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone); but I do suggest that they allowed their Party passions utterly to blind their prudence as statesmen. I feel confident that, but for the unhappy part taken at that time, we had good hopes of persuading Turkey in the first instance, and Russia in the second, to a wiser course than that which they ultimately pursued. The noble Duke has seasoned his discourse with sundry flowers of oratory principally directed against me. I cannot entirely pass by the accusations he has made, although they refer to matters which are res judicata, which have been submitted to both Houses of Parliament, and decided over and over again in both Houses of Parliament, by overwhelming majorities. In the first place, the noble Duke, in reference to the Asiatic matter, accused us of deliberately insulting all the Mahomedan subjects of the Queen. I cannot conceive where he gets the foundation for that accusation. We distrusted undoubtedly—and we deeply distrusted—a particular Native Agent who was at that time employed at the Court of Cabul. I am not sure whether he is alive or dead; but he is, at all events, an absent man, and it is not necessary for my argument that I should explain why we distrusted him. It is sufficient for me to state that that was the case; but I never said anything to show that I distrusted the honesty of the other Mahomedan subjects of the Queen. There are two grounds on which Natives were unsuitable for Agents at such stations as Herat and Candahar. In the first place, they were not impartial. I do not mean that they were not impartial as between the Ameer and the British Go-vornment, for I do not think there was much danger in that respect. They were, however, placed on the confines of Afghanistan, and, among other places, at Herat, which is on the confines of Persia and Afghanistan. As everyone knows, the Mahomedans are divided into two sects, who feel so bitterly towards each other, that a member of one sect would not be a very suitable Agent for the purpose of determining differences which might arise between them. I do not wish to dwell very much on that point, although it was a consideration which weighed with us. But there was a very much more important consideration. The principal danger which we wanted to avert by placing British Agents in Afghanistan was—and there is no reason to conceal it—connected entirely with the aggression of a European Power. Well, which was the most likely to act efficiently and intelligently to fulfil our orders as we desired them to be fulfilled and to obtain the information which it was valuable for us to secure—which was most likely—a European or an Asiatic? Obviously, it was only a European who could understand the position as it existed between England and Russia, and who could obtain for us the information and exercise the influence which would be a real security to us. Therefore, I repudiate as entirely unfounded the idea that, in preferring an English to a Native Agent at Candahar and Herat, we expressed any sentiments which were insulting to the vast majority of Her Majesty's Mahomedan and Hindoo subjects. I must further add that, unless such a charge was so absolutely certain as to make it necessary to bring it before Parliament, I cannot conceive any conduct less likely to be advantageous to the Public Service than that of the noble Duke in discussing such a matter in this House. The very considerations which ought to have prevented him from mentioning it prevent me from enlarging, as I should otherwise do, on what I regard as the dangerous tendency of his conduct. Then we are said to have "shuffled with Treaties," as the noble Duke described it in his mild language. The shuffling with Treaties arises from the fact, according to him, that we urged the admission of British Agents to Afghanistan, although we had, by the Treaty of 1855, promised Dost Mahomed that we would not do so.

Well, it is said in that Treaty itself, with regard to then pending negotiations with Persia, that—

"British officers, with suitable establishments and orderlies, shall be deputed, at the pleasure of the British Government, to Cabul, or Kandahar, or Balkh, or all three places, or wherever an Afghan Army may be assembled to act against the Persians."—[Afghanistan, No. 1 (1878), p. 2.]

It is then said that a subsidy should be given to the Ameer, and that whenever the subsidy ceased the British officers should be withdrawn.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Withdrawn from what?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: From the Ameer's country. That was a provision made for sending British officers to the Afghan Army at one particular crisis when it was engaged in a campaign against Persia; and yet the noble Duke quotes it as a Treaty binding us for all time not to urge the admission of British officers as Agents within the dominions of the Ameer. If there has been any shuffling used in the course of this debate, I submit that it has been used by the wrong party. Then comes the charge of double-dealing with the Ameer. I am totally unable to understand on what that charge rests. The noble Duke cites my secret Instructions to Lord Lytton, and says I desired him to give "a dynastic guarantee" to Shere Ali. There is nothing about a dynastic guarantee in my Instructions. All I said was that we should be glad to make certain propositions for the purpose of assuring the Ameer with respect to the succession of his heir Abdoolah Jan. The proposition which was made was of a limited character. It was a perfectly straightforward and honest proposition, and I cannot conceive how it can be liable to the imputation of double-dealing. Again, I must protest against the treatment which Lord Lytton has received to-night. Of course, I am not here to say that his conduct is not to be canvassed, that his acts are not to be examined, and that Her Majesty's Government are not to be censured if necessary. But to impute to him acts of a dishonourable character—for it is nothing less which the noble Duke did—in reference to a matter which has already been decided by both Houses of Parliament, and which has really passed into the domain of history, can serve no possible purpose, except to wound Lord Lytton in the distant discharge of his difficult and delicate duties, and to injure the respect in which he is held by both Natives and Europeans in India. It seems to me that such a proceeding as that is an abuse of the liberty of speech which the Houses of Parliament practice—an abuse which is damaging to the reputation of this country, and dangerous to its greatest and highest interests abroad. I think there is nothing further for me to say in respect to India except this. The noble Duke deprecated India being asked to pay for any costs of the Afghan War, because we had practically admitted that Afghanistan was perfectly indefensible, and we had shown it by the ease with which it had been overrun. It was not the military question of the defence of Afghanistan which was mainly in our minds when we adopted our recent policy. It was not on military grounds that we objected to the reception of the Russian Mission and the exercise of Russian influence in Afghanistan. It was because we were not prepared, if Afghanistan were closed to ourselves, to see it made the base for such diplomatic operations as those which have in recent times been conducted in the Provinces of Turkey. If such operations were conducted from a base upon our own borders, it would have been an addition to our anxieties and our difficulties, and a peril to the tranquillity of India, which we should be justified in asking India to join with us in dissipating. With regard to Turkey, I must say a few words as to the constitution of Eastern Roumelia, to which the noble Earl who spoke last (the Earl of Kimberley) referred. The noble Earl ridicules the possession of political and military authority there by the Sultan. The idea that we had in constituting Eastern Roumelia was that we should separate the internal government of the country, which it was shown, whether the Turks were wise or foolish, could not be conducted by them with that harmony which was desirable—that we should separate that from the functions of government relating to military defence. We were anxious to enable the people, as far as possible, to govern themselves: but as regards all external matters, as regards the defence of the country, as regards the prevention of insurrections or the prevention of invasion, we thought that the direct authority should still be left to the Sultan. What provisions did we make for that purpose? The whole military authority of the country is in the hands of the Sultan. The Militia is to be commanded entirely by officers appointed by the Sultan, the gendarmerie is to be commanded entirely by officers appointed by the Sultan. If there is insurrection, the only troops which can be summoned are Turkish; these are to be summoned only at the instance of the Governor named by the Sultan; and the Sultan has the absolute right of occupying both the littoral parts of the Province and all its frontier. Therefore, for all external purposes, Eastern Roumelia is under the direct rule of the Sultan. I am aware that the Province will, as to internal affairs, be largely self-governed—but that was the distinction we desired to draw—the internal government is to be entirely in the hands of the people, while the foreign, political, and military relations are entirely in the hands of the Sultan. That, as has been said, is a state of things precisely analogous to the position of a British Colony. The same may be said of the other Provinces which we have rescued by the Treaty of Berlin from the great Slav State. The noble Duke appears to think that unless the Sultan is the absolute and despotic master, he can have no dominion worth speaking of either in Macedonia or in Eastern Roumelia. That is not our opinion. We feel that the Turkish Empire may remain as a comparatively limited Monarchy, although as an entirely absolute Monarchy it could not. The noble Earl who spoke last (the Earl of Kimberley) referred to a matter which is very germane to the present purpose, although it belongs to many years ago—I mean the junction of the two Principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, and he said that he was opposed to the opinion of Lord Palmerston, who objected to their union. I was surprised that the noble Earl mentioned that instance, and mentioned it especially in reference to the creation of Native States. I remember very well a very brilliant speech made by Mr. Gladstone—I have a lively recollection of it, because it persuaded me to vote with him—in which Mr. Gladstone told us that the breasts of free men were the surest defence of nations, and that if only we would meet the wishes of these people, and would allow them to combine, we should find this free, independent, healthy State the best bulwark against the aggressions of Russia. I am not here to discuss the conduct of Roumania; but I ask whether, on a review of the last three years, you are under the impression that Roumania has been an effective bulwark against the aggressions of Russia? I believe there is a great deal of loose talk about the power of these small States to resist the power of any great military neighbour. Many years must elapse before they can attain either the coherence or the actual material vigour which is necessary to enable them to fulfil any such function. And when I heard the noble Earl conclude his speech by telling us that we ought to have secured the gratitude of these people, and that we should be strong in their gratitude, I felt inclined to ask him to look back upon his own historical lore, and to give me any one instance—I have puzzled my brains to recollect one—in which a people have, moved by their gratitude for past favours, been led to take a political line against their own existing interests. I cannot remember a case of the kind. I do not speak of individuals. You may find Potentates who have it, but you will not find a people. I ask the noble Earl to look over the past century and to think who are the people who have fought with England, and who are those who have received gifts of blood and treasure from England for their defence—and then, glancing at the state of the world, to say whether those whom we have helped the most are now our best friends, or whether those whom we have opposed the most are now our most determined enemies. The whole idea is purely sentimental. It may animate poets and be a pleasant theme for historians; but to put it forward as a fact on which politicians and statesmen can found their calculations and confidently depend is, I believe, a mere chimera. With regard to the Ottoman Porte and the stipulations of the Treaty of Berlin, we were anxious to maintain the interests of the Porte, although it was not able to maintain its ancient boundaries. We felt that the surest hope of preserving its existence lay in placing a more limited strain upon its resources. We tried to preserve it, because it seemed to us to be one of the most important barriers against a dangerous advance. And in desiring to place a bulwark against the increase of the Slavonic principle we thought we did wisely to look, not only to the Porte, but to Austria. I still entertain the opinion that that occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina—although there is much in it that excites regret—is one of the most important results for the tranquillity of Europe which have been achieved. I believe the results that have been attained by the Treaty of Berlin have placed Turkey in a position in which, if she has still the elements of social vitality, as we think she has—if she has statesmen who are fitted to conduct her through this difficult crisis, are the arrangements which are best adapted to assure her a prolonged existence. We cannot revive the dead; and if the gloomy auguries that we hear on the other side are true, of course the efforts of diplomatists and statesmen are worthless. But we can at least give time for ascertaining whether these gloomy anticipations are correct, or whether there is not really that promise of the fulfilment of the brighter hopes that we have entertained, and, at all events, of postponing what will be one of the most terrible visitations that can befall the world whenever it shall occur. This result we believe the Berlin Treaty has achieved; and that it has been achieved without the shedding of a drop of English blood is a matter on which we may congratulate ourselves.

The Marquess of Salisbury

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, considering the thin attendance now in the House, as compared with the numbers who were present when my noble Friend the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) and the noble Earl at the head of the Government were speaking, I feel that it would be improper for me to occupy much of your time. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) thinks we are flogging a dead horse; but the objects we are flogging are Her Majesty's Government; and although I do not believe them to be immortal, I should certainly be sorry if they were already defunct. The noble Earl the First Minister administered a severe rebuke to the noble Duke for having alluded to past transactions in relation to Afghanistan, although the noble Duke had carefully avoided referring to matters bearing on the present negotiations—whereas the noble

Marquess has himself been guilty of the very fault he corrected in the noble Duke. The noble Earl said it was impossible for the Government to meet the noble Duke on that ground, because their mouths were closed; but the noble Marquess, on the contrary, got up and rushed at once into the part of the question connected with the placing of British Agents on the Frontiers of Afghanistan. The noble Marquess held that the Article of the Treaty of 1857 with respect to that point has nothing whatever to do with the question; but an examination of its terms, although I am no lawyer, convinces me that it has everything to do with it, as your Lordships may see for yourselves by reading the Treaty. There has been a good deal of something like banter—and I do not object to it—as to the violence of the language that has been used. All I can say is this—that when the noble Marquess described his own language in speaking of political matters, of political foes, and even sometimes of political friends, as mild, it takes from me all grounds of defence, either for the past or for the future, because it shows that in his remarkably clear head there is one deficiency—he is not aware of the value of the words in the English language. The noble Marquess said something about carrying out reforms in the Turkish Empire. It appears to me that if your Lordships were present here the other night when the noble Marquess disposed in the most complete manner of the chances of any such reforms by saying that the Turks had no money and no chance of getting any, and that without money reforms in Turkey were impossible, it will not seem so monstrous if we disbelieve in the reality of these reforms. With regard to the Berlin Treaty, I may say that I am not an opponent of it. I do not wish to see it remain unexecuted. I wish to see it carried out as far as possible so as not to embarrass or entangle us, while being of the greatest advantage to the Christian populations of Eastern Europe. I cannot help thinking the sort of vacillation that has gone on with regard to this Berlin Treaty must be, in some degree, owing to the absolute difference of opinion with regard to the Turkish Empire which has been consistently held by the Prime Minister and the noble Marquess. I trust this Treaty will be carried out; but I complain of the enormous extent to which the Government have magnified its advantages, instead of giving it its real and practical value. I think this discussion will be of use in putting before the country the real state of things. I do not wish to speak with any feeling of hostility to the Government to-night, nor to put any practical difficulty in the way of carrying out the Berlin Treaty.

House adjourned at a quarter before Ten o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 16th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—Resolution [May 15] reported.

PRIVATE BILL (by Order)—Considered as amended—Belfast Water.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Dorset, &c.) * [186]; Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Gloucester and Hereford) * [185]; Tramways Orders Confirmation * [187]; Consolidated Fund (No. 3) *.

First Reading—Salmon Fishery Law Amendment (No. 2) * [188].

Second Reading—Noxious Gases [123], debate adjourned; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Clonmel, &c.) * [166]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings) * [159]; Licensing Laws Amendment [25].

Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 3) * [121]; Medical Act (1858) Amendment [2]; Medical Appointments Qualification * [62]; Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 2) * [86].

Select Committee—Wormwood Scrubs Regulation [96], other Members nominated.

Committee—Army Discipline and Regulation [88]—R.F.

Committee—Report—Parliamentary Burghs (Scotland) * [97]; Dispensaries (Ireland) [66]; Hares (Ireland) * [166].

The House met at Two of the clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

BELFAST WATER BILL (by Order).

CONSIDERATION, AS AMENDED.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. J. P. CORRY, who had given Notice of his intention to propose the insertion of a clause, said, he had been informed that it was perfectly within his right to submit the clause, and that there were precedents for the course which he proposed to take. He certainly should not, however, have pursued that course if the promoters of the Bill had not raised technical objections against the Petitioners who represented the disfranchised classes of Belfast being heard before the Committee by whom the Bill had been considered upstairs. As he had already intimated, he believed that in taking this course he was perfectly within his right. At the same time, he was aware that if he were to move the clause of which he had given Notice it would give rise to considerable discussion in the House; and as the Government had fixed a Morning Sitting in order that the House might proceed with the consideration of a very important public measure, he felt that he would not be furthering the conduct of Public Business if he were to persist in moving the clause of which he had given Notice. In refraining from doing so, he desired to say that it was not because he did not feel that he should be able to convince the House that the proposition he wished to make was a reasonable and proper one, and also that he would have been supported by a large majority of the House. Under all the circumstances of the case, he did not intend to move the clause of which he had given Notice.

Bill, as amended, considered; to be read the third time.

QUESTIONS.

TREATY OF BERLIN—EXECUTION OF ARTICLES.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, referring to the Despatch of the Marquis of Salisbury, addressed to Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State from Berlin on 13th July 1878, which was presented to Parliament with the Treaty of Berlin, in order to set forth the principal alterations made at Berlin in the Treaty of San Stefano, and particularly to the following passages:—

"The first and most important objections made in the Circular of Her Majesty's Government of April 1st to the Treaty of San Stefano" were amongst others that "the first working of the institutions of the new Slav State of Bulgaria were to be commenced under the control of a Russian Army. It will be seen that all these objections have been removed by the Treaty of Berlin. . . . The influence under which the institutions of Bulgaria were to have been framed, and commenced their working, will no longer be especially Russian. . . . The retirement of the Russian Army from the province must take place before the period of the working of the new institutions is to begin. . . . And the first working of its institutions will therefore not be commenced under the control of a Russian Army;"

and referring likewise to Article 7 of the Treaty of Berlin, which fixes the period at which the working of the new institutions is to begin, as one which "cannot be prolonged for more than nine months from the ratification of the Treaty;" whether he will state if, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government (the time fixed by this Article having elapsed and its conditions having been fulfilled), the declaration of Lord Salisbury has been made good—

"That the retirement of the Russian Army from the Province must take place before the period at which the working of the new institutions of Bulgaria is to begin, so that the first working of its institutions may not commence under the control of a Russian Army;"

and, if that is not so, whether such a departure from a capital term of the Treaty of Berlin has taken place with the concurrence of Her Majesty's Government?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman's Question is certainly somewhat long; and I fear if I were to enter into the discussion which it seems to invite me to, my answer would be very much longer than is desirable, because it would be difficult for me to give a categorical answer to the Question without going into a much fuller discussion of what has taken place than would be convenient to the House or anyone else, I suppose, at the present moment. I endeavoured, as far as I could from the reading of the Question, to ascertain what was the point which the hon. and learned Gentleman particularly desired to ascertain; and in the still more extended form of the Question which stood on the Paper yesterday I thought I had discovered the point, because he referred to the suggestion that the Russian Army would not vacate Bulgaria until the 3rd of August, and I supposed that he wished to ascertain whether Her Majesty's Government had made any statement to the effect that the Russian Army was not to be bound to evacuate until the 3rd of August. I was prepared to say Her Majesty's Government had made no such statement; but as the matter now stands, with that struck out, I think the only answer I can give is this—that the Treaty of Berlin provided that the evacuation should take place nine months after the signing of the Treaty. The nine months have elapsed, and the evacuation is proceeding.

Mr. J. P. Corry

THE RAILWAY COMMISSION — PRO- LONGATION OF POWERS.

QUESTION.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he will introduce the Bill for continuing the Railway Commission before Whitsuntide, in order that Chambers of Commerce and other bodies interested may have ample time to consider amendments of the existing Act?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, as I think I mentioned to the House before, I have prepared a Bill dealing not only with the prolongation of the powers of the Railway Commission—a matter to which both the Government and the community generally attach much importance—but also with other subjects of considerable interest connected with it. But until much greater progress has been made with various Bills of no ordinary length and importance—such as the Army Discipline and Regulation and the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bills, upon which the House is already engaged—I feel that I should not be advancing the object we all have in view, and that it would be only wasting the time of Parliament, and of no advantage to the subject in question, if I invited the House to consider a general measure in connection with the Railway Commission.

OPEN SPACES (METROPOLIS).

QUESTION.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the observations of Dr. Hardwicke, at an inquest on the 8th of May upon a person of the name of Heron, in which he commented upon the absence of recreation grounds in London, where the children had nowhere to play except the streets; and, if he will consider the expediency of making some inquiry as to whether there are not open spaces in the metropolis which might be made more available as playgrounds for the children of the poor than at present?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he regretted as much as Dr. Hardwicke or anyone else that there were not more playgrounds in the Metropolis for children. A good deal had undoubtedly been accomplished of late years; but he was not aware that anything more could be done than had been done under the Open Spaces (Metropolis) Act, which was passed in 1877.

LLOYDS' PATRIOTIC FUND.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his attention has been drawn to a statement, which has appeared in several newspapers, that a sum of £51,000 was, during the Peninsular war, given by Lloyds' Patriotic Fund to be appropriated for the benefit of the families of deceased soldiers and sailors; that the accumulations of this fund now amount to £430,000, which is said to be under the administration of the Charity Commissioners; and, whether the facts are in any way as above represented; and, if so, whether this fund can be made available for the relief of the families of those soldiers lately killed in South Africa and Afghanistan?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, he had communicated with the Charity Commissioners on the subject, and it appeared that this sum of not £430,000, but £74,600, in Reduced Three per Cent Annuities, stood in the names of "the Official Trustees of Charitable Funds" in trust for "Lloyds' Patriotic Fund," the dividends of which were to be administered in accordance with the provisions of the scheme established by order of the Board of Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, dated the 28th day of May, 1875. Those dividends, amounting to £1,119, were applicable, after certain other charges, in the discretion of the Trustees to the payment of annuities to the persons mentioned in section 17 of that scheme, the opening words of which provided that the income from the fund should be applied by the Trustees in their discretion in granting annuities and other pecuniary assistance to soldiers, seamen, and marines, officers and men, and to their widows, orphans, and dependents, having especial regard to sufferings and losses in action. He thought, therefore, that the best course for the hon. and gallant Gentleman would be to open communications with the Charity Commissioners, and ascertain from them whether any of this money could be applied to the relief of the families of those soldiers lately killed in South Africa and Afghanistan.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL.—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 15th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 37 (Ill-treating soldier), agreed to.

Clause 38 (Duelling and attempting to commit suicide).

MR. PARNELL, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 16, line 7, after the word "suicide," to insert the words "while not undergoing a sentence of imprisonment," asked whether it would not be better to omit the 2nd sub-section from the clause? He thought that men convicted of breaches of military discipline should not be treated in the same way as felons and persons convicted of ordinary crimes, and he hoped that some guarantee would be taken under the Bill in order to secure this desirable result. They had a case the other day in which a sergeant of the 60th Rifles at Ginghilovo in South Africa, who merely committed an error of judgment in retiring a picket, had imposed upon him a sentence of five years' penal servitude. Common prison discipline in this country was neither more nor less than slavery; and he protested against the proposal to sentence a man already incarcerated to an additional term of imprisonment because, feeling that slavery, he attempted to commit suicide. There ought clearly to be some distinction between the treatment of military prisoners—men who were simply convicted of breach of discipline—and the treatment of men convicted of criminal offences in the ordinary sense. There should, in his opinion, be separate prisons, separate rules, and a separate system of treatment altogether. It was manifestly highly unjust and improper that men who were found guilty and convicted of simple breaches of discipline should be compelled to herd with ordinary criminals. He earnestly desired to press this matter upon the attention of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War and the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary; and he hoped it would be carefully considered whether powers might not be given to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to frame rules for the regulation and management of military prisons not only in England, but in other parts of the world. He simply moved his Amendment in order to put himself in Order. He did not intend to take a division upon the matter at present; but at a later stage of the measure he should be prepared, if necessary, to make a proposal embodying the views which he had indicated.

COLONEL MURE was inclined to think the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had very far stretched a point in assuming that the usual treatment of convicts induced suicide, and that the same thing could be said of the treatment of military prisoners. It was another assumption, also, that in the case of the sergeant at Ginghilovo the man only committed an error of judgment. As yet, they had no evidence on that subject at all; but his (Colonel Mure's) impression was the other way, and he did not believe for a moment that a man would have been sentenced to five years' penal servitude for that alone.

COLONEL STANLEY said, with regard to the case of the sergeant referred to, he had only seen what had appeared in the public Press. He had not yet received any of the Papers, and, therefore, as he had already stated, he was utterly unable to form any opinion. It was also a pure assumption that because a non-commissioned officer was sent to penal servitude he would be likely to commit suicide. He was, however, quite ready to admit the contention of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), that they must consider very carefully the circumstances under which military prisoners were confined in State gaols; and although he was not able in all cases to make separate rules for different classes of offenders, the point raised by the hon. Gentleman was one which had engaged, and would still receive, his own attention and the attention of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, with a view to its amendment to a certain extent.

Lord George Hamilton

Mr. E. JENKINS asked why, if the existing law were sufficiently strong to lay hold of offenders, and offences were defined in the Common Law, it should be necessary to make an attempt to commit suicide what might be termed a military offence? It could be well dealt with by the ordinary Criminal Courts. They had a punishment for the offence under the ordinary law, and why should not the offender be handed over to the civil power for trial? The certificate of the sentence would be enough to enable the military power to deal with the offender. He was not going to discuss the Ginghamro affair either; but the time would come when the Government would have to answer for the strangeness of the fact that the offence of the General who lost an Army at Isandlana should be disregarded, while a sergeant—[Colonel STANLEY: I rise to Order]—was sentenced to penal servitude for retiring a picket.

THE CHAIRMAN: The question before the Committee at the present time is the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) as to the punishment to be inflicted on soldiers who attempted to commit suicide, and the hon. Member for Dundee must confine his observations to that Amendment.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR remarked that this was one of the many additions of novel crimes created by the present Bill, which he very much regretted. The new crime was not recognized by the old Mutiny Act, but only by the 104th Article of War, and which was in contravention of the rights granted to the Crown to make new crimes not provided for by the Acts of Parliament, and it was now legalized for the first time by being introduced into the proposed Act by the Secretary of State.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought it was a misapprehension of the law which could apply to many other cases. The Articles of War were not illegal; but they were legal so long as they did not go beyond certain penalties. The recital stated that "no man can be forfeit of life or limb without the authority of the Act of Parliament."

MR. O'DONNELL said, the question of unnecessary duplication of crimes and punishments was raised by this and by a good many other clauses of the Bill. Certain punishments and crimes were clearly laid down in the ordinary law of the land; and why, in the preparation of the present measure, should the principle not have been observed by simply declaring that all the crimes known to the general law were also crimes in the Army, and that the punishments fixed under the general law were applicable in the Army, except in cases where for military purposes it was advisable either to add to or take away from the list of ordinary crimes? This sort of way of imperfectly going over the ground traversed by the general Criminal Law seemed to him to perpetuate a good many of the worst evils of confusion which existed in the old Mutiny Act and in the old Articles of War, and which ought to be improved and amended, and rendered as nearly as possible perfect on the present occasion.

MR. PARNELL said, that apart from the evils of the present system, his reason for directing the attention of the Government to the subject was this—that he thought the Home Secretary did not take power in his Prisons Act of 1867 to make rules with regard to military prisoners as distinct from any other class of persons undergoing sentence; and if the right hon. Gentleman now desired to make such rules, it would be necessary for him to take power under the Bill now before the House. He sincerely hoped that the attention of the Government would be given to the subject; and, if necessary, he should be prepared at a future stage to bring it on again.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 39 (Refusal to deliver to civil power officers and soldiers accused of civil offences).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, in page 16, line 14, to leave out the words "to deliver over to the civil magistrate or to." For the first time there was introduced here an offence against which it would be very difficult for an officer to defend himself. The terms of the present Act provided that the person wanted must be "under his command." These important words were now omitted, and the clause now punished any person subject to Military Law who refused to deliver over "any officer or soldier accused of an offence punishable by a civil court." It was not to be necessary that the person called on to deliver up a person should have any connection with, or any power or command over, the person to be punished. The word "wilfully" was also now omitted. Formerly, both in the Mutiny Act and in the Articles of War, the person must "wilfully neglect or refuse;" but those words were now omitted, making the clause far more severe. The duty of the officer now was to render such assistance to the civil authorities as might be in his power. When Lord Melbourne was Home Secretary, the question arose whether a commanding officer should or should not be compellable by law to deliver over any soldier under his command. The question was referred to the Law Officers, and their opinion was communicated, by the desire of Lord Melbourne, to the Army. That opinion was to the effect that, while a commanding officer was not compellable, either by the Mutiny Act or by the ordinary processes of the Courts of Justice, to deliver up a soldier to a constable who had a warrant to execute against him, yet, at the same time, such facilities ought to be granted to a constable as to enable him to take the person. It came to this—that while an officer was not compellable to give up the person, yet that it was wise to do so, in order to avoid unseemly and dangerous collisions between the civil and the military powers.

COLONEL STANLEY quite agreed that the words in the old Mutiny Act were "under his command." But the Articles of War did not say anything about command, and ran thus—

"Any officer or soldier who, on application being made to him for the purpose, shall wilfully neglect or refuse to deliver over to the civil magistrate, or to assist in the apprehension of any officer or soldier accused of any crime punishable by law."

He apprehended, therefore, that so far

Sir Alexander Gordon

they were reproducing the old law; and he was anxious also, as far as possible, to avoid any chance of a conflict between the civil and military authorities. He thought the clause had better remain as it was, for he saw no reason to omit the words.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR reminded the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that any constable could not at the present time be allowed to walk into any barracks just as he chose, and take away a soldier legally in confinement under Military Law. No doubt the civil power was supreme, and was so recognized by every officer of the Army. The officers well knew that they must obey all demands made by the civil magistrate to give up military persons when regularly and lawfully demanded. He had known cases where a military person, when about to be flogged, was taken out of the square formed by the troops to witness the punishment, and not the slightest hesitation existed in giving up the body on the Judge's writ being presented to the officer in command. And as there had been no conflict up to the present between the two powers, civil and military, where was the need for these words, which might lead to serious strife by reason of a constable making a demand on a sentry or a corporal to yield up a military prisoner?

MR. RYLANDS said, he was very sorry that he could not agree with his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon). Clearly, if a soldier was guilty of any offence against the law an officer was bound by every consideration to deliver him up to the civil authorities. It would be most unfortunate if any doubt whatever were allowed to remain upon that point, and no encouragement should be given to commanding officers to refuse to assist the civil power in dealing with soldiers who had been guilty of criminal offences. But if his hon. and gallant Friend thought the clause, as it now stood, pressed upon commanding officers and regimental officers in a manner that was not already the case, he should have no objection to the word "wilfully" being inserted. That would, he thought, meet the objection that had been raised. If the Amendment were withdrawn, he trusted the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would consent to the insertion of the word "wilfully."

GENERAL SHUTE observed, that the clause only referred to commanding officers. He thought it would be far better if the few words to which objection had been taken were omitted.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that a commanding officer was, by the present law, bound to deliver over to the civil power any officer or soldier under his command, guilty of any act contrary to law, on proper application being made to him. So far as he could see, this clause practically reproduced Clause 76 of the old Mutiny Act, except, it might be, by the omission of the words "under his command." He thought that those words were properly omitted, in order to insure in every case the due execution of the law against any soldier. It was undesirable that an officer should not be bound in all cases to aid the civil power in the apprehension of military offenders.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON observed, that by the clause, as it stood, an officer was to be punished if, on application being made to him, he neglected or refused to assist in the apprehension of any officer or soldier charged with any offence in any Civil Court. Those words went too far, and what he asked was that it should not be made penal for an officer not to have given into custody a soldier charged with any offence, when that officer might know nothing about it, except that the soldier was under his command.

MR. E. JENKINS remarked, that the clause was in accordance with the existing law. The Mutiny Act, it was true, confined the offence to a commanding officer; but the 96th Article of War provided for any officer or soldier who, on application being made to him, should neglect or refuse to deliver over to the civil magistrate any officer or soldier accused of an offence punishable by a Civil Court. He did not think it could be said that the clause altered the existing law.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to ; and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 40 (Conduct to prejudice of military discipline).

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, this was known in the Army as the

VOL. CXXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

"Devil's Clause." On general principles, he should be inclined to think the clause objectionable, as the great object of all criminal legislation was that crime should be specifically defined. He should be very glad if such a provision could be done away with; but he did not think it was possible. It had been found necessary, for the maintenance of discipline, to have some such clause as that, which corresponded with regard to the soldier very much to the clause with reference to an officer making punishable conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman. As in the case of an officer it was necessary to provide generally for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, so, in the case of a soldier, for any act, conduct, disorder, or neglect to the prejudice of good order and military discipline not otherwise specified in the Act. The evil, no doubt, was that this clause might be used by officers in courts martial to try soldiers for offences specified in other clauses. He desired that it should be made quite clear that that was not to be done. Evidence was given before the Select Committee to show that there was a disposition to use the clause for cases in which it was not intended to apply. To meet that objection he should, therefore, propose to put in words at the end of the clause declaring that it was not to be employed for purposes of punishment in matters for which a specific punishment was provided by the Act. He should now move, as an Amendment, in page 16, lines 25 and 26, to leave out the words "though not in this Act otherwise specified," and would move later on to insert the provision he had mentioned.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that, on consideration, he agreed with the Amendment proposed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). There was a good deal to be said on both sides; but as it was in accordance with the general principle of the Act to specify crimes and punishments, it was certainly undesirable to leave it in doubt that this clause was only intended to apply to offences upon which the Act was silent.

Amendment agreed to ; words struck out accordingly.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, in page 16, line 27, to leave out the words "on conviction by court martial," in order to insert "be tried by court martial, and on conviction shall." The 105th Article of War, referred to in the margin of the Bill as being that upon which the clause was founded, declared that offences to the prejudice of good order and military discipline should be taken cognizance of by a court martial. That provision had been in use for many years, and had worked well. Many hon. Members were most strongly opposed to the offences of officers and soldiers being tried by any other means than by court martial, and the object of the Amendment was to insure that course being taken. He sought to make it imperative upon the Secretary of State for War, when he took cognizance of any of these offences, to deal with them only by bringing the officers or soldiers charged therewith before a court martial.

U

COLONEL STANLEY said, that, whatever might be the effect of the 105th Article of War, the hon. and gallant Member must see that the effect of the Amendment he proposed would be to render the clause which they were passing more stringent. Whatever act might be construed as prejudicial to good order and military discipline, however trivial, must, if the words were inserted, be tried by court martial, and he did not think that that should be done. The alteration of the clause would really tend to increase the danger which the hon. and gallant Gentleman feared. Although the Article of War might be as he had stated, yet it was well known that it was not put in force, and that great discretion was exercised by the authorities.

MR. E. JENKINS remarked, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman admitted that the Article of War specifically stated that these offences should be taken cognizance of by a court martial; but he had gone on to observe that they were not always taken cognizance of. But the contention of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) was that persons should not be treated as being guilty of these offences without being previously tried by a court martial. It was necessary to introduce the words he proposed to insure that being carried out. He wished to point out to the Committee that the clause, as it stood, was more severe than the Article of War. Whereas the Article of War gave some sort of direction to a court martial that the crime or offence should be taken cognizance of according to its degree, yet, in this clause, those words were left out. No such direction was anywhere given to a court martial by this Bill, and anyone who knew anything about military men would see that when a man was tried before a court of officers for having shaken his fist at his commanding officer, or some little offence of that sort, the absence of any direction to the court martial to treat the offence according to its nature and degree would considerably prejudice the offender. In his opinion, that was a matter well worthy of attention. As courts martial were become more ordinary, it was more necessary than ever that clear and explicit directions should be given by the Bill to persons not instructed in law as to what they were to do. There was a great deal of force in the view of his hon. and gallant Friend that no man ought to be punished for crimes which came properly under this clause, unless he had been previously brought to trial before a court martial. That was a point upon which they had been endeavouring to insist throughout the Committee, and he should go into the Lobby with his hon. and gallant Friend if they went to a Division upon it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT did not think it quite certain that the Amendment proposed would make the clause less severe. On the contrary, he thought it would make it more severe, for the clause covered every "act, conduct, disorder, or neglect," and no one could wish a man to be tried by court martial for a very trivial offence. For slight offences a commanding officer could award punishment to soldiers, and no one could insist that every one of these should be tried by court martial. If that were done, the clause would be made much more severe. The authorities avoided doing so now by putting a liberal interpretation upon the Article of War. The hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) wished to insert his Amendment in order that everyone charged with these offences might be tried by court martial. What he (Sir William Harcourt) should contend, on the other hand, was that if lighter penalties were provided, then the authority of the Statute was not needed; but if a court martial were required, then the words in the clause, "upon conviction by court martial," were sufficient to meet the case.

Sir Alexander Gordon

MAJOR NOLAN could not support the Amendment. In his opinion, it would make the Act, already stringent enough, still more stringent. A commanding officer would be placed in a position in which he would have to say to an officer or soldier—"You have committed an act by which, under this clause, you must be dealt with by court martial." He thought it would be better if the words were not inserted.

LORD ELCHO considered it necessary that the Army should be kept in thoroughly good order and discipline. But when he heard the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) refer to a soldier's shaking his fist in the face of his commanding officer as a very small offence, he thought it right to say that, in his opinion, expressions such as that should not be used in the course of that debate. What passed in that House was very fully reported, and when soldiers read in the newspapers that a distinguished Member of the House of Commons had stated that it was a trivial offence for a soldier to shake his fist in his commanding officer's face, it would have a very prejudicial effect.

MR. E. JENKINS observed, that the noble Lord opposite (Lord Elcho), being a Scotchman, seemed to have no sense of humour. But, perhaps, when he (Mr. E. Jenkins) made use of the words complained of, he did so unadvisedly. He would venture to point out that the clause, as it now stood, was very much more severe than the Article of War, because the Article of War took cognizance of the offence according to its degree, whereas the clause contained no such modification. No one would wish that every person who had committed any of these offences should be tried by court martial, only that they should be liable to be so. He thought that both officers and soldiers would prefer the 105th Article of War to the clause of the Bill.

MR. GOLDNEY did not think that the hon. Member for Dundee had read the Article of War correctly. In a compromise between the two, it seemed to him (Mr. Goldney) that the clause was the more favourable to the persons coming under it.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON thought it obvious to every military man that his Amendment was not capable of the construction put upon it by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). The Article of War had been in use about 100 years, and, never having been subjected to the hypercriticism of the hon. and learned Gentleman, it had never been construed in the way it was now put by him. It was never intended that everyone should be tried by court martial for every offence, and he should contend that that was not the proper construction of his Amendment. But the object of his Amendment was to prevent the system that had only been recently adopted and had come into practice, by which the Secretary of State for War overrode all law by pronouncing judgment himself upon officers and soldiers charged with offences. Such a system as that would never formerly have been thought of.

MR. RYLANDS thought, after the very serious statement which had been made as to the conduct of the War Office in the matter of courts martial, some explanation should be given. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) had, in the most distinct manner, charged the Secretary of State for War with a very grave misdemeanour. He had stated that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had been in the habit of making use unnecessarily of the power he possessed to deal with military offenders, and of not bringing offences under the cognizance of courts martial when they ought to have been. When hon. and gallant Gentlemen in the Army thought it necessary that some provision should be made against this sort of procedure, he was of opinion that the Committee ought to take some notice of the matter. He (Mr. Rylands) was very much influenced by the authority of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) in other matters; but upon this clause he was not disposed to regard him as an exclusive authority. He thought that it was undesirable that for some trivial offence there should necessarily be a court martial; but he quite agreed that if there was any chance of the clause being made use of posed to alter the distance from 120 to 100 miles. No reason was given for this trifling change. It had, however, the effect of changing a long-established course of action, and one that had been introduced after many difficulties. Beyond 120 miles the trials for offences which would within 120 miles be carried on before a Civil Court must be conducted by courts martial, and hitherto very fairly done. He trusted that the Secretary of State for War would consult those who were acquainted with the Indian practice in determining what the new clause should be.

SIR HENRY JAMES pointed out, that if the Proviso were allowed to stand in its present form, it would, prima facie, at once give military jurisdiction in cases of murder and treason, and he could not think that such was the intention of the Committee.

MR. PARNELL said, the limit of 100 miles from the place of civil jurisdiction was a bad one, and it would, therefore, be better to leave that an open question also. He suggested that all the words after "Gibraltar," in line 26, should be left out, in order to insert the words—and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could then amend that on Report, if necessary. The proposed alteration would get rid of the limit of distance, and the authority of the convening officer, as well as the objectionable sentence with regard to the "reasonable time" within which an offender could be tried, while any securities that were found to be required could be added on the Report.

"Unless such place is so situated that there is no possibility of trying the offender before a competent civil court;"

MR. HOPWOOD thought the word "civil," as contrasted with "military," made use of in the clause, was not the fittest that could be chosen. This criticism was merely verbal; but it was right to use accurate language if it could be found.

MR. STAVELEY HILL replied, that by the Definition Clause the words "civil courts" applied to any court whatever.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

General Sir George Balfour

Redress of Wrongs.

Clause 42 (Mode of complaint by officers).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, in line 41, page 17, after the words "Commander-in-Chief," to insert the words "in order to obtain justice."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, in lines 41 and 42, to leave out the words "who shall cause his complaint to be inquired into," in order to insert the words "who is hereby required to examine into such complaint."

Amendment agreed to; words substituted accordingly.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, in page 18, line 2, after the word "thereon," to add these words—

"In India any such officer may complain to the Commander in Chief in India, who, if he is unable to give such officer the redress to which he may consider himself entitled, shall forward the complaint to the Commander in Chief to be disposed of as above directed."

In some of the Presidencies of India, an officer was allowed to complain to the Commander-in-Chief; but in others, an officer would be obliged to complain to a civil authority. The object of the Amendment was that an officer who felt himself aggrieved should have the right to complain to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army. This right was possessed by the officers in China, and was, indeed, acknowledged all over the world.

COLONEL STANLEY thought that Sub-section 3 of Clause 170, page 98, which ran thus—

"Any officer belonging to Her Majesty's Indian Forces who thinks himself wronged by his commanding officer, and on due application made to him does not receive the redress to which he may consider himself entitled, may complain to the Commander-in-Chief in the Presidency," &c.

would carry out the principle desired by the hon. and gallant Member to be established.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON remarked, that this was a good illustration of the answers received in the a commanding officer dealing with a soldier by inflicting on him some small punishment without sending him to a court martial.

MR. MEREWETHER agreed that the Amendment would prevent a commanding officer, who found a man guilty of something to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, even reprimanding him, for he could not be dealt with otherwise than by court martial, reprimand being one of the penalties specified.

MR. HOPWOOD did not wish to affect the Prerogative of the Crown to dismiss an officer; but the principle on which they insisted was, that whenever any person was charged with any such offence as was indicated in the clause, and was liable to be tried by court martial, he should be tried by court martial, and should be dealt with in no other way. Such a provision as that would not interfere with the Prerogative of the Crown to dismiss anyone for any or no reason whatever. So far as this clause was concerned, and so far as it laid down certain charges, then those matters ought to be decided upon by a proper tribunal.

MR. MUNTZ remarked, that a man could be dismissed without any court martial at all. He did not think that anyone would wish to interfere with the Prerogative of the Crown to dismiss an officer from the Service without assigning a reason.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he should move to report Progress, as the Committee did not seem disposed to hear him on the matter.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—
(Mr. E. Jenkins.)

COLONEL STANLEY was not aware that the hon. Gentleman had met with any interruption. Many of the comments upon some of those points were not shared in by the body of the Committee; but if they reported Progress whenever that was the case, they would be kept till the Whitsuntide Holidays considering the Bill. There had been no interruptions, and, on the contrary, the discussion had gone on most smoothly. His objection to the Amendment was that, whereas the authorities now exercised a discretion with regard to sending offences before a court martial, if it were adopted, when once they had taken cognizance of a case, there would be no option but to have it tried by court martial, and thus subject the offenders to much more severe punishment. Therefore, he wished the clause to stand as it was, and he trusted that the Committee would proceed and give its decision upon what, after all, was a very small matter.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK objected to the Amendment, both on the ground that it might be an interference with the Prerogative of the Crown, and that it would prevent offences, however small, being dealt with otherwise than by court martial. It was not desirable to interfere with the Prerogative of the Crown in an indirect manner; and sending cases to court martial instead of dealing with them summarily would, so far from being an alteration in the direction of leniency, be exactly the reverse.

MR. E. JENKINS stated that he had no desire to stop the progress of the debate; but if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would put some little restriction upon the tempestuous element behind him, he thought they would get on better. He had taken considerable pains to acquaint himself with the details of this measure, and thought that the Committee should pay some regard to the objections brought forward. He would advise his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Hopwood) to withdraw his Amendment after the opinions that had been expressed as to its effect upon the Prerogative of the Crown. Undoubtedly it was the Prerogative of the Crown to dismiss without any reason given; and as regarded that Prerogative, it was not proposed for one moment to interfere with it. They proposed only to point out that if an officer were charged with the offences cognizable by military tribunals established in the Act, that then, in relation to those offences, he should be allowed the privilege of a trial by court martial before the Crown exercised its Prerogative. That might be an interference with the Prerogative of the Crown to some extent, as it asked the Crown, before it dismissed officers for particular offences, to restrain its Prerogative until they had been tried by courts martial under the Act. No

Mr. HOPWOOD inquired to which Commander-in-Chief the appeal lay? It had been answered, to either of them; but that could not be. The Commander-in-Chief in India might have power to remedy the grievance of an officer; if so, that was only saying that the appeal should be made to him in the first instance; but if that was not the case, it was saying that the appeal should lie to the Commander-in-Chief in England. It was this appeal which was desired. It ought to lie in all cases from officers serving in the Queen's Forces in India to the Commander-in-Chief in England.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR reminded the Committee that in India, where the Government was supreme, no power which any Commander-in-Chief possessed, either in India or in England, could deal with. No military authority, however high, could go beyond that of the Viceroy, unless to thrust upon the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief a right of interference with the Government of India far in excess of the functions confided to him under the Order in Council of 1870. It was, therefore, necessary to provide that the complaints of officers should in some way or other not only reach the Commander-in-Chief in England but also the two Secretaries of State for India and War. He therefore hoped that the Secretary of State for War would take proper means to redress the constantly-recurring grievances of officers serving in India by insuring a channel of communication through which the claims and complaints might be subjected to the Cabinet.

SIR JOHN HAY said, according to Clause 42, an officer might complain to the Commander-in-Chief in India, who would send the complaint to the Secretary of State for India. The officer would then find himself in difficulty between the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and the Secretary of State for India. What was wanted was that the Commander-in-Chief in India should receive the officer's complaint, and forward it to the Commander-in-Chief in England, who should take care that no disputes arose between the great Departments of State, owing to which the grievances of officers might remain unredressed. It was true that, under Clause 170, the officers of the Indian Army had a right of appeal which was now sought for the officers of the English Army; and it was asked that such appeal should come home to the Commander-in-Chief here, and, eventually, that the Secretary of State for War should place it before Her Majesty.

MR. MARTEN pointed out that Clause 180 expressed the Commander-in-Chief to mean the Field Marshal or other officer commanding-in-chief Her Majesty's Forces for the time being. The present clause, therefore, would provide for the complaint going to the Commander-in-Chief—that was to say, under the present system, to the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief Her Majesty's Forces for the time being.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that the views of the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. Marten) did not at all meet the case. The section, quoted from page 98, applied solely to the officers of the Indian Service, who had nothing whatever to do with the British Service, and whose complaints, therefore, it was proper should be settled by the Government under which they were serving. But the Queen's officers should be dealt with as they would be in China or in North America. He felt sure that if the settlement of the question was put off, the Committee would be told, when they reached the clause referred to, that it had nothing to do with the Queen's officers; moreover, he wished it to be understood that he had not put down this Amendment without well knowing the cases to which it would apply. Officers serving in India made complaints which went up to the Presidency, where they were dealt with as Government questions—the civilians disposing of military matters which ought to have gone to the Commander-in-Chief. That was the grievance of the Army. The officers desired to be protected in India as they were in other parts of the world. When these complaints came before the Secretary of State for War, the reply was that he could not interfere in matters relating to India; and when they came before the Secretary of State for India, his reply was that he knew nothing about them. The remedy desired, therefore, was that officers serving in India should have the opportunity of bringing their grievances to the knowledge of the Commander-in-Chief in England, and he hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would agree to the insertion of the words proposed.

COLONEL STANLEY agreed with the principle that an officer, in making an appeal, should not be shuttle-cocked about; but, as it was laid down, officers serving in India came under Clause 42, and had their right of appeal accordingly, it mattered not whether their complaints went to the Commander-in-Chief or the General Officer commanding, both of which officers were but the channels through which the complaints were forwarded. If he found that his impression was wrong, and that the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire was correct in the view he had taken, he would agree to the insertion of the words on Report.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he was perfectly satisfied with the statement of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman; and, therefore, he should withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. PARNELL said, there appeared to be some confusion between the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) and the Secretary of State for War. The argument of the hon. and gallant Baronet came to this—that although the officer in India—serving in India—nominally retained his status and right of appeal under Clause 42, yet, owing to the distance of England from India, it was impossible for him, practically speaking, to make this appeal within any reasonable time; and although there was a Commander-in-Chief in India, the Commander-in-Chief at home did not consider himself competent to interfere in the matter. Then came the question between the different Secretaries of State—the Secretary of State for India, and the Secretary of State for War. The Secretary of State for War did not consider himself properly qualified. This appeared to him (Mr. Parnell) to be the argument of the hon. and gallant Baronet. Of course, if he only desired to reserve the technical right of an officer in India to appeal, he would have gained his purpose by the promise made by the Secretary of State for War.

VOL. CCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

MAJOR NOLAN expressed his regret that some of the clauses in the Bill were not dovetailed. The case was made much worse for the soldier than for the officer. But the Government had introduced into this clause great practical changes. They read very well; but he doubted whether they would work well. There was, for instance, the case of an officer making a complaint against another officer—affecting the character of another officer—or of a soldier making a complaint. What was in the mind of the draftsman of this Bill? Clearly, his object must have been to discourage complaints. The old Articles of War were in the other direction—they encouraged complaints, so as to leave a safety-valve. They gave an officer or a soldier full permission to bring complaints before their superior officer, if they felt themselves aggrieved. There was no penalty on an officer bringing a complaint and failing in it, though there was on the soldier; but there was this provision—that if he brought a complaint before the regimental court—if he appealed to a higher court—he might be punished, if the appeal was found to be frivolous and groundless. The same was the case exactly with regard to the soldier. He thought there was a very great change being introduced by this penal clause, thus adding to the old Articles of War. They now said to a man who made a complaint—"If you make a false statement, you are liable to be tried." At first sight, that seemed fair; but what about the working of it? The man complaining would differ in some matter of fact from his commanding officer; there was nearly always a difference as to a matter of fact, and if there was a difference, it might fairly be said to "affect the character" of somebody. It might, for instance, affect an officer's military character to say he lost his temper, or something of that sort; and in the majority of cases of serious complaint they would have some statement affecting the character of an officer. What he believed would happen under this new Act was this—and it was designed, he was satisfied, for the purpose—when an officer made a complaint, instead of pressing it against his commanding officer, he would be put on his trial, and the commanding officer would be told he must prove the charge against the junior officer, who would be told he

X

MAJOR NOLAN said, the argument of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, that if a maximum punishment were fixed, it would be likely to become the minimum, was not borne out by experience. The maximum penalty of two years' imprisonment was very rarely inflicted in practice, and was very frequently reduced by regimental courts martial to imprisonment for only two or three days.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR thought the discussion only seemed to furnish another illustration of how confused and confusing were the provisions of this Bill. For his own part, he regretted very much that, instead of making such a proposal as that embodied in the present clause, the Secretary of State for War had not adhered more closely to the Articles of War and the Regulations already in existence, which long experience had proved to have worked satisfactorily. The Bill ought simply to have been a consolidating Bill, and another Bill should have been introduced, providing for changes in the existing law and Articles of War. This was the command of the Statute Revision Committee. The second Bill, on being agreed to in Committee, might then have been amalgamated with the consolidated Bill. In this form the Military Law should have been passed, without raising the numerous difficult questions already discussed.

MR. PARNELL expressed his surprise that the Secretary of State for War should have refused to accept the Amendment. Of the two, he might add, the second Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Major Nolan) seemed to him to be the more important. All it asked the Committee to affirm was that no punishment should be inflicted on a private soldier exceeding 84 days' imprisonment for the commission of any offence which it was found impossible to define in the Act itself. That, he confessed he could not help thinking, was a most reasonable proposal. There was no grave or serious offence which had not been abundantly defined in the Bill already; and it could, therefore, be only for some trifling offence that a soldier could be tried by a court martial and sentenced to imprisonment under the operation of the clause now under discussion.

COLONEL COLTHURST hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would reconsider his decision in the matter. There were, in his opinion, very few cases in which a court martial would think it necessary to sentence a man to a longer period of imprisonment than 84 days. If a man was sentenced to six or 12 months' imprisonment, the evil results were likely to be far greater than the punishment itself. As to the first part of the clause which related to officers, he did not think it would be worth while to interfere with it.

COLONEL MURE said, he could not support the first Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan). The second, however, was, he thought, entitled to the favourable consideration of the Committee. As had been observed in the course of the discussion, every serious offence had already been defined in the Bill; and there ought, in his opinion, to be some limitation imposed on the powers of courts martial in dealing with those trifling offences against good order and discipline which might arise under the operation of the clause. As a general rule, of course, great powers must be given to those who were intrusted with the administration of the affairs of the Army; but as there was great variety in the tone and temper of officers in the command of regiments, so was there great variety in the severity of the punishments which were inflicted on the men under them from time to time. That being so, it would, he thought, be very advisable to limit the power conferred by the clause, as the hon. and gallant Member for Galway proposed to do by his second Amendment. It was a limitation to which commanding officers themselves would, he believed, be far from objecting.

MR. HOPWOOD contended that as the clause applied, and that only in general terms, to a number of small and trivial offences for which it had been found impossible to provide in the other clauses of the Bill, it would be only wise and fair for the Government, especially after the remarks which had fallen from hon. and gallant Members who were so well acquainted with the subject, to provide that the punishment to be inflicted for those offences should not exceed a maximum. He entirely dissented from the view of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that because the extent of the punishment was named in the clause it would invariably be adopted, and the maximum become the minimum. His experience of Courts of Law did not bear out this view, and he hoped the Amendment would be agreed to.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, while admitting that there were one or two points of some difficulty involved in the clause, said, its real object was to provide a means of dealing with unforeseen offences which, so far as he was aware, were not provided for under the Military Law as it stood. The Bill made definite provisions against all serious offences; but it was desirable, in his opinion, that the whole ground should be covered, and that there should be the means of inflicting adequate punishment for conduct prejudicial to good order and discipline in the Army whenever it occurred.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON wished to call the attention of the Committee to the opinion of the draftsman of the Bill, as having an important bearing on the subject under discussion. The draftsman, in giving his evidence before the Select Committee upstairs, said he did not believe the ingenuity of man could discover a crime which could not be tried under the operation of the first part of the Bill, and that if any gentleman present at the time, whether soldier or civilian, could tell him of any such crime, he would give the question up. That being the opinion of the draftsman, would it not be wise, he would ask, to accept the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), limiting the period of imprisonment in the case of a soldier found guilty, under the present clause, to 84 days?

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, he could not see why, if the punishment of cashiering, which was one of great severity, might be inflicted upon an officer under this clause, his hon. and gallant Friends opposite who supported the second Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) should suppose that an offence for which a soldier might be tried under it might not be one of considerable magnitude, also deserving of severe punishment.

Mr. MEREWETHER pointed out that an offence which was perfectly obvious the moment attention was called to it, that of injuring the Revenue by destroying Her Majesty's coinage, had been declared in the Courts of Law this year not to be an offence under the existing Acts by two learned Judges; while two others, including the framer of the original Code, held that it was. That fact, he thought, was sufficient to show that it was not easy to provide for every offence specifically in an Act of Parliament, and it was very probable that the counsel for a prisoner before a court martial would not be very long in finding out some serious offence which was not defined in the clauses so carefully framed by the draftsman of the present Bill.

Mr. RYLANDS would remind the Committee that the Bill had been drafted with the greatest care by a gentleman whose experience extended over a long period of time, and that the utmost pains had been taken to include in it every known offence which was at all likely to be committed. To provide, however, for the possibility of there being some offence which was not contemplated by the framers of the Bill the words—were embodied in the clause under discussion. That being so, and every serious offence being already provided for, it appeared to him, as it did to almost every hon. Member who had taken part in the discussion, that the punishment which might be inflicted under the clause should be limited as far as possible. If, therefore, his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway did not press his first Amendment, he would, he hoped, at all events, take a Division upon the second.

"That is to say, is guilty of any act, conduct, disorder, or neglect, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline,"

Mr. MORGAN LLOYD was also of opinion that the words of the clause were so vague and uncertain, and allowed courts martial so great a latitude in the exercise of their discretion, that it was highly desirable the punishment which might be imposed under it should be limited. What, for instance, was an offence against good order? One commanding officer might think one thing amounted to an offence against good order, while another might be of the contrary opinion. Now, as every act which could amount to a military crime was already comprehended within the provisions of some section of the Bill, it seemed to him that such a clause as that under discussion ought to be confined to offences of minor importance, and that latitude should not be given to tribunals acting under it to punish very severely acts which, in the estimation of one tribunal, might amount to offences, while another tribunal might be disposed to regard them as no offences at all. He hoped, therefore, the Government would accept the Amendment.

GENERAL SHUTE said, every hon. and learned Gentleman, and, indeed, every brother magistrate, must be aware that in Civil Law it would be simply an absurdity to attempt to define in detail every crime that could possibly be committed. It would be still more absurd to attempt to do so with regard to the maintenance of military discipline; nor was it likely that commanding officers would differ as to what offences were to the prejudice of good order. It was also extremely improbable that too severe a punishment would be inflicted under the clause, especially seeing that the sentences passed by courts martial had to be confirmed by the confirming officer, and had to be submitted to the Judge Advocate General's Department. There was no fear, therefore, of there being any such inequality, as some hon. Members appeared to apprehend, in the punishments awarded; nor did he think that there was the least cause for the alarm that a greater punishment would be imposed than was desirable or expedient. Some atrocious crime might be committed, especially on field service, which was not at all contemplated by the framers of the Bill, and for that the present clause would provide.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that in consequence of what had fallen from some of his hon. Friends near him, he would withdraw his first Amendment, and take a Division only upon the second. He might be allowed to point out, in reply to the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute), that if the offence committed were an atrocious one, it ought not to be tried under the present clause at all; and the ingenuity of the hon. and gallant Gentleman would, he felt satisfied, very soon bring it under the operation of some of the preceding clauses in which the penalties for grave crimes were set forth. One very good reason, in his opinion, for limiting the clause was that it was likely to be put into operation where there were officers who knew little or nothing about Military Law. The punishment which might be inflicted under it ought, for that and other reasons, in his opinion, to be diminished and defined. It was most injudicious, he thought, to retain the clause in the Bill at all; but if it was to be retained by way of experiment, it should be restricted as much as possible. He begged, however, to withdraw the Amendment before the Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR NOLAN moved the second Amendment, providing that in the case of a soldier the period of imprisonment should not exceed 84 days.

Amendment proposed,

In page 16, line 29, after the word "imprisonment," to insert the words "for a term not exceeding eighty-four days.—(Major Nolan.)"

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 198: Majority 130.—(Div. List, No. 98.)

CAPTAIN MILNE HOME begged to move the Amendment standing in the name of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Suffolk (Colonel Barne), subject, however, to a verbal alteration for which he himself was responsible—namely, in page 16, line 30, after "mentioned," to insert—

"Where an officer has been convicted by a civil court of an indictable offence he shall cease from the date of such conviction to belong to Her Majesty's Army."

He cordially agreed with the Amendment, and trusted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would accept it.

SIR HENRY JAMES thought it impossible that the Proviso could be accepted, as under its terms an officer who had committed the most venial act would be bound to be dismissed from the Army.

CAPTAIN MILNE HOME said, he certainly had not been aware that such venial acts as instanced by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton were classed as indictable offences. He would not,

Mr. Morgan Lloyd

after such information from so great an authority, press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON also wished to move an Amendment in the same terms as that of the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Barne), leaving out the words "or misdemeanour." He thought that an officer guilty of felony ought no longer to hold Her Majesty's commission, and was under the impression that in former years conviction of felony carried with it ipso facto dismissal of an officer.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the clause did not contain the word "misdemeanour," and that, therefore, it could not be proposed to omit it from the clause.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON complained of the noise in the House, which prevented him hearing the words of the Chairman. He begged to move, as an Amendment, in page 16, line 30, after "mentioned," to insert—

"Where an officer has been convicted by a civil court of felony he shall cease from the date of such conviction to belong to Her Majesty's Army."

SIR HENRY JAMES remarked, that the Amendment, as amended, was one which the Committee ought to consider well before giving it their acceptance, because, by the clause, an officer convicted of felony, however wrongly, and even if that conviction should afterwards be set aside, would have to bear the penalty of dismissal from Her Majesty's Service.

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, Amendment made in page 16, at end of Clause, by inserting—"Provided, That no person shall be charged under this section in respect of any offence for which special provision is made in any other part of this Act."

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Offences punishable by ordinary Law.

Clause 41 (Offences punishable by ordinary law).

SIR HENRY JAMES moved, as an Amendment, in page 16, line 35, to leave out the words "has committed," in order to insert the words "shall commit."

Amendment agreed to; words substituted accordingly.

MR. PARNELL wished to move an Amendment which stood in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), who was absent. The clause, which was very long and involved, gave power to try by court martial the offences of treason, murder, manslaughter, treason-felony, or rape committed in any place within Her Majesty's Dominions other than Gibraltar—

"Unless such place (where the offence is committed) is, in the opinion of the officer who convenes the court martial (such opinion to be expressed in the order convening the court, and to be conclusive), more than 100 miles as measured in a straight line from any city or town in which the offender can, within a reasonable time, be tried for such offence by a competent civil court."

He submitted to the Committee that the Proviso which he asked should be adopted was much more fitted to meet the requirements of cases contemplated by the Bill than the clause as it then stood. Within the United Kingdom it would, of course, always be possible to try an offender before a court of criminal judicature, so that no necessity existed for sending any person to be tried for a criminal offence by court martial. The case, however, would be different in India; but it would be met by the Proviso which he was about to ask the Committee to accept. The Saving Clause in the Bill gave great power and authority to the officer convening the court martial, which he (Mr. Parnell) submitted he should not possess. Practically, it gave him power to override the ordinary Civil Courts of the land by his own ipse dixit. The words of the clause he had already quoted made the officer judge both as to the distance and as to the time within which it was reasonable the offender should be tried. He did not think it right to leave such power in the hands of the officer convening the court martial, and therefore begged to move that, in page 17, line 1, after the words "courts martial" the words "if there is no possibility of trying the offender within a reasonable time before a competent civil court," be inserted.

SIR HENRY JAMES thought that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had selected an inconvenient part of the section on which to raise his point. He (Sir Henry James), himself, shared the wish of the hon. Member to raise the question as to time and distance, but considered it better that it should be deferred until they came to the restrictive part of the clause, at which point he should be happy to support the Amendment of the hon. Member. As the clause stood, no person could be tried by court martial for these offences in the United Kingdom, and the point raised only applied to places beyond it.

COLONEL STANLEY agreed with the principle of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), but thought it advisable to retain the present wording, until some better limitation could be introduced, which he would be perfectly willing to consider and accept; and on this point he was in hope of receiving the assistance of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James). The object of the portion of the clause to which the Amendment applied was to prevent the jurisdiction of the court martial being void ab initio.

MR. PARNELL was willing to take the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), although he could not see how the question could be more suitably raised at that part of the clause to which he had referred. On the understanding that the hon. and learned Member would move a sufficient Amendment when that portion of the clause was reached, he (Mr. Parnell) was willing that the present Amendment should be withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR NOLAN proposed to add words to the clause, the effect of which would be to prevent any officer holding a court martial for the trial of the offences named, out of India, unless a competent Civil Court was at a greater distance than 100 miles from the place where the offence was committed. He thought this would make the Act somewhat more stringent as against the convening officer, to insert after the word "is," in page 17, line 26, the following words:—

"Situated in India or in any country in India under the protection of Her Majesty or in any place beyond the seas in which there is no civil judicature."

Sir Henry James

MR. PARNELL had a verbal Amendment to suggest in line 24—namely, after the word "manslaughter," to insert the words "treason-felony."

COLONEL STANLEY could hardly agree to the addition to the wording without some further consideration; but would make a note of the point, and bring it up on the Report.

SIR HENRY JAMES trusted that the Government would take into their serious consideration the question of trying by court martial the offence of treason-felony, which, of all others, was the most difficult to deal with, and admitted of great latitude of definition.

Amendment (Mr. Parnell), by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR NOLAN moved the Amendment of which he had just given Notice.

COLONEL STANLEY said, it was very difficult to get at the exact sense of a verbal Amendment at a moment's notice. At first sight, it appeared to him wiser to allow the clause to remain as at present; but he was quite willing to take a note of the suggested alteration.

MAJOR NOLAN explained that his Amendment would prevent military courts acting for the trial of offences named in the clause in any of the Colonies, even if they were 100 miles away from a town in which civil judicature was in force, but that it would not prevent them from acting in India.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN thought the words of the Amendment not well chosen, and to involve a repetition, unless the term "British India" was employed.

COLONEL STANLEY said, unquestionably, no officer would desire to try the crimes named in the clause by court martial; but it was necessary to make provision for the trial of such offences under certain circumstances by court martial—that was to say, when the trial by civil process would have to take place at a distance of more than 100 miles from the place where the offence was committed. He did not think it would be wise to limit the clause in the way proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), but would carefully consider the point raised. In the meantime, he asked the Committee to allow the wording to remain as at present, on the understanding that it should be looked into on Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, in order to fulfil his promise to the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), he would propose the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) which had not been moved. The offences named in the clause were not of a military, but of a civil character—prima facie, therefore, they should be tried by a Civil Court. But the Proviso in the clause gave absolute discretion to the officer convening the court martial to say—first, whether there was a competent tribunal within 100 miles, and from the exercise of that discretion there was no appeal; secondly, it was left to his discretion to say whether the person could be tried within a reasonable time. He thought that considerable discussion was desirable before the Proviso was agreed upon in its present form. With relation to what was the term “reasonable time” used? One officer might say—“I wish this regiment to march; I cannot try you before the regiment marches.” Therefore, the individual could be tried in a reasonable time with relation to the marching of the regiment. Another officer might say—“I cannot try you until the health of the regiment permits it;” in that case, the term “reasonable time” would be used with relation to the health of the regiment. In this way, power was given to the officer to supersede the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts, and to say—“I think the offender cannot be tried within a reasonable time; therefore, he shall be tried by court martial;” and, of course, there were circumstances under which that power might be exercised. All this was to apply outside the United Kingdom, and was, in fact, an extension of the Mutiny Act to all the Dominions of the Crown. This great extension of power claimed for, and to be placed in the hands of, a military officer, to shut out the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts of the country, he felt bound to oppose, and should, therefore, do all in his power to strike out the Proviso. He moved that all the words from the word “in,” in line 26, down to “conclusive,” in line 28, be struck out.

MAJOR O'BRIEN thought that the time within which an officer should be tried ought to be accurately fixed. Twenty years ago, a case had occurred of an officer being kept under arrest for six months, although the authorities to whom his case was referred were only 300 miles from the station; but they did not care to interfere during the hot weather in India. Again, an officer had been kept four months under arrest in Dublin, pending the settlement of the question as to whether he should be brought before a court martial or not.

MR. RYLANDS thought the Committee must have perceived that very serious matter had been introduced into the discussion. The Committee could not be expected to pass the clause in its present objectionable state; and he, therefore, appealed to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to postpone it. He could not agree to allow the clause to pass out of the hands of the Committee until it had been put into proper shape. He did not doubt the intention of the Secretary of State for War to prepare another clause; but the Committee ought to see that it was entirely changed, and consider well the Amendment to be made before it was passed. He therefore suggested that the clause should be postponed, and that before the Committee met again the right hon. and gallant Gentleman should state the exact words which they were expected to adopt.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped that the Committee would see that the Government were anxious to prevent any possible abuse under the clause, which, for some reasons, he should be glad to see amended. The best plan, in his opinion, would be to leave out all the words from the word “in,” in line 26, down to “conclusive,” and also to leave out the words “within a reasonable time,” and he would bring up the words on the Report to make the meaning more clear.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BAUFORTH said, that the law in India on this point was pretty well settled. It was the custom there from time immemorial to send at once for civil trial all cases where the offence had been committed within 120 miles from the Civil Court of the chief Presidency towns of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay. The present Bill was proposed to alter the distance from 120 to 100 miles. No reason was given for this trifling change. It had, however, the effect of changing a long-established course of action, and one that had been introduced after many difficulties. Beyond 120 miles the trials for offences which would within 120 miles be carried on before a Civil Court must be conducted by courts martial, and hitherto very fairly done. He trusted that the Secretary of State for War would consult those who were acquainted with the Indian practice in determining what the new clause should be.

SIR HENRY JAMES pointed out, that if the Proviso were allowed to stand in its present form, it would, prima facie, at once give military jurisdiction in cases of murder and treason, and he could not think that such was the intention of the Committee.

MR. PARNELL said, the limit of 100 miles from the place of civil jurisdiction was a bad one, and it would, therefore, be better to leave that an open question also. He suggested that all the words after "Gibraltar," in line 26, should be left out, in order to insert the words—and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could then amend that on Report, if necessary. The proposed alteration would get rid of the limit of distance, and the authority of the convening officer, as well as the objectionable sentence with regard to the "reasonable time" within which an offender could be tried, while any securities that were found to be required could be added on the Report.

"Unless such place is so situated that there is no possibility of trying the offender before a competent civil court;"

MR. HOPWOOD thought the word "civil," as contrasted with "military," made use of in the clause, was not the fittest that could be chosen. This criticism was merely verbal; but it was right to use accurate language if it could be found.

MR. STAVELEY HILL replied, that by the Definition Clause the words "civil courts" applied to any court whatever.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

General Sir George Balfour

Redress of Wrongs.

Clause 42 (Mode of complaint by officers).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, in line 41, page 17, after the words "Commander-in-Chief," to insert the words "in order to obtain justice."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, in lines 41 and 42, to leave out the words "who shall cause his complaint to be inquired into," in order to insert the words "who is hereby required to examine into such complaint."

Amendment agreed to; words substituted accordingly.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, in page 18, line 2, after the word "thereon," to add these words—

"In India any such officer may complain to the Commander in Chief in India, who, if he is unable to give such officer the redress to which he may consider himself entitled, shall forward the complaint to the Commander in Chief to be disposed of as above directed."

In some of the Presidencies of India, an officer was allowed to complain to the Commander-in-Chief; but in others, an officer would be obliged to complain to a civil authority. The object of the Amendment was that an officer who felt himself aggrieved should have the right to complain to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army. This right was possessed by the officers in China, and was, indeed, acknowledged all over the world.

COLONEL STANLEY thought that Subsection 3 of Clause 170, page 98, which ran thus—

"Any officer belonging to Her Majesty's Indian Forces who thinks himself wronged by his commanding officer, and on due application made to him does not receive the redress to which he may consider himself entitled, may complain to the Commander-in-Chief in the Presidency," &c.

would carry out the principle desired by the hon. and gallant Member to be established.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON remarked, that this was a good illustration of the answers received in the House of Commons, as well as of the way in which the Bill had been prepared. The clause referred to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman applied to officers of the Indian Army alone.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT agreed with the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), and hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would see his way to put the words into the Bill.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would take up the point, and see what could be done to settle the matter; at the same time, he trusted that the complaints of officers would not be allowed to come through the Council at home, because they would do all they could to prevent redress being given. The quotation of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman referred entirely to the Indian Forces; but the Committee had to deal with that portion of the English Army serving in India, and, in fact, subordinate to the Indian authorities.

SIR JOHN HAY trusted that the Amendment would be accepted by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War.

MR. RYLANDS considered the Committee had reason to complain that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had referred, in answer to the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), to a portion of the Bill which had no relation whatever to the point under discussion. The portion of the Bill referred to concerned the Indian Army alone, and the statement of the Secretary of State for War was, therefore, unintentionally, misleading. He (Mr. Rylands) was the more surprised at this, because at the side of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman sat the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General, who, from his great knowledge of this subject, should have prevented his falling into that error.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the question was, how to deal with the appeal of officers, as regarded the commanding officers in India? Either the officers were officers of the Indian Forces, or they were officers of Her Majesty's Forces serving in India. If they were officers of Her Majesty's Forces serving in India, they had a right to appeal under the present clause—42; but if they belonged to Her Majesty's Indian Forces, then their appeal lay under Clause 170.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR referred to the cases of officers in India whose complaints had lately been subjected to inquiry by a Select Committee, on which the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) and the right hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) and himself had served. It was there proved most conclusively that though the Commander-in-Chief at home had been made acquainted with the complaints of certain Indian and Royal Artillery officers, yet did not consider himself justified in interfering; and he (Sir George Balfour) considered it a very proper thing that he should not have directly interfered in a case of complaints which appertained to the Indian Government. The question as to the mode of appeal for officers in India was by no means clear, and he thought that it should be provided for at the present opportunity. The Bill did not, however, do so in a satisfactory form. The kinds of complaints that might be, indeed, the complaints that were under the consideration of the Select Committee were of a character far beyond the powers of any military officer to settle. They affected the Indian Government both in India and in England; and, therefore, the Bill ought to provide for all such cases.

MR. PARNELL wished to understand the position. Had the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Alexander Gordon) been agreed to by the Secretary of State for War?

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that he had not agreed to it, for the reason that he understood it to be already provided for by the Bill. The officers of the Army serving in India would not lose their right, under Clause 42, to appeal to the Commander-in-Chief. With regard to the officers of the Indian Forces, their mode of appeal was stated in Clause 170, as he had already pointed out; and their ultimate appeal lay to the Governor of the Presidency, who had power, if he thought it right, to forward the application to the highest quarter.

Mr. HOPWOOD inquired to which Commander-in-Chief the appeal lay? It had been answered, to either of them; but that could not be. The Commander-in-Chief in India might have power to remedy the grievance of an officer; if so, that was only saying that the appeal should be made to him in the first instance; but if that was not the case, it was saying that the appeal should lie to the Commander-in-Chief in England. It was this appeal which was desired. It ought to lie in all cases from officers serving in the Queen's Forces in India to the Commander-in-Chief in England.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR reminded the Committee that in India, where the Government was supreme, no power which any Commander-in-Chief possessed, either in India or in England, could deal with. No military authority, however high, could go beyond that of the Viceroy, unless to thrust upon the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief a right of interference with the Government of India far in excess of the functions confided to him under the Order in Council of 1870. It was, therefore, necessary to provide that the complaints of officers should in some way or other not only reach the Commander-in-Chief in England but also the two Secretaries of State for India and War. He therefore hoped that the Secretary of State for War would take proper means to redress the constantly-recurring grievances of officers serving in India by insuring a channel of communication through which the claims and complaints might be subjected to the Cabinet.

SIR JOHN HAY said, according to Clause 42, an officer might complain to the Commander-in-Chief in India, who would send the complaint to the Secretary of State for India. The officer would then find himself in difficulty between the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and the Secretary of State for India. What was wanted was that the Commander-in-Chief in India should receive the officer's complaint, and forward it to the Commander-in-Chief in England, who should take care that no disputes arose between the great Departments of State, owing to which the grievances of officers might remain unredressed. It was true that, under Clause 170, the officers of the Indian Army had a right of appeal which was now sought for the officers of the English Army; and it was asked that such appeal should come home to the Commander-in-Chief here, and, eventually, that the Secretary of State for War should place it before Her Majesty.

Mr. MARTEN pointed out that Clause 180 expressed the Commander-in-Chief to mean the Field Marshal or other officer commanding-in-chief Her Majesty's Forces for the time being. The present clause, therefore, would provide for the complaint going to the Commander-in-Chief—that was to say, under the present system, to the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief Her Majesty's Forces for the time being.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that the views of the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. Marten) did not at all meet the case. The section, quoted from page 98, applied solely to the officers of the Indian Service, who had nothing whatever to do with the British Service, and whose complaints, therefore, it was proper should be settled by the Government under which they were serving. But the Queen's officers should be dealt with as they would be in China or in North America. He felt sure that if the settlement of the question was put off, the Committee would be told, when they reached the clause referred to, that it had nothing to do with the Queen's officers; moreover, he wished it to be understood that he had not put down this Amendment without well knowing the cases to which it would apply. Officers serving in India made complaints which went up to the Presidency, where they were dealt with as Government questions—the civilians disposing of military matters which ought to have gone to the Commander-in-Chief. That was the grievance of the Army. The officers desired to be protected in India as they were in other parts of the world. When these complaints came before the Secretary of State for War, the reply was that he could not interfere in matters relating to India; and when they came before the Secretary of State for India, his reply was that he knew nothing about them. The remedy desired, therefore, was that officers serving in India should have the opportunity of bringing their grievances to the knowledge of the Commander-in-Chief in England, and he hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would agree to the insertion of the words proposed.

COLONEL STANLEY agreed with the principle that an officer, in making an appeal, should not be shuttle-cocked about; but, as it was laid down, officers serving in India came under Clause 42, and had their right of appeal accordingly, it mattered not whether their complaints went to the Commander-in-Chief or the General Officer commanding, both of which officers were but the channels through which the complaints were forwarded. If he found that his impression was wrong, and that the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire was correct in the view he had taken, he would agree to the insertion of the words on Report.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he was perfectly satisfied with the statement of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman; and, therefore, he should withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, there appeared to be some confusion between the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) and the Secretary of State for War. The argument of the hon. and gallant Baronet came to this—that although the officer in India—serving in India—nominally retained his status and right of appeal under Clause 42, yet, owing to the distance of England from India, it was impossible for him, practically speaking, to make this appeal within any reasonable time; and although there was a Commander-in-Chief in India, the Commander-in-Chief at home did not consider himself competent to interfere in the matter. Then came the question between the different Secretaries of State—the Secretary of State for India, and the Secretary of State for War. The Secretary of State for War did not consider himself properly qualified. This appeared to him (Mr. Parnell) to be the argument of the hon. and gallant Baronet. Of course, if he only desired to reserve the technical right of an officer in India to appeal, he would have gained his purpose by the promise made by the Secretary of State for War.

MAJOR NOLAN expressed his regret that some of the clauses in the Bill were not dovetailed. The case was made much worse for the soldier than for the officer. But the Government had introduced into this clause great practical changes. They read very well; but he doubted whether they would work well. There was, for instance, the case of an officer making a complaint against another officer—affecting the character of another officer—or of a soldier making a complaint. What was in the mind of the draftsman of this Bill? Clearly, his object must have been to discourage complaints. The old Articles of War were in the other direction—they encouraged complaints, so as to leave a safety-valve. They gave an officer or a soldier full permission to bring complaints before their superior officer, if they felt themselves aggrieved. There was no penalty on an officer bringing a complaint and failing in it, though there was on the soldier; but there was this provision—that if he brought a complaint before the regimental court—if he appealed to a higher court—he might be punished, if the appeal was found to be frivolous and groundless. The same was the case exactly with regard to the soldier. He thought there was a very great change being introduced by this penal clause, thus adding to the old Articles of War. They now said to a man who made a complaint—"If you make a false statement, you are liable to be tried." At first sight, that seemed fair; but what about the working of it? The man complaining would differ in some matter of fact from his commanding officer; there was nearly always a difference as to a matter of fact, and if there was a difference, it might fairly be said to "affect the character" of somebody. It might, for instance, affect an officer's military character to say he lost his temper, or something of that sort; and in the majority of cases of serious complaint they would have some statement affecting the character of an officer. What he believed would happen under this new Act was this—and it was designed, he was satisfied, for the purpose—when an officer made a complaint, instead of pressing it against his commanding officer, he would be put on his trial, and the commanding officer would be told he must prove the charge against the junior officer, who would be told he had made a false charge. The effect of this alteration, instead of assisting complaints, would land the junior officer in a trial in which he would be charged before a court martial for making a false statement. The superior officer would not know that he had made a false statement; but he would say we must investigate, in the same way, this fact; and in that way the junior officer would be placed on his trial. Perhaps, in the great majority of cases, the officer would not be tried; but if one was tried out of 50 who made complaints, it would be quite enough to establish the grievance which he had pointed out, and to stop the great bulk of complaints. It would stop the safety-valve which existed at present—the right of making fair and legitimate complaints of grievances. He thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman ought to point out why this clause was being introduced. They were removing by this clause the soldier's only safeguard. No soldier under the clause could make a complaint without being made liable to punishment. They might reply—"Well, let him make no false statement." He believed, in the majority of cases, both sides were in the right, and that the facts were as they stated them; and the result would be that a man would be tried for making false statements when, in fact, he had told the truth. When they came to Clause 43, he would show how very much worse the soldier's case was made than it was at present. It behoved the Secretary of State for War to show to the Committee why he had departed from the old Act. He should, in page 18, line 2, move to leave out all the words after "thereon," to the end of the clause.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, the Committee upstairs had agreed unanimously to the clause. The object of the insertion of the words was clear. It was to prevent false charges. The Committee deemed it proper to make this a specific offence. Let him point out that the words were "knowingly making a false statement," and concealing any material fact. He asked whether "knowingly making a false statement" was not a matter which should be punished?

MAJOR O'BEIRNE, in reply to the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Staveley Hill), wished to say that the Committee gave hardly any time at all to the consideration of the clause. They were unanimous, for the simple reason that they were helpless, and the clause was hurried through from beginning to end, and was not discussed at all.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, that if the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim would look, he would find that the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) took a division on another part of the clause.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to point out that his hon. and gallant Friend (Major O'Beirne) and the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Staveley Hill) differed as to a matter of fact in the Committee of which they were Members. This was exactly a point on which an officer would be tried. If a junior officer put the statement in writing, he would probably be tried for making a false statement. The provision in the new Act was a dangerous one. Here they had two hon. Members differing as to a matter of fact; but under this Act the mode of investigation would be to try the complainant. This was the dangerous feature to which he most strongly objected.

COLONEL MURE said, that hon. Gentlemen who complained of this clause were the same who complained of the "Devil's Clause." Offences of this kind must be punished; and if that were so, surely they ought to make the matter clear. He hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would give way.

COLONEL STANLEY rose to explain that it was not a false statement as to fact, but false statements affecting the character or wilfully suppressing any material facts. As to matters of fact, no court in the world would convict a man for a statement, unless it was convinced of the intention of the person making the statement.

MR. HOPWOOD said, the Committee was discussing a very important point—the possibility of the accuser being brought to trial. He agreed, on the face of the thing, "knowingly making a false statement," and "wilfully suppressing facts," were strong terms; but, taken in connection with the words with which they were placed in juxtaposition, "by himself making complaint first," something like a menace was held out, or a warning was given to the man not to make any complaint at all. He would put a case which frequently occurred at law. A man made a charge against another, and he was tried. The accuser failed to substantiate the charge. The party accused could retaliate; but how? He might indict the man for perjury; but the law said—"Oh, no! we cannot take merely your counter-statement against that of the accuser. You must have two witnesses as to the fact, proving his statement to be false and wilful. Your mere affirmation that the charge made against you is false is not sufficient to enable us to convict him of perjury. If you wish to show that the charge was the result of mere vindictiveness, you must strengthen that by at least two witnesses, and we require two witnesses in support of your statement."

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he wished to support the objection taken by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Nolan). They were, no doubt, re-enacting a clause which already existed; but they were putting a very important rider to it—a rider which said to the man bringing the charge—"Take care what you are about. You will be tried by court martial." That was a most serious thing to say, by Act of Parliament, to a man who had a grievance. He had often heard complaints of soldiers, and there was always a tendency on the part of commanding officers to prevent men making complaints. A commanding officer always disliked a man coming before him to make complaints, or before the general; but it was the duty of every general to see that every soldier had the right of complaint, and that he was not punished if he made it properly. He had ordered a man to be tried for making improper complaints, and he thought the case was already fully provided for. Therefore, he thought it would be better to omit the clause altogether, as it was useless.

MAJOR NOLAN said, there was one point to which he wished to allude, and that was with reference to the evidence given before the Committee on the Mutiny Act. He thought, if anyone looked at the list of witnesses there, he would see that the people who gave evidence were those who, in many cases, had frightful bothers with complaints. He did not think the Committee had one witness of the class of men who complained. The Committee had been hearing one class of witnesses; and it was rather better, he thought, for the Committee of the Whole House to hear all sides of the story. The safe right of complaint was a safety-valve for discontent. Abolish, or nearly abolish, that right, and they would remove the safety-valve. The men would interpret the clause as meaning that, however true, the complaints were not wanted.

MR. STAVELEY HILL wished to read a few lines from the evidence of the Commander-in-Chief. "I think it a great pity," said His Royal Highness, "that any restriction should be put upon the right of complaint." Now that it was supposed an attempt was made to interfere with that right, he wished to remind the Committee of the evidence given on that head by the Commander-in-Chief.

MR. RYLANDS said, that it might be perfectly true this statement was made; but therewas nothing to justify this extraordinary change in Military Law. Under the Articles of War, there was every encouragement given to complaints. The object had been not to sit on the safety-valve in dealing with the Army. The right of complaint—the free exercise of the right of complaint—was the safety-valve; and, instead of leaving it in the way in which the Articles of War placed it, they attached to this clause, which provided for the redress of grievances, a warning which no human being could doubt would be understood by junior officers and soldiers as meaning that if they brought complaints against their superior officers it would be at their own risk. He should resist the change as altogether unwise.

MR. PARNELL said, as the proceedings of the Committee had been referred to, he, as a Member of that Committee, thought it right to say that they should not rely too much on them. They were very much hurried, and if hon. Members would study the Report of the Committee, he thought they would find that the Report was drawn up in such a manner that they ought not to attach any great importance to the conclusions arrived at. They had none except official witnesses, and very few of those. They were Horse Guards' witnesses. So far as he was concerned, he agreed to everything, because he saw there was no use proposing. They were put to a task which could not be performed in two or three Sessions.

MR. HOPWOOD said, their opposition to the clause was so rooted that he thought it would be well if the question were taken into consideration by the Secretary of State for War. At that hour (15 minutes to 7) the clause could not be disposed of. The clause proposed, in effect, to abolish a right which they were all anxious to secure to the men.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he thought this provision gave a complete discouragement to any man making a complaint. He had had a good deal to do in civil matters with receiving complaints, and he could assure the Committee it was very difficult to get men to make complaints, even where they were aggrieved; and where the discipline of the Service in which they were engaged was involved, the difficulty always was to get men to impeach authority, even when right. A man had a great deal to contend with before he made up his mind to bring a charge against a superior. If, in addition to the natural reluctance to accuse a superior, he had to labour under the reflection that, when he did bring a charge, if he did not prove the charge, he would be liable to imprisonment in addition to the imputation that he brought a false charge, the proper exercise of the right of complaint would be seriously curtailed. He knew of one case where his own judgment went wrong. He thought a man brought a false charge; but afterwards the charge proved to be true, and it would have involved a serious injustice if the man, immediately after bringing the charge, were tried for bringing it forward. A case occurred to him at the moment. A man made a charge against a respectable party placed over him in authority. It was apparently so absurd that he did not investigate it, especially as the party bringing the charge made a mistake in one very important point, which would seem to destroy his veracity. The charge, however, was true, for all that—and was the man's whole evidence to be discredited?

And it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again this day.

Mr. Parnell

And it being now Seven of the clock, House suspended its sitting.

House resumed its sitting at a quarter after Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

BREWERS' LICENCES.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, in rising to call attention to Brewers' Licences; and to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the nature and incidence of the Tax upon Brewers' Licences, said: Sir, although it may seem rather a paradoxical statement, I feel that the task which I have undertaken to-night is, at the same time, easy and difficult. It is easy, because I have a good cause and a strong case. It is difficult, because in these days, when public attention is concentrated upon foreign policy and Colonial difficulties, it is not without an effort that the mind of Parliament can be brought to turn itself to the more prosaic subject of the details of home taxation. Moreover, Sir, the difficulty is increased by the fact that no immediate remission can be expected, even if I prove to demonstration my case against the tax of which I complain to-night. No remission of taxation can be expected, under ordinary circumstances, without a surplus. To such a luxury the Chancellor of the Exchequer has long been a stranger; and I fear that, unless and until, happily for him, there should occur an interregnum of Liberal Government, it will be long indeed before he has another surplus to distribute. But, properly considered, this circumstance rather strengthens my position. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer possessed a surplus, he would be puzzled and embarrassed between the rival claimants upon his bounty. As it is, the prospect of such a state of things being remote, his mind, and the minds of other men, are in a state of calm impartiality, which renders the moment peculiarly opportune for a full and fair inquiry into the case of any particular interest which complains of undue taxation. And therefore, Sir, I ask for a Committee, to inquire into the nature and incidence of the tax upon brewers' licences. And here, Sir, I pause for a moment to sweep away, if I can, a prejudice by which I am encountered upon the very threshold of my argument. Brewers are popularly believed to be a wealthy class, well able to endure taxation. In fact, it is a common opinion that, in these bad times, the three b's—the brewers, the bankers, and the butchers—are the only bees who have any honey left in their hives; and the brewers have certainly not obtained much sympathy from the public. But I venture to say that this arises entirely from a want of knowledge of the true facts of the case. The truth is that when we in this House speak of brewers, our thoughts instinctively turn to my hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Mr. M. T. Bass). Well, Sir, if all brewers were in the position of my hon. Friend, they would probably be rather the objects of envy than of commiseration. By the exercise, from a very early period of life, of a skill, energy, and perseverance rarely equalled in the history of mercantile enterprise, my hon. Friend has, no doubt, acquired a high financial, as well as a high commercial, position, and this I am sure no one will grudge him who knows, as I know, the kindly qualities of his heart, and the sterling worth of his character. But you must not take my hon. Friend, nor must you take the half-dozen representatives of great brewing companies who sit in this House, as fair samples of the brewers upon whom falls the pressure of this tax. On the contrary, I put this forward in the very front of my argument, that the tendency and effect of this particular taxation is rather to create and foster a monopoly in the hands of a few great and prosperous houses, and to drive out of the trade their smaller competitors, who, in the interest of the public, should be allowed to exist. And if you point to my hon. Friend and say—look how flourishing he appears to be—is this the man whom you seek to relieve from taxation? I answer you with the fact that 12 years ago my hon. Friend was one of nearly 38,000 brewers in the United Kingdom, and that to-day he is one of less than 24,000; the fact being that during the last 12 years more than 1,000 brewers per annum have been driven out of the trade, mainly owing to the injurious pressure of the exceptional taxation to which they are subjected. And let me respectfully remind the House that it is no answer to this statement to say, as was said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the course of a former debate upon this subject, that before the imposition of this tax in 1862 the number of brewers throughout the country had been on the decline. That argument, if it is worth anything at all, may show that even before 1862 the disadvantages under which the trade laboured were already so great as to drive men out of it; but surely, to a logical mind, this can be no valid reason for greatly adding to those disadvantages. It is an indisputable fact, take it as you will, that since the establishment of the present system of brewers' licences, the number of brewers has decreased far more rapidly than was previously the case, and that, according to present appearances, things are working to this result—that in a few years the brewing trade will be a gigantic monopoly in the hands of a few great houses. There are those who know this well, and there are some persons connected with these great houses who know it so well, that they do not wish success to our movement against this tax, because, if successful, it will militate against the creation of a monopoly which will greatly benefit themselves. But I ask hon. Gentlemen who are the champions of free competition in this House, whether they are prepared to acquiesce in the present system, and thus to assist in creating a monopoly in one large trade; and I ask those who are the champions of temperance, whether they think that the cause of temperance will be promoted by giving to this branch of the drinking trade such enormous power for action upon the Legislature as would undoubtedly be given to it by its concentration in the hands of a few individuals? And let me here say one other word to the champions of temperance. I am as much an advocate of temperance as any man in the House, although I utterly decline to believe that the cause of temperance can be advanced by unnatural and galling restrictions. But I want to put this to my hon. Friends—that the drinking of spirits is worse for man than the drinking of beer, and that if they desire men to abstain from the one, they should not look with disfavour upon the trade which supplies them with the other. You cannot abolish the trade of a brewer; if you wish to do so, and think you can succeed, make your proposal boldly. But if the trade of brewing is to continue a legitimate trade, you will gain none of your objects by supporting a tax which is gradually making it a monopoly. This trade has a right to be treated as justly and as fairly as any other trade; and to drive out of it all but the larger traders will not cause one pint of beer less to be drunk in the country; will not promote the cause of temperance in the smallest degree, but will simply deprive the public of the advantages which they obtain in all cases from free and fair trade competition. Let me prove this from the last Return presented to the House on the subject. The total number of brewers in 1877 was 24,747; in 1878, 23,626: decrease, 1,121. Of these, the number of brewers who brewed over 50,000 barrels was, in 1877, 72; in 1878, 73: increase, 1. So that the larger brewers held their own. But the number of brewers who brewed less than 1,000 barrels was, in 1877, 19,682; in 1878, 18,678: decrease, 1,004; clearly showing that the diminution in numbers comes from the small traders, and that it is continuously going on. [Laughter.] I see that the Chancellor of the Exchequer laughs at this statement; but, whatever be the cause of the declension in the number of small brewers, I cannot think it a subject to be treated with levity, or that it can be a salutary state of things which thus forces men to abandon a legitimate trade at the rate of over 1,000 barrels per annum. And now, Sir, as I am most desirous not to occupy the time of the House for one moment longer than I can help, I do not propose to enter upon any long and minute history of the tax upon brewers' licences, nor to show how the brewers are called upon to bear at once the old duty of 4d. per lb. of hops, the new duty of an additional 1d., and the 5 per cent added in 1840 and never taken off. I will simply take up the question from the period of 1862, when the present system was established. And if I can show—first, that the arguments then used to justify the imposition of this tax have all been contradicted by the experience of time; and secondly, which is more important still, if I can show that the tax in itself is vicious in principle, unjust, irritating, and contrary to every principle of sound and fair taxation, then, Sir, I think I shall have gone far to prove that there is good reason at least for the inquiry which I have to demand to-night. In order to prove my first proposition, I must refer to the Financial Statement of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, in which he dealt with this question and imposed this tax. My right hon. Friend was about to abolish the hop duty, and he proposed this tax on brewers' licences as a kind of substitute. I think he fell into some slight error in believing that the brewers had been the promoters of the agitation for the repeal of the hop duty. That was not so. The agitation was a bona fide agitation on the part of the hop-growers, quorum pars parva fui, and the brewers had but little to do with it, although they may have sympathized to some extent with an object so thoroughly legitimate. But, be this as it may, after announcing his intended boon to the hop-growers, my right hon. Friend turned his attention to the anomalous state of the then existing scale of charges for brewers' licences. He said that—

"The charge is arranged on an ascending scale . . . which, on the slightest inspection, will be seen to be eminently burdensome to the small tradesmen, and in favour, I must say, beyond all bounds of the larger."

He pointed out that if a brewer brewed less than 20 barrels he paid 10s. 6d. for his licence, or 6½d. per barrel; if he brewed 50 barrels, he paid £1 1s., or 5½d. per barrel; if he brewed 1,000 barrels, he paid £2 2s., or ½d. per barrel; whereas, if he brewed 80,000 barrels, it worked out at ¼d. per barrel. And he said that this was "a state of things which in common justness and fairness warranted an alteration." Now, the proposal of my right hon. Friend was—

"To re-adjust the scale of the brewers' licences on the principle of including in them generally an equivalent, or nearly an equivalent, to the charge in respect to the present hop duty from which they will be released."—[3 Hansard, clxvi. 479.]

He said—

"Threepence in the form of hop duty is the minimum which the brewer now pays as an element in the price of his hops, and that minimum we propose to charge in the shape of licence duty."—[Ibid. 480.]

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

This was his calculation—A duty of 3*d.* represented 2 lbs. of hops, and 2 lbs. of hops, used with 2 bushels of malt, represented a barrel of beer containing 36 gallons. The duty thus imposed, then, was 3*d.* per barrel, or equal to 1*s.* per quarter upon the malt used. But it unfortunately turns out that although it was estimated in 1862, and the Excise still estimate, that every quarter of malt will produce four barrels of beer, and exacts the tax in accordance with this estimate, experience proves the estimate to be wholly fallacious. Now, as one example is as good as 100 in a case such as this, I will quote one in order to show how erroneous this estimate was, and how the trade has suffered in consequence. A firm of brewers in London consumed last year 193,416 quarters of malt, which was estimated to produce 773,669 barrels of beer, and the duty paid was £9,671 5*s.*; but the quantity of liquor in reality made was only 613,310 barrels; so that a tax of 3*d.* per barrel was paid upon 160,357 barrels which were never made, and the firm thus paid £2,004 9*s.* 3*d.* upon an article which was not produced. And in different amounts this has, of course, been the case throughout the whole Kingdom. Therefore, the main calculation, and one of the main arguments upon which my right hon. Friend founded his justification of this tax, has proved to be fallacious, and affords no justification at all. Again, my right hon. Friend stated as another reason why this tax would not press unfairly on the brewers that they would benefit by a lower price of hops. He said—

"No doubt, the brewers will obtain, though not, perhaps, at the very moment, the whole further benefit of the reduction of the hop duty which we now propose."—[Ibid.]

What has been the fact? I find from the books of one large brewing firm this record—that for the seven years from 1856 to 1862 inclusive, the average price which they paid for their hops was £5 10*s.* 11½*d.* per cwt; whilst for the 16 years which have elapsed since the repeal of the hop duties, the average price which they have paid has been £5 15*s.* 5½*d.*—including last year, when the mould affected a large acreage of hops, and the price only averaged from £3 10*s.* to £3 15*s.*

—so that instead of the brewer recouping himself for the licence duty by the lower price which he has had to pay for his hops, it has been rather the other way, and the justification of this tax also falls to the ground. Therefore, I think I need not go further to prove my first point—namely, that the arguments by which the imposition of this tax was justified have been contradicted by the experience of time. Now, to summarize—1st, the estimate of the yield of the article upon which the tax was based has been shown to be erroneous; 2nd, instead of being an equivalent for the minimum of hop duty previously paid, it has been much more than an equivalent; 3rd, the brewers have not received the benefits prophesied for them at the time of the repeal of the hop duties in the shape of the lower price of hops. And I may further add that the intention of my right hon. Friend having evidently been to assist the smaller brewers in their competition with the great houses, that benevolent intention has been entirely frustrated, and the last state of those men has proved to be worse than the first. I acknowledge, indeed, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did attempt to relieve them, in 1875, by the substitution of a 12*s.* 6*d.* tax per 50 barrels in lieu of the former sliding scale; but the boon was small after all, and the £60,000 lost to the Revenue was not given to the small brewers only, but was shared by their larger brethren. But I have now to show what are the specific and grave objections to this tax as a tax, and what are the special grievances of those whom I represent. I have gone very carefully into this subject, and I find eight principal and separate objections which can be urged against this tax. The first of these is, that it is an exceptional tax to which no other trade is subject. Other licence taxes are entirely different. I will not use my own arguments here. I will take my powder out of the enemy's magazine, and quote the words of my hon. Friend the present Secretary to the Treasury upon this point, in 1873, when he had charge of this question. He said—

"When the wine duty was reduced from 5*s.* 6*d.* to 1*s.*, no equivalent duty was placed on the wine merchant. A wine merchant who desired to import or sell a cask of wine paid 10 guineas, and he paid no more whatever number of casks he sold or imported. A distiller, who was more akin to the brewer, paid a double duty —namely, 10 guineas for his licence and 10 guineas for the privilege of rectifying. That was a fixed tax, and enabled him to deal with any quantity."—[3 Hansard, ccxv. 907-8.]

I quote, moreover, the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich in that same debate, when, after saying that the peculiar hardship alleged in regard to this tax was that it was based on conditions "such as were imposed on no other trade or calling," he went on to say—

"He admitted that there was no case analogous to the brewer's licence."—[Ibid. 911.]

I go no further at this moment than to object to this tax as exceptional, and I say that this first objection cannot be denied, and is, of itself, condemnatory of the tax. The second objection is, that this tax is not what it pretends to be—a licence duty. It is, in reality, an additional 1s. upon the malt tax of 21s. 8d. per quarter, which the brewer pays besides—a most exorbitant tax, indeed, when the price of his barley is 31s. per quarter. This tax fulfils none of the usual conditions of a licence duty. A licence duty confers a monopoly of the sale of the article for the right of selling which the duty is paid. So, in the case of distilleries, no private stills are allowed; and, moreover, I may remark, the duty is only payable when the spirit is withdrawn for sale. But, in this instance, mark the difference—the public brewer, who brews to get his living, is taxed; the private brewer, who brews for his convenience, is untaxed. Put it in other words. The brewer who exchanges the article which he produces for money is taxed. The brewer who exchanges the article he produces for the labour of his servants, or who produces it to save himself the greater expense or trouble of buying it, is left untaxed. And who are the private brewers whom you thus favour in your taxation? Not poor men, but men possessed of wealth and owning large establishments; so that you have the rich lord brewing without being taxed, whilst the struggling brewer in his village is weighted with taxation. The injustice is so palpable that it was admitted by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich in 1862, when he actually proposed a licence for private brewers—save such as were farmers or of the labouring class—which he had to withdraw in consequence of the opposition it encountered. I know it is said that the number of private brewers has not increased since 1862; if the contrary were the case, the hardship upon the brewing trade would, of course, be aggravated; but the fact does not remove the manifest injustice of the present system. The third objection to the tax is, that it is a second Income Tax, and one of a most unfair character, inasmuch as it is a tax upon the capital of the brewer before he begins his operations; and not only not a tax upon profits, but a tax totally irrespective of profits altogether. The brewers have to pay six months in advance, and if the brewing is spoiled, and is unsaleable, they have to pay just the same—or, rather, they have paid before they have got one sixpence of return for their outlay, and this totally irrespective of profit and loss. There is no deduction for bad debts; there is no consideration whatever of the result of the operation of brewing. An arbitrary estimate of the quantity of liquor to be produced by the quantity of ingredients used is made—that estimate I have already shown to be fallacious, yet the tax is based thereupon—and the brewer has to pay this second Income Tax upon an income which he has not made, and which he often never makes. And then, as if this was not enough, the Income Tax collector comes, and he is assessed to the Income Tax upon the fallacious estimate of profits established by the Excise, and thus doubly robbed. Can anything be more iniquitous? The fourth objection is, that it is a most inconvenient tax, and imposes great restrictions upon a legitimate trade. The brewer has to give 24 hours' notice before brewing, and two hours' notice of ingredients intended to be used; neither of these notices can be altered. He has also to provide special rooms for sugar and malt. His mash tuns can only be filled at specified times, and emptied after Excise inspection. If, after giving his first notice, an order comes which requires a greater quantity of malt, he must give a fresh 24 hours' notice. If an order is countermanded, so that he requires less malt, he has still to pay the full duty on the quantity for which he had first given notice. Other notices are required, and, in a word, the brewer lives under the supervision of the Excise-man, and really works in fetters as no other tradesman does in this country.

And these inconveniences do not fall so much upon the great brewer who has a large staff of servants and brews constantly, as upon the small man who only brews occasionally, and who is worried to death and gradually driven out of the trade by the vexations and difficulties by which he is surrounded. It has been stated to me to-day that, in many cases, these restrictions are not now in practice enforced. But surely, if that is the truth, it strengthens my case for an inquiry whether rules which are found too oppressive to be put in force cannot be done away with altogether. The fifth objection is, that the tax is surrounded by penalties enough to frighten any honest trader out of his senses. The alteration of an entry by a careless or dishonest servant, a trifling accident, or the spite of an Exciseman, all expose the brewer to penalties which cannot but be oppressive and injurious. I hold in my hand a list of these penalties with which I will not trouble the House; but it will be easily seen that they are such as greatly to annoy the brewer and impede his trade. The present system, indeed, bristles with penalties with which a legitimate trade ought not to be hampered.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, continuing, said: This is a small interruption; let us hope we shall not have a "bigger" one. My next two objections are of a somewhat different character, and I do not urge them as being so certain and unanswerable as those which I have already urged. They are, however, objections which have been brought under my notice by persons acquainted with the trade, and I think it right to include them among the eight prominent objections to the tax. One of these, which I will take as the sixth objection, is that this tax directly clashes with the malt tax, because there is a temptation to evade the tax by reducing the quantity of malt used and substituting other ingredients. The duty being nearly 5 per cent addition to the malt tax, by reducing the strength of the beer 5 per cent, 5 per cent less malt is used, and 5 per cent less malt duty paid; in which case, the total amount of Revenue collected would not be increased, the amount of licence duty being practically so much deducted from the amount of malt tax. It is much as if you were to put a tax upon all the gas consumed, and then to put a tax upon every gas-burner; surely the one tax would militate against the other. The seventh objection is the temptation which the tax offers the dishonest trader to adulterate and deteriorate the liquor. I touch upon this subject with great tenderness and delicacy, and I believe the great majority of brewers are too honest and too anxious to give good liquor to their customers to be tempted. But I am told, though I can scarcely credit it, that an eminent statesman once advised the brewers that, if this tax pressed heavily upon them, they could recoup themselves from the New River, and if this plan were adopted, an artificial fulness might probably be given to the beer by the use of other ingredients than malt. I make the objection for what it is worth, and I leave the House to follow out the suggestion and judge for themselves whether or no the temptation is not held out by the tax. The eighth objection is, undoubtedly, valid—namely, that the tax is unfair to the brewer in his competition with the lighter wines, with cider and with perry. Since 1862 there has been a great reduction in the duty on all kinds of wine; on champagne, for instance, I am told as much as 80 per cent. So the rich get their beverages much cheaper, whilst this tax is aimed at the beverage of the working classes. Is cider—is perry—more wholesome than beer? Why should both be untaxed and the national liquor be thus persecuted by taxation? The fact is, Sir, that this is a tax for general purposes imposed upon one particular class of the community. Why should it be so imposed? Is it because this class is supposed to be wealthy? Then why do you not attempt to tax bankers as well? Is it because you think it will check drinking? Then why not tax, in a similar manner, the wine merchant and the sellers of cider and perry? The Chancellor of the Exchequer is a Devonshire man; the taxation of cider would come home to him, and he sees the objection. Then let him sympathize with me, as a man of Kent, who objects to the taxation of beer, the national beverage of his county. The brewers claim no exceptional privilege, but they protest against an exceptional burden. They upon the private brewer. As his right hon. Friend said, the tax was falsely called a licence duty, because it did not not fall upon the private brewer. In theory, there could be no doubt that the arrangement of taxation seemed to give an advantage to private brewers; but if that were actually the case in practice, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) supposed they must assume that if there were no causes in operation which reduced the number of small brewers except this tax, and if the private brewer was exempt from the tax, as he was, it would follow that the number of private brewers ought to increase. If the licence duty was so injurious, and if the private brewers were not subjected to it, they had an advantage, and one would suppose that they would increase. But, in point of fact, the number of private brewers had not increased. Everybody knew that, although there were still a certain number of great houses in which private brewing was maintained, and in which it would probably be maintained under any circumstances, yet, in point of fact, a large number of private families were now abandoning the habit of private brewing, and were going to the great brewers to supply them, and that was in accordance with the natural law which induced them to go where the practice and the large capital employed gave them advantage. Under all these circumstances, they might set aside, at all events, the argument that the effect of this tax was to destroy and to injure the small brewers to the advantage of the larger brewers. He did not believe that that was the case. It might be said that the small brewers, and the large brewers also, were subject to certain restrictions in connection with the tax, and that it would be a good thing for them to get rid of it. He did not for a moment deny that. Of course, it would be a good thing for anybody subject to the Income Tax and the restrictions connected with the Excise to get rid of such burdens altogether. But it was not possible to deal with taxes in that way. They could not take a single tax, and say that they would subject it to examination, and see if it imposed difficulties and inconveniences upon anybody, and if they found that it did, say then, "Let us get rid of that tax." If they did that, there would be no taxes left, for he would undertake to say that something might be said in regard to every one of them. His right hon. Friend certainly made a point, when he declared that it was not reasonable to call this a licensing tax, it being, in fact, a mere addition to the malt duty. Now, let them look at the matter in that point of view. What was the case in 1862? Up to 1862 it had been the policy of the Government to levy duties upon various intoxicating liquors. Duties were levied on spirits, on wine, and on beer, but in a different form. In old times, they used to have a duty upon beer itself. That was done away with, because it was found intolerably vexatious, and they were left with the malt tax and a tax upon hops. Those were two taxes which fell upon the materials from which beer was made. In 1862, the duty on hops was repealed; and, at the same time, an addition was made really and truly to the tax upon malt, but it was made in the form of a licence duty on the brewers who used and brewed the malt. Malt used for other purposes than brewing was not affected by that addition, and malt used by private houses in brewing was also exempt from it. Therefore, his right hon. Friend was right when he said it was something of a misnomer to call this a licence duty, because it was not imposed in connection with a privilege, but fell upon a certain class engaged in brewing. But what were they to do in order to get rid of this anomaly. If they were in the happy condition of being able to remit this taxation and sacrifice the duty, it would have to be considered in connection with other claims which would be made in other quarters; and, probably, when they came to deal with matters of that kind, a good many questions would arise as to the relative taxation upon various articles which came into competition with beer, and the taxes which fell upon other industries. That, however, was not a matter which at the present moment was before them. His right hon. Friend did not ask them to take off the tax now; but he took refuge in proposing a Committee, which Committee, so far as he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could see, had nothing whatever to inquire into, because all the facts were known; besides which, the Committee might lead to a certain amount of misconception and other inconveniences, and, after all, would not point out what his right hon. Friend wished to bring the House to—namely, a means of getting rid of the tax. If they could not afford to get rid of the tax, could they see their way to commute it, so as to obtain the same amount of Revenue in a less inconvenient manner? In that respect, his right hon. Friend had not given them as much information as he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) hoped they might have been furnished with. It was obvious that there were two ways open to them by which they might reduce the tax to a nominal amount without any sacrifice of Revenue. One of them would be by an addition to the malt duty. By adding something like 5 per cent to the duty on malt, without any sacrifice of Revenue, they would be able to obtain the same amount of Revenue and abolish the licence duty. His right hon. Friend did not say he would recommend that; but it was an important question on which they ought to have some information. If they were not to add to the malt tax, there was another way in which the difficulty might be met, and that was by getting rid of the licence duty, and probably the malt duty itself, and substituting for them a simple beer duty. Did his right hon. Friend recommend the adoption of that course, or was the Committee to go into the question whether it would be possible and desirable to substitute a beer duty? He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) thought that would be a very large proposition; and if it were in the contemplation of his right hon. Friend that the Committee should go into such matters as that, he ought to enlarge the scope of his Order of Reference, and give the House some of his arguments on that subject. A beer duty was one of which, in former times, the country had some experience, and upon which a good deal of information could be obtained from the shelves of the Library. It would, therefore, be interesting to know whether the recommendation which his right hon. Friend wished the Committee to consider was the abolition of the malt tax and the substitution of a beer duty. But if he understood his right hon. Friend to ask the Government neither to sacrifice the Revenue, nor to make an addition to the malt tax, nor to consider the substitution of a beer tax for the malt tax, then, he would ask, what were the particular objects his right hon. Friend proposed to gain by his inquiry? They had been told that the system of licences at present involved arrangements which were inconvenient to the trade; that there were too many notices required, and too many arrangements as to separate rooms; that the trade was subject to vexatious penalties; that a careless or malicious servant might expose his master to serious evils; and other matters of that kind. No doubt, it was most desirable that there should be frequent, or, at all events, occasional examinations of the manner in which the duties were raised, in order to see that no unnecessary vexation was imposed on the subject in reference to these duties. He felt very strongly that it was quite possible that, through the want of that periodical revision of obsolete rules which was really necessary for the convenience of the public, needless restrictions were sometimes forced upon those who were carrying on a business which was subject to the Excise. It seemed to be thought that if they got rid of this licence duty, they would get rid of the necessity of all these restrictions, and that they would hear nothing more about those interests of Excisemen, and other things necessary to prevent the evasion of the duty. He himself very much doubted whether that would be the case—whether, under any circumstances, they would be able to get rid of the inspections and the visits from the officers of the Excise which were now made the subject of complaint, because, unless they could abandon the idea of raising revenue from beer, it would be requisite to ascertain what the processes in the breweries were, in order to see that the brewer was not using improper substances. A certain amount of inspection would be necessary over those carrying on the business. He ventured to doubt whether, upon the whole, it would be very useful to submit questions of the sort to a Committee of the House of Commons. He did not know whether hon. Members thought it would be desirable that they should have all the proceedings and processes of manufacture the subject of a long inquiry, and every sort of investigation carried on in public before a Committee of the House. Many of these discussions were extremely inconvenient. They agitated the trade, caused expectations, and brought about a good deal of confusion. He thought it would be far better that they should have, on the part of the Government a departmental inquiry into complaints which might then be brought before them with regard to the working of the present system. The proposal of the abolition of the duty was a matter which they could not for the present entertain. As to the remission of the malt tax, he thought they had not had any case made out that would justify them going in for such an alteration. But if it could be shown that the licence duty was unequally assessed; that the mode in which the quantities were fixed was not a proper mode; that the malt assumed to be used for a barrel of beer was not what it should be; or that there were restrictions which might be in any way disadvantageous, these points might be brought before them by practical members of the trade, and the Government would be most happy to examine them patiently. He did not think, however, in spite of the very able way in which his right hon. Friend had introduced the subject again to their notice, and the ingenious way in which he had put his arguments before them, that a case had been made out for the Motion he had brought before the House.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he had felt, during the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) would result in nothing practical. To that Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, who proposed—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the nature and incidence of the Tax upon Brewers' Licences," he had intended, if the Forms of the House would have allowed, to move the addition of the words "and upon the best mode of supplying a substitute for it." It was, he thought, impossible to contemplate the abolition of this tax without also looking at another great tax—namely, the tax upon malt. The brewers' licence duty appeared to him (Mr. Mitchell Henry) to be wholly indefensible, and one of the worst taxes that could be imposed upon the industry of any country; indeed, there was hardly another example of a similar tax upon the manufacturer. He believed that the brewers' licence duty pressed with peculiar hardship upon deserving and poor men, numbers of whom were being driven, as they believed, out of the trade in consequence; and although other causes might have contributed to this result, there could be no doubt that the tax was felt by them to be peculiarly hard and galling. The parallel drawn by the Chancellor of the Exchequer between the cases of the private brewer and the professional brewer, who made his livelihood by brewing, was, in his (Mr. Mitchell Henry's) opinion, inapplicable. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the private and small brewers were decreasing in number; and, therefore, that as one was taxed and the other was not taxed, the tax had no effect upon the professional brewer. But that was not so, for the reason why people had ceased to brew privately was that they got better ale by buying it from the large brewers, for with the private consumer the question was not trade but quality and convenience. The question, however, ought to be approached in a much broader spirit and on a larger scale. He believed that it was impossible for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to abolish the tax upon brewers' licences, as also the tax upon malt, which, in his (Mr. Mitchell Henry's) opinion, was quite as bad, unless a substitute were provided for them. Therefore, he asked permission of the House to propose a direct substitute for the two taxes in question. He would at once state that his proposal was to revert to the old practice of placing a direct tax upon the manufactured article of beer; and he believed it could be shown that this tax would not in the slightest degree interfere with the consumption of beer, or be felt seriously by the consumer. On the other hand, the tax would provide the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a very large Revenue, and enable him to abolish both the malt tax, and the tax upon brewers' licences. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer had mentioned, this tax did exist in former times; but in consequence of the inconvenience attending its collection, it had been abolished almost 50 years ago, and, eventually, a tax had been imposed upon the unmanufactured article of malt. He was not there to contend that it was possible to lay a differential tax upon the various descriptions of beer which were brewed, of which there were at least seven or eight kinds in ordinary consumption; but it could be shown, and he believed that it would be admitted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he looked at the question from a practical point of view, that the imposition of the tax upon beer would neither raise the price of the article to any appreciable extent, nor be attended with any intolerable hardship to brewers. It was not his argument that evening to enter upon the question, which he had already raised once or twice, of equalizing the tax upon the alcohol contained in spirits, and the alcohol contained in beer. At the present time, they raised on alcohol—that was, upon beer, wine, and spirits, upon licence duty and upon the sugar used in brewing, no less than £33,000,000 a-year, and it was a circumstance of very considerable importance to know that they spent £155,000,000 annually in buying alcoholic liquors. He maintained that, by the adoption of the proposition which he was about to submit, there would not be the slightest difficulty in getting, in addition to the £9,000,000 taxes now practically levied upon beer, in the shape of the malt tax, brewers' licences, and sugar duty, the additional sum of £6,000,000, which would enable the Government to abolish every one of those Customs' duties which pressed so heavily upon the people who did not drink alcoholic liquors—that was to say, it would permit the abolition of the tea and coffee and other such duties. The brewers' licences produced £433,000 a-year, and the sugar used in brewing £526,000 a-year; while the sum derived from the malt tax amounted to very nearly £8,000,000. He did not think the country could do without that taxation, which amounted in all to £9,000,000 a-year; but however that tax was levied, whether upon the article of beer itself, or upon the material used in its manufacture—whether upon the meal or the malt—it was still a direct tax upon beer; and, for that reason, in suggesting some modification of the duties on beer, he was not proposing a new tax. The quantity of malt used in brewing was as nearly as possible 57,000,000 bushels, or about 8,000,000 quarters. Now, it had been assumed by the Excise authorities that one barrel of beer should be produced from two bushels of malt; but this had been considered as too high an average, although he was prepared to assume that it was a reasonable one. But as he desired to be perfectly fair in his statement of the case, he would assume that it required $2\frac{1}{2}$ bushels of malt to make 36 gallons, or one barrel, of beer; and on that basis he would found his calculation that 115 gallons of beer would be produced from every quarter of malt; and that, as there were 8,000,000 quarters used in the course of the year, the total quantity of beer which ought to be produced would be 920,000,000 gallons annually. There were several classes of beer; but he would deal first with such beers as Bass's and Allsopp's ales, as examples of beers of the highest class, which contained from 8 per cent to $11\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of proof spirit. Upon these beers, then, of the highest class, and containing from 8 to $11\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of proof spirit, he proposed that there should be a tax in the shape of an Excise stamp duty of 9s. per half-barrel. How would that affect the producer and consumer? The beers in question, upon which, according to his calculation, about 4s. 6d. per half-barrel was already levied indirectly, were being sold at hotels, railway stations, and refreshment rooms, at the rate of 6d. the reputed pint, or 3d. a-glass. Upon these beers alone, representing about one-third of the total production which, as he had already pointed out, amounted to 920,000,000 gallons, would be raised, by the addition of the proposed duty of 9s. per half-barrel, £7,500,000 annually, and that by increasing the price to the consumer less than $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per glass. Indeed, he believed, from the competition which would ensue, if the trade were thrown open, that it would be found that this additional $\frac{1}{2}$ d. would never be added at all, and that the beer would continue to be sold to the public at 3d. per glass. But even if the price were raised by $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per glass, there was, in his opinion, no reason to believe that with regard to an article of such great popularity with the higher and middle classes as pale ale, the consumption would be in the slightest degree diminished. Besides the beers mentioned, there were in ordinary consumption four different classes of beer, containing from 5 to 8 per cent of proof spirit, which he proposed to take together, and tax at the rate of 4s. 6d. per half-barrel. How would that affect the prices to the consumer? The class of beer which came next to Bass's, and the rest to which he had referred, was sold at 4*d.* a-pint, and its present cost was 48*s.* per half-barrel of 18 gallons. The proposed tax of 4*s.* 6*d.* per half-barrel would not raise the price of this kind of beer to the consumer by more than $\frac{1}{4}$ d. a-glass. The next class was sold at 3*d.* a-pint, and the cost was 36*s.* per half-barrel; in the same way, the price of this beer to the consumer would be raised by less than $\frac{1}{4}$ d. a-glass. The next class was sold at 2*d.* a-pint, or 30*s.* per half-barrel, and upon this, and the rest of the beers, the increased price would be so small to the consumer as to render the calculation unnecessary. He had endeavoured to show that by a duty of 9*s.* per half-barrel upon the manufactured article of the first class the sum of £7,500,000 would be raised. A like sum would also be raised from the remaining classes of beer—namely, those which contained from 5 per cent of proof spirit and upwards; so that altogether, if his proposal were adopted, a total sum of £15,000,000 would be obtained annually. It was an important question to consider whether that amount could be raised in a manner which would not be intolerable to the brewers. At the present moment, the brewer was subject to a number of restrictions, to which the right hon. Gentleman who introduced this Motion had referred. All that would be necessary in the new tax would be a book of stamps like the delivery books given by railway companies. The Excise would keep the counter-part, and the stamps, which would be several inches wide, would be affixed by the brewer under the supervision of the officers of Excise. The stamps might be put over the bung-hole of the cask. ["Oh, oh!"] An hon. and gallant Member opposite seemed surprised at such an absurd notion; but was it more absurd than the present mode of settling the malt duty, or collecting the brewers' licences? The system could be carried out with the greatest ease. The brewers could purchase the books of stamps, taking out a nominal licence in proportion to the number of gallons of beer which they manufactured. There would be no difficulty in that respect, for already there was a Return which showed the quantity of beer produced by every brewer in the United Kingdom. But what would be the other effects of carrying out his proposal? The country would lose £9,000,000 of taxes by the abolition of the brewers' licences, the tax upon sugar used in brewing, and the malt tax; but the brewers and agriculturists would very much appreciate the abolition of taxes which now fell upon them; while, on the other hand, £15,000,000 would be raised by the plan he proposed. From this would result a surplus of £6,000,000, which would enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to abolish all the Customs duties, except those on tobacco—that was to say, the duties upon chicory, coffee, currants, figs, plums, prunes, &c., which amounted to something like £900,000 annually; and, in addition to these, the duty upon tea, which amounted to about £4,000,000 a-year. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would then have £1,000,000 remaining, which he could devote to any purpose that pleased him. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) considered the suggestion which he had made well worthy of the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, who, it was to be hoped, having stated his willingness to appoint a Departmental Committee to inquire into the nature and incidence of the tax upon brewers' licences, would also allow the Committee to inquire earnestly and seriously into the feasibility of imposing a tax upon the manufactured article of beer, in place of those duties now imposed upon the raw material used in brewing and upon the trade of those persons who were struggling to make a living by this manufacture. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) believed the figures quoted by him to be absolutely correct; and he had, moreover, the authority of hon. Members in the House, who were able to speak upon the subject with greater weight than he could pretend to, for saying that his proposal was perfectly feasible; and he, therefore, hoped that on the appointment of the Committee it would receive the serious consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that everyone knew that the whole incidence of the tax upon brewers' licences was before the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and, therefore, what was the use of an inquiry? If the necessity for such an inquiry was so imperative as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) assumed, why had he not drawn attention to the matter when he and his Friends were in Office, and when what he wished to have done in the matter might have been effected? In that case, however, he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) thought that, supposing a duty were imposed on beer, the small brewers, as a class, would be annihilated. In spite of the depression in the country during the last few years, the brewers had been doing well; while, as to a remission of the tax, the present was no time for taking off a tax of the kind, which was not oppressive, though, perhaps, it was to some extent vexatious. He altogether denied that it was looked upon generally, even by the brewers themselves, as an unjust tax, and he believed they would rather endure it ten times over than have a tax imposed on beer. He was of opinion that no case had been made out for a Select Committee; and, looking at the present consumption of liquors throughout the country, he thought this tax was one of the last that this House would think ought to be repealed.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

SIR WILFRID LAWSON thought his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had been rather hard on the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), in asking him why he had not moved in this matter when a Liberal Government was in Office. The fact, however, was that agitation of this kind was always very vigorous when a Liberal Government was in Office, but it generally relaxed when a Conservative Government came in. There was a French statesman who had been described as having spent his life in coming to the rescue of the strongest. This seemed the aim of the right hon. Gentleman in coming to the assistance of the brewers, that powerful body, who were alone prosperous in these hard times, and who were very well able to protect themselves. He knew the great and sincere interest his right hon. Friend took in anything connected with the liquor traffic. He remembered his attending a dinner of the Licensed Victuallers; there was the same idea of a Bill being brought in for their relief, and he said the proper way would be that the publicans should be consulted, and, according to what they wanted, so the Bill should be drafted. His right hon. Friend had chosen a very curious time to make an appeal to the House on behalf of the brewers. The brewers had been doing very well; they always did well. The drink trade was always prosperous. At a Licensed Victuallers' dinner that took place at Burton, one of the speakers, speaking of the bad times, the great distress that prevailed, said Burton was the only green spot—the oasis in the desert. Coal and iron were depressed, but drink was bringing in lots of money still. But, although the brewers were so prosperous, they were always complaining—they complained of the Excise, of the magistrates and the police, the Good Templars, and the whole community. In fact, they represented themselves as a class of men whose sole object it was to benefit mankind, yet they were harassed by every one. The Association for the Repeal of the Brewers' Licences was formed in 1874. Shortly afterwards there was a grand deputation to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; 208 brewers and 58 Members of Parliament were present. Some conversation took place. The Chancellor of the Exchequer asked what effect the repeal of the duty would have on the price of beer? One of the deputation replied, none whatever; the consumer never paid the tax. Whereupon the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he would not detain the deputation any longer. When the present Government, which owed a good deal to the publicans, came into Office, they did something for the brewers, which ought to have satisfied them. Whatever the brewers or anybody else might say, he believed there was no doubt that the tax was paid by the consumer somehow or other. If, however, it was paid by the producer, he was the last person who should be relieved in a time of national distress; and if it was paid by the consumer, the House ought not to encourage him to drink more by making his drink cheaper. So that, whether the consumer or the producer paid, there was no case for alteration. The beer drinker had been described by the hon. Gentleman below as a distressed man. [Mr. MITCHELL HENRY: The small brewer.] Well, was that any reason for encouraging the drinking of more beer? He would not give his own opinion. It was not well to give the opinion of a fanatic. But he would quote the opinion of Sir Henry Thompson in a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury—a letter from a man who had the care of our bodies to a man who had the care of our souls. Sir Henry Thompson said that the habitual use of fermented liquors, far short of what was necessary to produce drunkenness, and such as was quite common in all ranks of society, injured the body and diminished the mental powers to an extent which few people were aware of; and he believed there was no single habit in this country which so much tended to deteriorate the qualities of the race, and so much disqualified them for that endurance which was required in that struggle in which the prizes must fall to the best and the strongest. Yet they were asked, in the face of that dreadful state of things, to relieve the manufacturers of these liquors from taxation. If that was the only remedy which the right hon. Gentleman had to propose for the misery and destitution of the country, he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) thanked God he was not a statesman, and was never likely to be one. There was no greater fallacy than to suppose, if you dosed people with weak alcohol, they would grow up strong. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he brought in a Bill for supplying people with cheap wine, saying he did it for the purpose of promoting temperance in this country, and that if they drank this sour, nasty stuff, they would give up stronger liquors. There never was a greater delusion. The result had been—

“That those then drank who never drank before,
And those who always drank then drank the more.”

He, therefore, hoped the House would get rid of the superstitious idea that they would wean people from drinking one form of alcohol by encouraging them to drink another. We tried the same thing before in the case of cheap beer, but everyone knew there was never a greater evil, and those who supported the measure in a short time saw the greatness of their delusion. Dr. Richardson said it was perfectly horrible that so much Revenue should be raised by the degradation of the nation. But, as it was the system to raise about one-third of our Revenue by the sale and consumption of strong drink, let us have equality, and let not the man who drank one sort of liquor pay less than the man who drank another. He fully admitted the convincing force of the figures with which the future Chancellor of the Exchequer of the Home Rule Party (Mr. Mitchell-Henry) had sustained the proposal which he had just made to them to tax beer; and also the reasonableness of the complaint which the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. Orr-Ewing) had more than once urged, as to the way in which spirits were taxed as compared with beer, and that alcohol in Scotch whisky was taxed much higher than alcohol in English beer. Let the English sot and the tippling Scot pay exactly the same. He would not, however, level down, but level up, and the simplest way would be to increase the malt duty; but as that proposal threatened to drive some hon. Gentlemen crazy, they might impose a duty on beer. Beer was taxed one-fifth of its price, or 20 per cent; spirits were taxed four-fifths of their price, or 80 per cent. That was not fair. There was no need for a Committee, the matter had been very well discussed, and might be very properly left in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He hoped, therefore, every hon. Gentleman of common sense in the House would, on this occasion, vote against the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sandwich, and give his hearty support to Her Majesty's Government.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 115; Noes 53: Majority 62.—(Div. List, No. 99.)

Main Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

NOXIOUS GASES BILL.—[BILL 123.]

(Mr. Sclater-Booth, Viscount Sandon, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Salt.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the measure was based on the recommendations of a Royal Commission. Its character was very comprehensive, as it sought to provide for the whole Kingdom, wherever a noxious trade was carried on, or noxious gas emanations injurious to the health of the public were produced, such a remedy as would be readily applicable without unduly interfering with the industry of the country. It was intended by the Bill to raise from the trades and manufacturers themselves a comparatively small sum of money which, with the amount already provided by Parliament, would be sufficient to supply an adequate machinery for giving effect to its object. In connection with the history of previous legislation with regard to the subject, he would remind the House that the original Alkali Act, passed in 1863, was designed to cure the mischief done to vegetation from the evolution of muriatic acid gas. It limited to a great extent the mischief done by isolated works; but the progress of trade had led to the establishment of a great aggregation of these manufactories in many districts, especially on the Tyne and Mersey, and the result was that vegetation was entirely destroyed in those neighbourhoods. Accordingly, when he entered upon his present office, applications were made to him by gentlemen connected with the localities thus affected for an amendment and extension of the Act. That was affected by the Act of 1874, which required the owners of those factories so to conduct their operations as to allow only an almost imperceptible amount of muriatic acid gas to escape from the chimneys of their works at one time. Complaints, however, were still made that vegetation continued to wither from the effect of these gases, and the Government consented in 1875-6 to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the working of the Act and report on the whole subject of the injury to the public done by noxious vapours. Concurrently with the appointment of the Royal Commission an Inspector of the Local Government Board was engaged to examine factories and ascertain what means were available to diminish the mischief the caused by the evolution of gases; and he recommended that provisions analogous to those in the Alkali Acts should be applied to several trades. The first part of the Bill consolidated and re-enacted the main provision of the Alkali Acts, and added new obligations with regard to sulphuric and other acids upon the manufacturers, in order that as little as possible might be emitted during the process of manufacturing. The second part was devoted to the trades that were placed for the first time under these obligations. The third part catalogued all the remaining trades that were to come under inspection, and that were to be liable to be called upon to adopt such preventive methods as were from time to time shown to be applicable. In this way, the inspection hitherto confined to alkali works would be extended for the benefit of the whole community. Existing works would be allowed a certain time for re-registration, without which no new works would be allowed. Licence fees would have to be paid and would reduce the cost of inspection, and a sanitary district, or a combination of two or more districts, might apply for the services of an Inspector, who would be paid by the Government, the district to guarantee a certain proportion of the salary. Complaint had been made of the supposed leniency of the Alkali Inspectors in instituting proceedings, but he doubted whether there was any ground for such complaint. The efficiency of inspection was not to be tested by the number of proceedings against works, for much good was done indirectly and without resort to legal measures. If the law with regard to nuisances arising from noxious gases were made uniform throughout the United Kingdom, he was satisfied that manufacturers would readily adopt any regulations on the subject which might be laid down. In conclusion, he would move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Selater-Booth).

SIR HENRY JAMES moved the adjournment of the debate, and his reasons for doing so he felt sure the House would accept. This was a very important Bill, in which many persons were strongly interested who were absent, and it seriously affected certain manufacturers in, for instance, the 29th clause. Therefore, when the Bill was discussed it ought to be discussed fully. Now, the right hon. Gentleman was asked on Thursday when he would take the Bill, and he distinctly said he would take it on Monday.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH begged to explain. The Bill stood for last evening. He was asked about it early in the day, and he said he was afraid from the opposition to it that it would be impossible to take it before Monday, but that he had not given up all hope of taking it that evening.

SIR HENRY JAMES asked, whether the natural inference from those words was not that the Bill would not be taken this evening? He knew many Members, including his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), who desired to speak on the Bill, had gone away, and if the second reading were pressed on, the only effect would be to create a feeling that a promise had been broken, and so to prevent its further progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Sir Henry James.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he could not resist the Motion, if it were pressed; but he believed the hon. and learned Gentleman was the only Member in the House who desired the adjournment. His answer was not reported, and as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) was not present when the answer was given, he could not be prejudiced.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON said, he was in the House at the time the answer was given; but, as he did not catch its purport, he spoke to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sclater-Booth) afterwards, and certainly understood from him that he would bring on the measure that (Friday) night, if he could. He thought it would be very inconvenient to delay the Bill, and to waste the time of hon. Members who had come down to support the second reading.

MR. LOWTHIAN BELL could not tell, of course, what took place between the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board and the last speaker privately; but immediately after hearing the answer given on the previous evening, he went into the Lobby and told half-a-dozen gentlemen, manufacturers and others, that the Bill would not come on before Monday, and they consequently went away. As a whole, he liked the Bill, although its promoters had been singularly unjust in certain clauses to the manufacturers.

Sir Henry James

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, of course, where there was any misunderstanding as to an arrangement, it was far better to take an adjournment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

WORMWOOD SCRUBS REGULATION

BILL—[BILL 96.]

(Colonel Lindsay, Mr. Secretary Stanley, Lord Eustace Cecil.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [13th May], "That Mr. Shaw Lefevre be a Member of the Select Committee on the Wormwood Scrubs Regulation Bill."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. GORDON, Colonel KINGSCOTE, and Colonel LOYD LINDSAY nominated other Members of the Committee.

MEDICAL ACT (1858) AMENDMENT

BILL—[BILL 2.]

(Dr. Lush, Sir Trevor Lawrence, Sir Joseph M'Kenna.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [12th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Serjeant Simon.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to the Select Committee on Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 3) Bill [Lords].

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, upon Tuesday next, at Two of the clock, resolve itself into the said Committee."—(Colonel Stanley.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had no intention of detaining the House, but it had always been the effort of the Opposition to keep the Government to an understanding as to when Morning Sittings should commence. The rule always had been that they should not commence regularly before the 10th or 12th of June, and for two years the first Morning Sitting was on the 19th of June. There had sometimes been exceptional Morning Sittings, one in March and one in April, but these were always regarded as purely exceptional. [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON dissented.] His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, he saw, shook his head; but on the last occasion when this matter was discussed, his hon. Friend the Member for Rochester (Sir Julian Goldsmid) went very carefully into the figures, and prepared a tabulated statement which was reported in Hansard. The Government, he thought, would hardly deny that they were taking more Morning Sittings, and taking them oftener, than ever was the case before. That day made the third, another was fixed for Tuesday, and he was certain that was the earliest period at which they had ever got into them regularly. Previously, any Morning Sittings before June were always defended on the ground that they were exceptional. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed a Morning Sitting some weeks ago, he told them it was exceptional; but he only missed one Tuesday, and they had had them ever since. If Government insisted, of course, it was useless to object; but he certainly should divide the House by way of protest.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he also wished formally to enter his protest against the idea that the 10th or the 11th of June was the time at which these Morning Sittings should begin. Within the last four or five years there were two years, in each of which there had certainly been either three or four Morning Sittings—he could not pledge himself to the exact number—in either the months of April or May.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 92; Noes 15: Majority 77.—(Div. List, No. 100.)

HYPOTHEC ABOLITION (SCOTLAND) BILL—[BILL 119.]

(Mr. Vans Agnew, Mr. Baillie Hamilton, Sir George Douglas, Colonel Alexander.)

CONSIDERATION AS AMENDED.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. VANS AGNEW said, he was anxious that the Bill should be considered that evening; but in the absence of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate and most of the Scotch Members, he would defer it till Friday, the 23rd.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till Friday next.

DISPENSARIES (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Bruen, Mr. Downing, Mr. Mulholland, Mr. Ward.)

[BILL 66.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 5, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 6, (Loan to be repaid by annuity).

MR. BRUEN, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 19, to leave out from beginning to "provided," in line 29, and insert—

"Every loan made under the provisions of this Act shall bear interest at the rate of three and a half per centum per annum from the date of each advance to the fifth day of April or the tenth day of October which shall next happen after such advance, and shall be repaid by the payment to Her Majesty of an annual rent-charge of five pounds for every one hundred pounds of such loan from time to time advanced, and so in proportion for any lesser amount, to be payable for the term of thirty-five years, to be computed from the first of the said days which shall next happen after the advance in respect of which the rent-charge shall be charged, such rent-charge to be paid by equal half-yearly payments on the fifth day of April and the tenth day of October in every year, the first of such payments to be made on the second of such days which shall happen next after the issue of any such advance in respect of which the rent-charge shall be charged ;”

and in page 3, line 30, after “annual,” leave out “sum,” and insert “rent-charge ;” said, if his proposal were adopted it would bring the Bill into harmony with the Public Works Loans Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had no objection to the insertion of the words, subject to the understanding that he reserved to himself the right to make the Public Works Loans Bill now before Parliament apply, if necessary, to this Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7 amended, and agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Schedule amended, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

LICENSING LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL 25.]

(Mr. Staveley Hill, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Rodwell.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [17th April], “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Sir Harcourt Johnstone.)

Question again proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE drew attention to the fact that it was after half-past 12 o'clock, and contended that the Order, being opposed, could not be taken.

Mr. Bruen

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 48 ; Noes 30 : Majority 18.—(Div. List, No. 101.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday next.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolution [May 15] reported, and agreed to.

Ordered, That a Bill be brought in upon the said Resolution ; and that Mr. RAIKES, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON do prepare and bring it in.

Bill presented, and read the first time.

MOTIONS.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACTS

[SALARIES, &c.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the extension of the provisions of the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts 1873, and 1875, relating to the salaries and pensions of puisne Judges of the High Court of Justice, and of the officers attached to their persons, to any additional Judge who may be appointed under the provisions of any Act of the present Session for amending the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

VOLUNTEER CORPS (IRELAND) [PAY AND ALLOWANCES, &c.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of Pay and Allowances, Half Pay, and Pensions to Members of the Volunteer Force, and of pensions to their widows ; also of allowances to Clerks of general meetings of Lieutenancy in Ireland, which may become payable under the provisions of any Act of the present Session, to authorise the enrolment of Volunteer Corps in Ireland.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING ACT (1865) AMENDMENT [EXPENSES].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of any Expenses which may be incurred in keeping order in, cleaning, and in the management and use of, the Royal Courts of Justice, under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to amend "The Courts of Justice Building Act, 1865."

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (HIGHWAYS) PROVISIONAL ORDERS (DORSET, &C.) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SALT, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board under the provisions of "The Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878," relating to the Counties of Dorset, Montgomery, Northampton, Salop, Wilts, and York (East Riding), ordered to be brought in by Mr. SALT and Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 186.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT HIGHWAYS PROVISIONAL ORDERS (GLOUCESTER AND HEREFORD) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SALT, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board under the provisions of "The Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878," relating to the Counties of Gloucester and Hereford, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SALT and Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 185.]

TRAMWAYS ORDERS CONFIRMATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. JOHN G. TALBOT, Bill for confirming certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under "The Tramways Act, 1870," relating to Bristol Tramways (Extensions), Briton Ferry and Swansea Tramways, Burnley and District Tramways, Chesterfield, Brampton, and Whittington Tramways, Crewe and District Tramways, Derby Tramways, Dewsbury, Batley, and Birstal Tramways (Extension), Ipswich Tramways, Leamington and Warwick Tramways, Liverpool Corporation Tramways, Newcastle upon Tyne Tramways, North London Suburban Tramways, Oxford Tramways, Staffordshire Tramways, Stoke upon Trent, Fenton, Longton, and District Tramways, Sunderland Corporation Tramways, Sunderland Tramways (Extension), Swansea Tramways (Extension), Tynemouth and District Tramways, Wigan Tramways, York Tramways; and for empowering the Board of Trade to grant licences for the use for limited periods, by way of experiment, of steam or mechanical power upon Tramways in certain cases, ordered to be brought in by Mr. JOHN G. TALBOT and Viscount SANDON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 187.]

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 19th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, Amendment * (78).

Committee—Report—Local Government Provisional Orders (Ashton-under-Lyne, &c.) * (79).

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE GREEK FRONTIER.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: I rise to ask the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) a Question, of which I have given him private Notice, Whether the telegram which appeared in The Daily News on Saturday last, purporting to give the terms of M. Waddington's Circular with regard to the negotiations on the subject of the Greek Frontier, is correct? If the text as thus printed in extenso is correct, I hope the noble Marquess will have no objection to lay it on the Table of the House. The noble Marquess may object, that during the progress of negotiations on a question of this importance, it is undesirable to lay any Papers on the Table. I admit the force of that objection, but, at the same time, it seems to me that if the Circular can be given to the public, the House, too, is entitled to have it before it in an official and authentic form. No doubt, this question of the Greek Frontier is exciting considerable and increasing interest in this country and in Europe. There is some apprehension, that while Her Majesty's Government have been recommending the exercise of patience and forbearance to the Greeks, they are themselves somewhat lukewarm in regard to negotiations based on the 24th Article of the Treaty of Berlin; and I venture to say, without going any further, it would be of importance if the position of England in regard to the matter were clearly understood. If the noble Marquess could lay this and other Papers on the Table, giving information as to the course these negotiations are taking, he would, I think, satisfy a not unnatural desire for information, and allay no inconsiderable anxiety.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: If I were to go so far as to criticize the course taken by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Morley), what I should object to would be asking whether a document, not produced, was or was not accurately represented in some newspaper. As there is no secret in the present case, I may venture to indicate generally that the Circular, as published, is correct. But if the document was a document that could not be produced, and was inaccurately represented in a newspaper, a Minister could not say that it was accurately represented. If he said it was inaccurately represented, and it turned out that the inaccuracy, in the view of the questioner, was not a matter of great importance, the Minister would be accused of practising concealment. Therefore, I should venture to say that, if a Paper cannot be produced in its entirety, it is better not to answer any Question about it. In the present case that point does not arise, although, undoubtedly, the rule with regard to pending negotiations would justify us in withholding it. I propose to lay shortly on the Table Papers which will give the required information.

AFGHANISTAN—THE PEACE NEGOTIATIONS.—OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, it may be interesting to your Lordships to know that I have received intelligence to the effect that the bases of peace with the Ameer of Afghanistan have been agreed upon.

TREATY OF BERLIN, ARTICLE 22—OCCUPATION OF BULGARIA AND EASTERN ROUMELIA.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

LORD CAMPBELL, in rising to call attention to Article 22 of the Treaty of Berlin, as it relates to the period during which the occupation of Bulgaria and East Roumelia was sanctioned; and to move for the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and other Powers on the subject, said: My Lords, in the absence of my noble Friend whose Question stood first (Lord Stanley of Alderley), I am called on to address you. As it may be thought that comments on the 22nd Article in the Treaty of Berlin might have been offered to the House on the 16th of May, I will at once encounter that objection to the Notice. No doubt, the topic was alluded to by those who mixed in the debate, and anyone who rose might feel at liberty to mention it. But in so vast an issue as the merit or demerit of the Government in all their European and Asiatic policy, to fix upon it the attention of the House, would scarcely have been possible. But even if it was possible, according to the view which guides me, the object of the Notice would not have been compassed. My Lords, ever since the Treaty of Berlin, there has been no greater matter of solicitude, to those who reason justly on the Eastern Question, than the existence of a Russian Army beyond the Pruth, the Danube, and the Balkans. It seems to me a version of the Treaty has been sanctioned which, if it goes unchallenged, must tend to prolong the occupation altogether. But it can only be challenged with effect by Notice to call attention to the subject. Whether or not a given statement in the midst of a discussion like that of Friday last goes beyond the House is utterly precarious. But a Notice, however briefly or inadequately handled, must place it upon record, that the interpretation which keeps Russian troops in the Dominion of the Sultan longer than otherwise they would be, is disputed. Besides, other noble Lords may impart to the Notice more effect than I can give it. Before questioning the new interpretation of Article 22, let me mention with what aim it seems to me worth while to question it at present. Of course, the old interpretation cannot be recovered when it has once been given up. No human force, no stretch of virtue at St. Petersburg, or ingenuity in Downing Street, can now deliver East Roumelia and Bulgaria by the 3rd of May. The question now is, whether by August there will be the final exodus over the Pruth for which the Treaty has provided. But the House will readily admit that one encroachment on the Treaty, unless it is an object of remark, remonstrance, criticism, or protest in the Assemblies of the Signatory Powers, is nearly sure to generate another. I now wish to offer a few words on the interpretation of the Article. By learned men it might, no doubt, be debated both ways at such a length as would alarm the Court of Chancery, and keep its judgment in suspense for a considerable period. But my mode of treating it will be a short, even if it is not a convincing, one. Unless analogy is cast aside, the occupation of a territory can only cease when the territory has been quitted, as the occupation of a house can only cease when the occupier leaves it. The occupation of the house would not have ceased, because after the term the occupier began, in one week to pack his library, in a second to move his horses, in a third to get his family in order for departure. Neither the occupation of a house, nor the occupation of a territory, has ceased until the house or territory has thoroughly reverted to the owner. But it is said that anything may be established by analogy. Let me proceed, therefore, to the despatch of the noble Marquess to Consul Palgrave on the 30th of September. According to the despatch, the new régime in Bulgaria must begin as soon as the nine months are over, because "the provisional Administration is to cease" exactly at that moment. It is clear, therefore, that on the 30th of September, the noble Marquess did not mean a Russian Force after the nine months to linger in that country. The provisional Administration could not cease until the Russian troops had vanished. The same remark applies to East Roumelia; but I do not dwell upon it. It is better to go on with the expressions of the Article. After the nine months in East Roumelia and Bulgaria, the closing paragraph allows three months for traversing Roumania. How could the Congress have laid down that three months might be employed in traversing Roumania, unless it held that at the beginning of the three months the other countries would be liberated? If the Russian Armies may be marching within the Ottoman and the Bulgarian Dominions after the nine months, they cannot be during the three months in Moldavia and Wallachia. According to the new interpretation, the Russian Force, (as an united whole, should be at once on both sides of the Danube, a feat without a precedent in history. No doubt, in vague terms, the Forces of the Czar have been sometimes referred to as colossal. But to execute the task the new interpretation would assign to them, each individual soldier must stride—over a large and rapid flood—as a colossus. My Lords, the same view may be supported by referring to the Protocols of Berlin. It is there distinctly seen that Count Schouvaloff demanded nine months, in order in that time to evacuate Roumelia and Bulgaria; three months, in order in that time to evacuate the territory which lies beyond the Danube. The definitive Treaty between Russia and the Porte is based on the same principle. But it is unnecessary to refer to it, because there is a quicker mode of reaching a conclusion. No one will deny that the Article may be interpreted against the Russian claim, although he thinks it may be construed also to support it. It was interpreted against the Russian claim by the noble Duke who addressed the House on Friday; by the noble Earl the Lord Warden, who, this day fortnight, first elicited the present doctrine from the Government; by all the journalists of Europe until the noble Marquess spoke on that occasion; by all the most habitual reasoners on Eastern topics, against the noble Marquess since his doctrine was promulgated, which they have certainly repelled, whether or not they have disposed of it. The utmost which the new interpreters can urge is, that the stipulation is ambiguous. Let me then grant its ambiguity. Here public law steps in at once to rescue us from difficulty. It is the maxim of public law, as well known to Sir Robert Phillimore as Vattel, that where a passage in the Treaty is ambiguous, it is to be construed against the Power which had the most decisive voice in the formation of the Articles; on this ground—that the strongest Power has brought about the ambiguity it ought to have prevented. The mode in which Vattel reasons, in a special chapter on Treaties of Peace, is almost prophetic of the circumstances which surround us. Such Treaties are nearly certain, he considers, to be fraught with ambiguity. But the Power by which a given stipulation is imposed, and not the Power on which it is imposed, must suffer loss from the obscurity. The principle is backed by a tenet of Roman law that damage falls upon the party "Cujus in postestate fuit rem apertius conscribere." Now it is seen clearly, by the Protocols, that the occupation was nothing but a sacrifice to a victorious invader. Neither the Sublime Porte, nor any other Power, aimed at it. It was open to Russia to intimate, in language not to be mistaken, that until the end of nine months her Armies would not begin a movement of withdrawal. If the new interpretation is correct, the other Powers would have sanctioned it. If they would not have sanctioned it, the new interpretation is erroneous. As this ground is by far the most conclusive, it would not be judicious to add another to it. Ambiguity is not denied, and ambiguity suffices to overthrow the Russian version. My Lords, it does not follow that the Government are an object of severe reproach for an untenable interpretation of the 22nd Article. They may have had to listen during many weeks to every kind of sophistry by which it can be palliated. The Members of an Opposition are not similarly circumstanced. I take no credit to myself for still adhering to the true interpretation. Let me refer a moment to the Papers which I move for. They go to ascertain whether or not the other Signatory Powers at once departed from the ground originally contemplated. Now it is affirmed, with as much gravity as anything we have to trace to unofficial correspondence, that Austria wholly differed from the last conclusion of the Government. It is affirmed by sources which we generally credit, that Count Andrassy has protested against the legal status of the Russian Force after the 3rd of May, except between the Danube and the Pruth, where they may march or rest until the 3rd of August. But we are utterly devoid of all official knowledge as to the line of Austria or any Signatory Power. Should the day ever come when the transactions of the Eastern Question are reviewed, not only to entertain the House, or dazzle its frequenters, or to affect opinion out-of-doors, but to invoke the judgment of your Lordships, it is requisite to know whether, in so grave a measure as that of allowing Russia to begin a movement at the time she ought to have completed it, Great Britain has led or followed other Powers, has been in unison with Austria, or opposed and overruled her. There is nothing, therefore, useless or irrelevant in the correspondence I suggest; nor except in the case that no despatches were exchanged, do I imagine that the Government, or Foreign Office, or the noble Marquess who presides in that Department, will be reluctant to produce them. My Lords, although I have done it already to some extent, it may be prudent to insist again that the object of the Notice is not to dress up a case against Her Majesty's Government, but to contribute, by means of the House and those who may address it, to the deliverance from Russian arms of the important region they are grasping. Some men entitled to respect, both in the House and out of it, are inclined to view that deliverance as easily attainable, indeed, as virtually accomplished. It seems to me they utterly deceive themselves; and neither reflect with care upon the slender means which exist for the attainment of their purpose, nor the urgent motives which may lead the authorities of Russia to defeat it. As to the means, what are they? The German Empire has repeatedly declared its inability, which may be its reluctance, to exert military power at so great a distance. Austria, as it was easy to learn during the autumn at Vienna, has been exhausted by her unexpected struggles in Herzegovina and Bosnia to a degree which greatly lessens her capacity for effort on the Danube. France and Italy, however good their dispositions, however eminent their Leaders, are no more available as restraints upon aggression in the East than San Marino and Monaco. Great Britain—in spite of the announcement we have heard to-night—has still one anxious war to occupy her Forces. But let us turn to Russian motives. By remaining a considerable period between the Danube and the Pruth, or even where she is at present, Russia may impose upon Bulgaria the type most favourable to her objects; ensure the general supremacy of those who represent her at Constantinople; control the Principalities which have been flung into the air without a Suzerain to shelter them, without a Treaty rendering it penal to attack them, and gratify the military interest by which, as yet, her foreign policy is uniformly regulated. It is true that internal difficulties tend to the recall of Armies to the centre. The malevolent assailant of the Czar may, unintentionally, be the liberator of the Balkans. But we know too little to depend on such an agency as likely to outbalance the habitual and traditional influences we are perfectly acquainted with. Three documents which have been recently presented—the despatch of the noble Marquess on the 26th of January, the language held by Prince Dondoukoff to Lord Donoughmore, the Report of Surgeon Buckle on the condition of the territory between Adrianople and Philippopolis—reveal objects so wholly inconsistent with the Treaty of Berlin, that nothing but a longer occupation of European Turkey can effect them. At least, prudent men will look back and ask how far their past anticipations have been realized in any given sphere, before depending on a new one. At every stage of this long transaction, the kind of confidence which now prevails has been rebuked and disappointed. When the three Powers declared their intention to negotiate with Servia and Roumania, it was hoped that there was very little in it; that it was nothing but a technical arrangement; that the Eastern Question was not going to be resuscitated. Who would not blush, after the event, at having shared in such fatuity? It was then hoped that the Herzegovinian Insurrection would burn out in its own crater. It was next hoped that the Conference of 1876 would lead to the adjustment of the new commotions which alarmed us. As soon as it collapsed, the impression was that by some other agencies an European war might be prevented. War having begun, the hope was that Constantinople would not be endangered by it. After the Treaty of Berlin, it was hoped that by the 3rd of May there would not be a Russian soldier in Bulgaria. And now, at the end of these disheartening illusions, it is the fashion to proclaim belief in the complete evacuation by the 3rd of August, as if every previous vision had been systematically realized by the course of history—which disperses and exposes it. But I will not pursue that topic beyond the point which seemed desirable to vindicate the Notice, and move for the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and other Powers, on the 22nd Article of the Treaty of Berlin.

Moved, "That the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and other Powers on Article 22 of the Treaty of Berlin be laid upon the Table."—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I am not disposed to contend that the Article of the Treaty which formed the subject of the noble Lord (Lord Campbell's) speech is wholly free from ambiguity. It is our experience in this, and the other House of Parliament, that when there are several clauses in a Bill over which a long battle is fought in Committee, and when that Bill becomes an act of Parliament, it is often found by the Judges that a more technical accuracy in its enactments would have been desirable. Perhaps, something of that kind has occurred in this instance, as the Article in question was the subject of a great deal of discussion in the Congress of Berlin, and, subsequently, on the part of the Commission; but I think the simile the noble Lord used indicates a fallacy lurking in his mind in respect of this matter. He said that a man who was to occupy a house for a certain time was bound to be out of it by the end of the term of occupation; and that, in like manner, as Russia was to occupy those Provinces only for a certain time, she was bound to have evacuated them by that time. There is, however, this difference between the two cases. A man, with all his furniture, can get out of a house in one day; but an Army cannot get out of two Provinces quite so easily, and that is the gist of the controversy. We think that evacuation and occupation are two totally different things. An Army which is evacuating cannot be occupying. Occupation is a technical military term. When an occupation is over, undoubtedly the Army is bound to evacuate with as much expedition as possible. But this matter has been already before this House, and I think before the other House of Parliament, and, without wishing to derogate from its importance, I am not sure that I attach to the difference of time as between the two interpretations, the consequence which appears to be attributed to it by the noble Lord. With respect to the production of Correspondence, I am afraid there is considerable difficulty, and that for the reason that there is none. Speaking from memory, I have never had any written communication on this subject with the Russian Ambassador here, or Her Majesty's Ambassador at St Petersburg. The only Correspondence that I remember on the subject was this—some time in the spring, between the end of February and the beginning of March, Sir Henry Elliot asked me by telegraph what my view on this point was, and I then stated to him what I have stated in your Lordships' House. I shall look for the telegrams, and I shall lay them on the Table if I think they can be produced. I suppose the noble Lord will not think it necessary to press his Motion for Papers, when I state that there are only those telegraphic messages.

LORD HOUGHTON said, it was curious that there had been no Correspondence on the solution of a doubt on so important a subject, and it was unfortunate that so important an Article had been drawn in a manner which left a doubt as to its proper interpretation. When the doubt arose, was the solution of it left to Russia? The prolongation of occupation would be of no great importance were it not for the nature of the occupation itself. It was of something more than a military character. It had a political character also, and every hour that it was continued it carried with it a source of provocation and danger. No sooner was Prince Battenberg elected Prince of Bulgaria, than he repaired to Livadia, and virtually accepted the Emperor of Russia as his Suzerain. From that, it might be concluded that the policy of Bulgaria would be that of Russia. The delay in the evacuation was to be regretted; but it was to be hoped that if there had been ambiguity in the past, there would be none in the future.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I agree with my noble Friends who hold that the evacuation of these Provinces is a matter of the last importance. Neither am I surprised at the construction which my noble Friend (Lord Campbell) put on Article 22, because I put the same construction on it myself; but I am not one of those who think that Her Majesty's Government ought to have been more strict. If they thought there was a danger of disorder and bloodshed if the evacuation were carried out suddenly—and I think, from published Papers which we have seen, there was such a danger—then it seems to me that they are not to blame. On the contrary, I think they ought to be commended for having adopted a more liberal construction of the terms relating to the evacuation by the Russians, as well as of the clause respecting an occupation of the Balkan fortresses by the Turks. I cannot, therefore, agree in the views of the two noble Lords as to the action of the Government in this matter.

The Marquess of Salisbury

LORD CAMPBELL understood, with the greatest satisfaction, the noble Marquess to recognize the ambiguity from which everything followed. He could not accede to the opinion of the noble Marquess, that to evacuate the territory between the Balkans and the Danube by the 3rd of May was practically difficult in the manner he contended. Although it was a military point, and he (Lord Campbell) spoke before some military critics, he would hazard the remark that had the 50,000 men been aligned in the vicinity of the Danube at the beginning of the month, they would have effected the passage of that river by their pontoon bridges, not having any enemy in front of them, with considerable ease in four-and-twenty hours. The view of the noble Marquess on this point appeared to him unjust to their commanders. Of course, as the noble Marquess had no despatches to produce, he would not press the Motion. Before sitting down, he must acknowledge the powerful support which his noble Friend who sat upon his right (Lord Houghton)—without which he could not have submitted it with so much advantage to the House—had given to his interpretation of the Treaty.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

LANDED ESTATES COURT (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, in moving for certain Returns, said, that some few years ago he moved for a Return of the number of sales which took place under what are popularly called the Bright Clauses of the Irish Land Act, and he now wished to have the Return carried down to the present day, if their Lordships had no objection to make the proposal. In moving for the Return, he would only say that he trusted that Her Majesty's Government would give the subject the most serious attention. He remembered very well when the Cabinet of Mr. Gladstone brought forward the Irish Land Act, they were in some trepidation as to the way in which the Bright Clauses would be received in their Lordship's House, because those clauses proposed that the State should lend money to persons to buy land with, and he was pleased to hear the noble Mar-guess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) on that occasion, state very strongly that it was a matter of public policy to make as many landowners in Ireland as possible. He quite agreed with his noble Friend; but he was afraid that those clauses had not worked so well in increasing the number of landowners as had been anticipated. It was said that this was owing to the expense of making purchases under those clauses. At all events, the Irish Church Commissioners had done more in the same direction. No fewer than 5,000 tenants had become landowners by means of the facilities afforded by those Commissioners. He thought it of great importance that the Government should devise a system by which, on a large scale, the Irish tenants might become owners of land by purchase, because he observed that all the Land Bills being introduced from other quarters were for enabling tenants to acquire land without going through the formality of paying for it.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: As reference has been made to Mr. Bright's Clauses having become inoperative on account of the expense, I may be excused if I remind the House that when the Act was being passed, I pointed out that if precautions were not taken, those clauses would be inoperative, because the practice of one public Department would probably be like that of another; and the office of Woods and Forests, in a case I knew of, had charged 7*s.* worth of land, with £2 odd shillings costs of conveyance, and such costs would prevent any tenants from purchasing under these clauses. I then moved an Amendment, with a view to reducing the expenses; but my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) opposed it, and said that—

"Rules would be framed by the Privy Council in Ireland, and they would, no doubt, take care to provide for this."—[3 Hansard, ccii. 1454.]

As a matter of curiosity, I should like to know whether my noble Friend ever took any steps in this sense, or whether, as was probable, he never thought any more about it, after giving this answer?

Motion agreed to.

I. Return (in continuation of No. 238, 1876,) showing (1) in Provinces, and (2) in Counties, the Landed Estates held either in fee, fee farm, for lives renewable for ever, or for terms of years of which sixty shall have been unexpired, sold in one or more lots in the Landed Estates Court for each of the years ending respectively 31st December 1876, 1877, and 1878, giving the following particulars in each of the foregoing periods:

- (3) The name of the estate;
- (4) The cost of sale;
- (5) The tenure of each lot;
- (6) The number of each lot;
- (7) The acreage (statute measure) of each lot;
- (8) The profit rent;
- (9) The Poor Law valuation of each lot as set out in the rental filed in the Landed Estates Court;
- (10) The amount of purchase money;
- (11) The number of years purchase:

II. Return, in Provinces and Counties, of Estates sold during the years 1876, 1877, and 1878 in one or more lots in the Landed Estates Court under Part III. of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, in which charging orders have been made in favour of the Board of Works, giving in each case the same particulars as in Return No. I.:

Ordered to be laid before the House.—(The Duke of Argyll.)

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR— THE RE-INFORCEMENTS—CONDI- TION OF THE REGIMENTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD TRURO, in rising to call attention to a Return showing the condition as regarded efficiency and strength of the regiments of Infantry sent from this country to South Africa in February last, said, the subject which he had to bring before their Lordships was one of Imperial interest. It was no less than this—had the country, under the newly-adopted military system, an Army adequate to its wants and available for all emergencies? If the system had failed they were bound to consider the determined purpose of the nation to be provided with a military Force adequate in all respects to its requirements. The Return to which he desired to call attention, pointed out in a decisive and glaring manner the defects of our present military organization, and it showed with directness and clearness the source from which those defects arose. In the month of February last, Lord Chelmsford applied to Her Majesty's Government for re-inforcements. Lord Chelmsford was a distinguished officer, and had held military appointments to enable him to know what the strength of regiments was, and how strongly each regiment should be constituted. When his Lordship, therefore, applied to be re-inforced by five regiments, he knew that his re-inforcements would amount to no less than 5,000 men, if the regiments were properly constituted. It was, first of all, to the strength of these regiments, not less than the troops themselves which constituted them, to which he earnestly invited attention. These re-inforcements, instead of numbering 5,000 men, as a matter of fact, numbered only 4,435, of whom 905 had not served for the full period of 12 months. As to the material of which those troops were composed, more than one in three, or 1,585 in all, were under 21 years of age. Of those 1,585, no fewer than 500 were under 20 years, 251 were under 19 years, and 37 were under 18 years. Now, that was the condition of the Force sent out to Lord Chelmsford, and he (Lord Truro) ventured to remark that, however unfortunate it was that the re-inforcements should be constituted of men so young and unformed, yet there was one thing more unfortunate still, and that was that the non-commissioned officers were inexperienced. Of those attached to the Force of which he had spoken, 45 were under the age of 24, 100 had not reached the age of 22, 54 were not 21 years of age, and 12 were under the age of 20. Their Lordships would be able to form some opinion of the character of the Force which the necessities of this country had compelled the Government to send out in view of the contention frequently urged, that the strength of the British Army depended mainly upon the experience, tact, and judgment of its non-commissioned officers. In the case he had mentioned, more than a third of the rank-and-file were under 21 years of age, and there was not a non-commissioned officer over 24 years of age. In making these remarks, he wished simply to call attention to a system which had not worked well up to the present, and had only been a short time in operation, but in regard to the future working of which much interest must necessarily be felt. The present system provided that a man should serve 12 years—six with the Colours, and six with the Reserves. But the service with the Colours was often only a period of three years, at the end of which the men had the option of going into the Reserve. He understood this system of allowing men to go after three or four years' service had been found undesirable, and he hoped that in future

Lord Truro

men would not be allowed to retire so speedily. It was not in the interest of the public that the Crown should pay a large amount of money for the services of what was really little better than raw recruits. Perhaps it was not, under the circumstances, to be regretted that recent wars had afforded to the Government and the country an opportunity of judging the merits and defects of this newly-instituted and only partially-tried system. When it was considered that in almost every handicraft an apprentice spoilt his master's materials for one or two years, worked for other two years without wages, and completed his apprenticeship with a nominal payment, it was somewhat curious to find that what might be called military apprentices in the National Service were dealt with on an opposite principle, and received payment from the moment their apprenticeship commenced. A noble Earl (the Earl of Longford), whom he regretted not to see in his place, had formulated his views, and, on this branch of the subject, the noble Earl held that, as soon as enlisted, recruits ought to be relegated to dépôts for instruction, and not sent to their regiments until they were fit for something like substantial service, inducements being offered to them in the meantime to fit themselves as soon as possible for service with the Colours. In connection with the contention that it was too early to find fault with a military system so recent as that of Viscount Cardwell's, he might say that, in his opinion, there was great credit due to the noble Viscount for the nerve and determination he showed in carrying out the will of the people to possess a cheap, efficient, and popular Army in face of a deeply-rooted system of ancient reverences—he would not call them prejudices—and a lively Party opposition. To a great extent, the noble Viscount succeeded in the task imposed upon him, a task which included not only the difficulty he had suggested, but the further ones of producing an Army capable of expansion and contraction, and of making happy and contented those officers who were subjected to enforced retirement. But there were still greater difficulties yet to be dealt with. It was a most important fact that, to make up the re-inforcements for abroad, 1,400 were taken from home regiments; that in some cases such regiments were reduced to as low a strength as 200 men; and that in a regiment, in one of the most important fortresses in the Kingdom, there were not more than six men available for garrison duty. It had been said in some quarters that the country was not willing to provide further national resources; but, he believed he expressed the opinions of the highest officials, when he said that an augmentation of the British Army was absolutely necessary in order to support the interests of the country, protect its commerce, and supply re-inforcements in case of wars such as those in which we were now engaged, and furnish drafts for regiments serving in India and our Dependencies abroad. Those official authorities also held that, in addition to re-inforcing the Army, it was necessary to make some modifications in the existing system of military organizations and management.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE thought that the policy of the late Secretary of State for War (Viscount Cardwell), and the effects of the re-organization of the Army instituted during his tenure of office, were questions which it would be inconvenient for their Lordships to enter into on that occasion, more especially as it was rumoured that Her Majesty's Government intended to appoint a Commission or a Committee to investigate the whole subject. Confining his remarks to the condition of the regiments sent out as re-inforcements to Lord Chelmsford, he desired to say that the figures quoted by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Truro) showed that those regiments were in a lamentable state as regarded efficiency. One regiment—the 21st Fusiliers—with which he was familiar, having a son in it—when ordered to the Cape, was actually obliged to send back to the dépôt as many as 353 boys who were utterly unfit for active service. There were only 314 men in that regiment, out of a strength of about 900, who had reached the age of 24, the remainder being immature youths. Only 194 of the men had completed their six years' service. This was a very unfortunate and unsatisfactory state of things. The other regiments which were sent to the Cape would be found, if the Returns were examined, to be in very much the same condition. He wished, however, to say, in reference to the regiment which he had named, that he had received letters which showed that the boys who were in it had stood the test of long marches to the front in bad weather very well. But he doubted whether such troops could bear the strain of a prolonged campaign. The most unsatisfactory part of the whole Returns related to the non-commissioned officers. The efficiency of an Army depended upon the efficiency of the non-commissioned officers. The chief flaw in the short-service system was the want of non-commissioned officers. He desired to draw the attention of his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War (Viscount Bury) to a recommendation which had been made by a Committee of which the present Secretary of State for War (Colonel Stanley) was Chairman. None of those recommendations had been carried out, although the present Minister of War was Chairman. That recommendation was that regiments with both of their battalions abroad should receive assistance in recruiting from brigade dépôts, by the establishment of a system of volunteering, which they deprecated generally, observing that under certain circumstances a portion of the Reserves should be called out. And the Committee said—

“We submit that there may be circumstances of emergency not of sufficient importance to justify the general embodiment of the Militia, and yet of sufficient gravity to necessitate an immediate, though temporary, increase of trained men. In such an event, which can happen extremely seldom, we think a certain proportion of Reserve men should be recalled to the Colours.”

He was of opinion that what had occurred in Africa a short time ago was certainly such an emergency as the Committee had in view. In such an emergency, the Government should have the power of calling out a certain portion of our Reserve men, and he wished to know why this recommendation had not been resorted to. Short service might be too dearly purchased, and he hoped that the questions of short service and the general re-organization of the Army would be investigated in a thoroughly impartial manner. The question should not be referred to those who had inaugurated the present system, but to those who would bring independent opinion to bear on the subject.

VISCOUNT BURY thought the House must have felt that both the noble Lords who had addressed it had done so with a great sense of responsibility, and with a very praiseworthy absence of anything like exaggeration, which, on the topic before their Lordships, would be extremely undesirable from many points of view. Exaggeration might tend to cause an undue panic and an unreasoning fear out-of-doors, and might have a very bad effect in the Army itself. He was not there, representing the War Office, as he did, to speak with "bated breath and whispering humbleness" upon the points before their Lordships. He acknowledged, and the Department acknowledged, that there were many and great faults in the system which had been inaugurated; but it was desirable that they should not attach too much importance to those faults, or exaggerate their nature. They should look at the true state of things and see if there were not within their reach an easy remedy. Of course, if Her Majesty's Government were responsible for the state of things which had arisen—if to the policy of Her Majesty's Government alone was to be referred the fact that the regiments which had gone out to Zululand were below such a standard of age as was desirable, and that they had been brought up to their full strength in a manner which might be objected to from a military point of view—if Her Majesty's Government were responsible for all that, they might be ashamed of presenting themselves before the House, and of inviting—as his noble Friend who sat behind him (Viscount Hardinge) had just done—a free, impartial, and full discussion upon this great subject. But, in the first place, the system upon which the British Army was now built up was, as his noble Friend opposite very well expressed it, a new system, and a system which was upon its trial. It was also a system for which no one Government could be held responsible. It was true that a Committee, presided over by his right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for War (Colonel Stanley), made certain recommendations; but those recommendations were only in continuation of others made by the noble Viscount on the opposite Benches (Viscount Cardwell). He believed, too, that the noble Viscount made his recommendations only after consulting all the military experience at his command. Feeling that a great change was necessary in the constitution of the Army, the subject having been previously debated for years, the noble Viscount set on foot a system which he believed was most likely to prove an ample and proper reform of our Army system; and the illustrious Duke at the head of the Army (the Duke of Cambridge) gave him the advice which, in his opinion, should be followed under the conditions which had been submitted to him. Therefore, one Government after another, one Committee after another, were concerned in these recommendations, which were assented to by the illustrious Duke. No one Government was responsible for what had taken place. The question was discussed for several years when he (Viscount Bury) held a seat in the House of Commons, and every step which had been taken since had been taken for the purpose of giving effect to the determination which was arrived at by the House and the country at large. Therefore, although he did not deny that there were grave defects in our military system, he could say, without Party bias, for it was not a Party question at all, that it was a matter in which they ought to put their heads together with a view to ascertain whether a remedy was not at hand, and how best it could be applied. There was another reason why they should be very chary in setting aside the recommendations made in 1871, and that was that in carrying out those recommendations in reference to the brigade depôt system, so large a sum of money had been expended, that it would be cruel and unjust to the country to throw it to one side. They had spent up to the present time £2,743,579 on the establishment of brigade depôts throughout the country. It might be that their organization was not perfect; but Her Majesty's Government were of opinion that that fact would best be met, not by throwing all that had been done aside, but by full and deliberate investigation point by point, of the various items which could be improved, and by endeavouring to devise what the improvement should be. They should also remember that the new system, although it had not been very long in operation, had still acted pretty well. They were nominally in a state of peace—that was, they were not in that state of war which would enable them to call out the Reserves. The

Viscount Bury

had, he was going to say, two wars on their hands; but the announcement made by his noble Friend behind him (Viscount Cranbrook) left them, happily, in a position to say that they had only one war on their hands. But until now they had had two, and they could not, by any stretch of imagination, be called little wars, and they had had to fight them with an Army upon a peace footing; and, therefore, the system by which, without any undue exertion, they were enabled to supply the requisite number of men to the two Armies in the field could hardly be said to have broken down, although he admitted that, on an inspection of the various regiments, some fault was to be found as to the inexperience of the non-commissioned officers, and the ages of them. His noble Friend (Lord Truro) had, however, he thought, a little overrated that point. He (Viscount Bury) would take the first regiment on the list, the 2nd Battalion of the 21st Regiment. Of its 888 men, more than half—about 500—were over 21 years of age, and it would be admitted that men over 21 years of age were well able to go through the dangers and difficulties of a campaign. He was not denying that there were a good many youths in the regiments; but this he said—that it was very important there should not be entertained out-of-doors any exaggerated views of the difficulties which existed; that it should not be thought the men were such mere boys, and so utterly inexperienced, as his noble Friend had rhetorically stated. The system under which the Army was organized certainly had, as he had already stated, faults. They had now 16,609 First Class Army Reserve, 21,976 Second Class Army Reserve, and a Militia Reserve of 20,110; in all a Reserve of 58,695 men. It might be asked—"Why, then, if you are so hard up for men as to be obliged to gather them in here and there, do you not call out your Reserves?" The reason was that they were prohibited from doing so by positive legislative enactment. In the Army Organization Act of 1870, it was provided that unless a grave national emergency was declared by Parliament, or if Parliament were not sitting, by Order in Council, they could not call out the Reserves, or any part of them, or embody the Militia. They were, therefore, prohibited from calling out any one of the 58,000 men of which he had spoken; and they were also prevented from accepting the services of any of those men, even if they chose to volunteer. Until a few days ago, they were under the impression that if any of the Reserve men desired to rejoin the Colours, they were at liberty to do so; but from an opinion they obtained from the Law Officers of the Crown it appeared that such was not the case. What, then, was to be done? They fell back upon the general organization of 1872, which was yet wanting in elasticity to make it exactly suited to the exigencies of the country. The system went on the assumption that they should have generally 70 battalions abroad and 70 at home—that the battalion at home and that abroad should be linked together, and that the latter should be kept up to its full strength by drafts from the battalion at home. To these were to be attached what was called a dépôt centre, and that had at its back the Militia and Volunteers of the district. Well, that was all very well in theory, and it would have worked well practically, if they had never had more than 70 battalions abroad. But in the first year of the system they had 71 battalions abroad, and they never since had less; while at that moment they had 85 battalions abroad. The consequence was that 15 of the linked battalions were deprived of any regiment at their back from which their full strength could be made up, and that 55 regiments at home had not only to supply their own linked battalions, but 15 other battalions, and the casualties in their own ranks. That was a dislocation of the system inaugurated by his noble Friend opposite (Viscount Cardwell) which probably he never could entirely have foreseen, and which would have been obviated by some means of elasticity had it been foreseen. Not being able, then, to call out the Reserves or embody the Militia, they could only have recourse to enlisting, and enlisting, he would remind his noble Friend, gave them nothing but boys; and that was the state of things in the present exceptional position, with a war in Zululand and a war, up to the present time, in Afghanistan. He did not know whether it would be a bull to say that the position, although it was exceptional, was habitual, for they might be said to be never entirely at peace and never entirely at war. Since 1852 they had had the Crimean War, the Persian War, the Indian Mutiny, two New Zealand Wars, the Abyssinian War, the Franco-German War, the Russo-Turkish War, the Ashantee War, the Afghanistan War, and the Zulu War; but on only two occasions were the Militia called out—during the Russian War and the Indian Mutiny. These were all considerable wars; but they did not all amount to great emergencies justifying the calling out of the Reserves. They were the kind of emergencies which should be met by dislocating the whole system, and which threw them back upon volunteering and recruiting. He had frankly acknowledged the main justice of his noble Friend's strictures. They all felt that something must be done—that the existing difficulty must be faced. The fact was that there was great difficulty in procuring a relaxation of legislative enactments. To do so required time, and, perhaps, in "another place," would provoke opposition and delay. It was not supposed that very many more troops would have to be sent out to Zululand in addition to those already there. The troops under the command of the general there were quite as large a number as could be easily disposed of for the duties for which they were detailed; but they must be kept up to their strength and not be allowed to dwindle away. Now, how was that to be done? The Government believed that if they were permitted to accept the services of those men who having left the Colours volunteered to rejoin, a great point would be gained; but to enable them to do that, some relaxation of the legislative prohibition of 1870 was necessary. The question was one which would receive the careful attention of the Government. Probably, too, some means might be found of greasing the wheels of the military machinery. For that purpose the Government would appeal to the military Advisers of the Crown as to what relaxations and changes in the existing brigade depôt system could be recommended; and, of course, it would be on the responsibility of the Government either to accept or to pass by those recommendations. His noble Friend behind him (Viscount Hardinge) had said that, out-of-doors, there was a belief that a Committee was to be appointed to inquire into the brigade depôt system. It would be satisfactory to the House to hear that such was the case. He hoped that such an inquiry, and a slight relaxation of legislative prohibitions, such as he had already described, would meet the exigencies of the case, and place them in a much better position in the future than they were in at the present moment.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I am exceedingly anxious to say a word with regard to the question before the House. There are difficulties to which frank reference has been made in the course of the debate. The subject is a most grave and serious one. It concerns everyone in the country, every Member of the Legislature, and every citizen of this Empire; and I venture to hope that, whatever may be said or done on the subject, at all events we shall try to deal with it from a large and unbiassed point of view, and that we shall not suffer personal or Party feeling, either one way or the other, to influence us. It is said that the Army is not in a satisfactory condition at the present moment. My Lords, you must remember the Army has at present a severe strain upon it; I can call it nothing else. What has been its condition for some considerable time? We have had troops in the field in two distant parts of the world, and they have had to be largely supplemented by Reserves. Now, let me at once say that the question of Reserves is a question of money. You may by this, that, or the other device bolster up an Army; but unless the country is prepared to pay for an Army it cannot have an efficient one. Men will not come to your Army and stay with it unless they think it worth their while. That is the point we have to deal with. As regards the number of men obtained, the short service system, which I have always said was a tentative one, has been, to a great extent, satisfactory. The men at one time came in so rapidly, and so much in excess of our requirements, that those who had served three years were allowed at once to go into the Reserves. The feeling of the military authorities was that they ought on no account to check recruiting, but rather to let them pass into the Reserves before their full period of service had expired. Such was the state of things previous to the commencement of these wars, and, to some extent, the main service was crippled when the pressure came. Another difficulty has reference to India. Though only two additional regiments are in India at this moment, we had to send large drafts out, because we wished to keep up regiments there to their full strength. Thus it was that the men were taken and the boys; left. The regiments at home are really composed of boys; and they are also, in fact, large depôts for the Forces serving abroad. A difficulty has also arisen in regard to the system of linked battalions—one at home and one abroad. The principle, as originally conceived, was that there should be 70 battalions at home and 70 abroad; but it is frequently found impossible to carry this out. When demands came upon them the Government could not say—“We must keep a certain number of battalions at home;” they had to meet the exigencies of the case as best they could. The result is that we have now 15 cases in which both battalions are abroad. The legislative difficulty to which my noble Friend (Viscount Bury) has referred is, I admit, a most unfortunate one. Perhaps I am as much responsible for it as anybody else; but until the difficulty arose I had no idea that we were absolutely debarred from taking any Reserve men whatever. We have applications from Reserve men to volunteer; the State would give anything for their services, and yet it is not at liberty to avail itself of their offer. I have always spoken with great respect of the Reserve Forces, who responded to the call for their services last year in a manner so creditable to themselves. I am very anxious that we should not meddle with their civil avocations more than necessary; but when we pay 6*d.* a-day for a man for six, and sometimes for nine years, it is a little hard to get nothing out of him when an emergency arises. That is a state of things which certainly requires modification. I would not force these men to serve. I would be content to allow them to volunteer from the Reserve, and we should thus get the services of more seasoned men than we do at present. At the same time, you can never expect to see such a well-seasoned Army as we had under the long service system. We must necessarily have a large proportion of young men and young non-commissioned officers. It is sad that this should be the case, but so it is. It is really a question of payment. If you want men to stay with the Colours, you must make it worth their while. Some of the best six years' men have said that they would stay if their prospects were as good with the Colours as they would be elsewhere. You must recollect that when a man has served his short service, and obtained all his good-conduct stripes, he has to consider his position—whether he shall elect to become a non-commissioned officer and enter into a new engagement for six years, or whether he shall retire upon the Reserve; and it is not to be wondered at, considering all the risks, that he will not take the chance of becoming a non-commissioned officer. There seems to have been some misunderstanding as to what I said the other day about the localization of the Army. Local connection is, no doubt, of great value; but the localization of the Army, in the French or Prussian sense of the word, is an impossibility with our service. It is utterly inconsistent with our military system, because we have not conscription as they have. Therefore, I say that the localization of our Army is an impossibility, and must be left out of our calculations; but local connection is a desirable thing. I do not think that it would produce as many recruits as might be desired, because we have not any strong indication that the Militia are specially anxious to join a specific corps. To some extent, it is the case; but I think, generally speaking, that men go to the large towns and enlist there. Officers are generally extremely anxious to get the men away from their local depôts. They say—“Don't leave the men here, where they are tempted to desert, and where they are treated, perhaps too liberally, by their friends, and get into trouble.” I am quite satisfied to leave it to the Committee to report to the Government, and I do not think there need be any alarm about going back to the old system. What would be more acceptable would be a modification of the new system; and I think it will, with changes, be found to have advantages over the old. If I chose to go into details, I could give an account of every one of these regiments. We did the best we could, and we got the Force out in a fortnight. Under the circumstances, we did the best we could in sending out troops to the Cape. I do not admire the system of volunteering, as we have been obliged to resort to it; but that is not the question. When men were wanted, what was to be done? I think that, looking at all the circumstances, blame cannot fairly be attached to anyone for having produced such a Return as I hold in my hand, which I admit is not a satisfactory one. I hope we shall, after due deliberation, now inaugurate a system under which no man will be sent out who is not fit for immediate military duty.

Viscount Bury

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he was not at all surprised that the noble Lord behind him (Lord Truro) had called attention to this subject, and he congratulated him on the discussion which had taken place. He entirely agreed with him in deploring that it was necessary to send out on a distant expedition a single soldier who, in the opinion of His Royal Highness, was not adequate for the discharge of his military duties; and as to the system of completing the drafts by means of volunteers from other regiments, he did not yield to the noble Lord in his disapprobation of that system. By doing so, they discounted their future resources and gave a considerable blow to the regimental esprit de corps which they were so anxious to promote. These results were not the inevitable consequence of what had been called the newly-adopted military system of the country. That system was expressly designed to avoid consequences of that kind. With regard to the youth of the recruits, he wished to make this observation. In a country where enlistment was voluntary there must be young recruits. If they endeavoured to get older men, they would only get those who had failed in other professions, or who were physically unfit for the Army. It therefore came to this—there must be youth somewhere, and the question was, where would they have it? The principle of short service was that it was better to have a young Army with seasoned Reserves, than an Army of older soldiers with nothing to fall back upon but raw reinforcements taken from the tail of the plough or the corner of the streets. The latter was the system which prevailed before the introduction of short service, and those who were familiar with the condition of our Army during the progress of the Crimean War must know how completely that system had failed. The new system—the system of 1872—had not had a full or complete trial. If he wanted a description of that system, he should turn to a Memorandum prepared by the illustrious Duke (the Duke of Cambridge), which was accompanied by the Report of the Committee, commonly called General M'Dougall's Committee. At the close of His Royal Highness's Memorandum occurred words to the effect that the first battalions on foreign service ought to be on an increased establishment, and form the first part of the corps d'armée abroad. In their Report, the Committee enumerated certain steps which were, in their opinion, to be carried out whenever an expedition was sent abroad. The first step was that the Line battalions remaining at home were to be increased by calling up the Army Reserve men and Volunteers, the Militia were to be embodied, and the depôts from which casualties were to be supplied were to be expanded. A noble Lord opposite had observed that the system broke down because it was based upon the assumption that there were to be 70 battalions at home and 70 abroad; whereas, as the noble Viscount the Under Secretary of State (Viscount Bury) had informed them, there were at present not 70 battalions at home and 70 abroad, but 85 battalions abroad and only 55 at home. But the steps indicated in General M'Dougall's Committee provided for an expedition of 50 battalions, which would leave only 20 at home; and those steps, if they were properly carried out, would, he believed, be sufficient for an expedition of that magnitude. He was aware that it would not be possible to carry out in a smaller expedition the steps which would be advisable for a great European war. Taking the Reserve men as an example, they had to deal not only with the Reserve men but with their employers; and it would be found, if the impression once got abroad that the passing of a man into the Reserve rendered him liable to serve compulsorily in the Colonies, the Army Reserve men would fail to get employment, and the Army Reserve would become unpopular. There were, therefore, other steps to be taken, steps in the same direction; and he was delighted to find that it was in contemplation to allow the Army Reserve men to volunteer for foreign service, in case of what was termed a "minor emergency." A Bill, he understood, was on the Table of the House of Commons for that purpose; and knowing the admirable spirit with which the Reserve men responded to the call which was made upon them last year, it seemed to him they might now have a Force available by which they might expand their battalions when they wanted to send out a foreign expedition, without going to the length of compelling the Reserve men to rejoin the Colours. These steps proceeded on the principle of the system of 1872, and he rejoiced to hear that the Government were considering the propriety of having recourse to them. Up to now nothing had been done; not only had none of the steps referred to been taken, but the system had been tried under extremely disadvantageous circumstances. The Afghan War broke out about the time of the relieving season; and so it came to pass that Reserves went out to India, and regiments did not come back again. Then came the Zulu War, which kept 10,000 White men in South Africa, and, besides all this, although the Memorandum of His Royal Highness provided for increasing the strength of the 18 battalions next for foreign service, he (the Marquess of Lansdowne) had not been able to find out that 18 battalions of increased strength were in any part of the United Kingdom when the war in South Africa broke out. There were several battalions at an increased strength; but these were, he believed, at Malta at the time. If only the first stress of the emergency were met by such means as had been indicated, he believed the system of 1872 would work well; and he hoped the Government would not lose a moment in introducing into Parliament the necessary Bill, which would receive the friendly consideration of every Member of that House.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, I should not have taken part in this debate were it not that some remarks have been made which seems to require a little explanation on my part. It will be borne in mind that I inherited this scheme from the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cardwell), and I think it will be generally admitted that I did everything in my power to make it succeed. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) has just said that it was part of the scheme that 18 regiments should be kept up to their full strength; but when I came into Office I only found four regiments of that strength, and they were kept ready for the purpose of Indian relief. In order to keep 18 regiments up to their full strength, the Army had to be increased. The events of the last two years have, no doubt, caused considerable confusion in the system; and I am bound to agree with the opinion of the noble Lord (Lord Truro) that the system is not well suited to the present circumstances under which small wars arise. I am sure we shall all be glad if a remedy can be obtained. With reference to the passing into the Reserve of men of three years' service, that course was taken in consequence of the increase in the number of recruits, which rose, on an increase being made by me to the pay of the Army, from between 17,000 and 18,000 to between 29,000 and 30,000, making the Army for a time 2,000 or 3,000 men in excess of what was authorized by Parliament. Two courses were open to me—either to stop recruiting, or to fill up the Reserves. There was a complaint throughout the country that the Reserves were not being filled up, and I thought their more rapid progress very important, and I made an effort to fill them up. The consequence of my doing so was that they made a substantial appearance last year; whereas, two or three years ago, they only amounted to 2,000 or 3,000 men. Of course, I could not keep an excessive number in the Army without invading the rights of the House of Commons; but, by what I did, I secured two men for one—one for the Reserve, and one for the Army. In that way I got the Army full, and we had available for a foreign war a number of serviceable and seasoned soldiers. The Afghan campaign commenced, and though those who conducted it did not draw largely on British Forces, only retaining two additional regiments which were coming home, still drafts were continually going out from regiments at home, and when there was a sudden call for the services of these regiments elsewhere, having sent out their best men to India, they had to be filled up with what are called boys. I agree that there is nothing more unfortunate than that a boy who is hardly fit to carry his musket and knapsack should be sent out to hard service abroad, and as that was never meant to be done, a number of the more youthful recruits were sent to the depôts. I do not, however, despair, as some do, of the fighting qualities of young men. If you read the annals of the English Army, you will see that young men between 20 and 25 have done as good service as those between 25 and 30. You will find, as a matter of fact, from the Indian Returns, that there is a degree of health and fitness on the part of men who go out at 20 years of age which you cannot find in men who go out at any other age. I admit the importance of having non-commissioned officers fit for their work, and of offering high inducements to efficient men to remain in the Army at the period when they have to consider whether they shall do so or seek some other occupation; but one of the great misfortunes that accompany short service is this—that it is difficult to persuade men who have become non-commissioned officers, after being about four years in the Army, to continue in it when their term of six years is completed. A man who has served a number of years in the Army naturally desires to have something to look forward to in the future; and although it may be more expensive, I cannot help thinking, seeing that non-commissioned officers are the back-bone of the Army, that it would be worth while to incur the expense of offering inducements to retain a limited number of non-commissioned officers, instead of being thrown back, as in many instances, upon young men of insufficient position for the work pressed upon them. The only way to have an Army fit for foreign service is either to form and maintain an effective Army of old soldiers, taking your chance of going into the open market to recruit it, or to enlarge your Reserves by passing men gradually through the Army into it. The proposition was that there should be 25 per cent of old soldiers in all the regiments; but if you cannot get people to enlist for long service, you must take them for short; and, in fact, we have had to fall back on the system of recruiting entirely for short service, with the provision that those who go in for short service should be able at a certain period to go in for the longer service. We are all animated by the same object, and I trust that the recommendations of the Committee which is to be appointed will lead to an improvement in the working of the present system.

Viscount Cranbrook

VISCOUNT CARDWELL was glad to acknowledge that the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbrook) had given the plan of his Predecessors most cordial support; and the Report of the Brigade Depôt Committee, which he appointed, contained much information of value to all interested in the subject. He agreed with all that had been said by his noble Friend opposite (Viscount Bury), and concurred with the illustrious Duke (the Duke of Cambridge) that there should be statutory power to volunteer from the Reserves into an Army like that now engaged in Colonial service, if statutory power was necessary. That appeared to be a proper way of meeting the difficulty. There was now on the Table of the other House a Bill to effect that object. There were now 38,000 men in the Reserve, and they might be confidently appealed to to increase the Army. He would be delighted if the new Committee, composed of such able men, should be able to suggest other means than those which had been suggested by the Committee of 1876. All he could say was that he relied upon the Government to support the scheme of which they had now testified their approval, and he hoped they would never see a return to that state of things which existed in the time of the Crimean War, and of which the Commission appointed in 1867 gave such a lamentable account. The youth of the recruits in Lord Raglan's time, and also in Lord Dalhousie's time, everyone knew. But the recruits now were of a very different quality, and, as his noble Friend opposite had said, they were material upon which they could rely for splendid service. The difference between having men too old and men too young was this—that men too young had a great deal of vitality and activity in them, which could not be said of men too old. However, by availing themselves of volunteers from the Reserves, they might fill the ranks with older soldiers than they had at present, and then they would have a powerful Army.

LORD TRURO said a few words in reply which were inaudible.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 19th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Report—Hall-Marking (Gold and Silver) [No. 191].
 SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, Class III., Votes 1 to 15.
 PRIVATE BILL (by Order)—Second Reading—Teign Valley Railway Extension*.
 PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Terms of Removal (Scotland)* [189]; Costs Taxation (House of Commons)* [190].
First Reading—County Courts* [191]; Railways and Telegraphs in India* [192].
Second Reading—Customs and Inland Revenue [150]; Great Seal [180]; Indian Marine [182], debate adjourned; Metropolis (Little Coram Street, Bloomsbury, Wells Street, Poplar, and Great Peter Street, Westminster,) Improvement Provisional Orders Confirmation* [175]; Local Government Provisional Order (Cartworth)* [158]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Castleton by Rochdale, &c.)* [160]; Consolidated Fund (No. 3)*.
 Committee—Report—Public Health (Scotland) Provisional Order (Bothwell)* [152]; Valuation of Lands and Assessments (Scotland) [144].
Considered as amended—Parliamentary Burghs (Scotland)* [97]; Dispensaries (Ireland)* [66]; Hares (Ireland)* [165].

QUESTIONS.

PERSIA—RETIREMENT OF THE BRITISH MINISTER.—QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Minister at the Court of Persia is about to retire; and, if so, whether the Government will, in any new appointment, provide for the duties of that Mission being carried on by an Officer in direct communication with the Viceroy of India, and by an Officer experienced in Asiatic life and action?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I understand that the Minister at the Court of Persia has retired, and that his successor has not yet been designated. The late Minister was always in direct communication with the Viceroy of India.

PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT, SEC. 27—THE PRISONS BOARD—MEDICAL OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true that the Irish Prisons Board has, by declaring vacant the office of medical officer in various prisons, virtually dismissed from that office those surgeons of county infirmaries who have up to this filled it and performed its duties hitherto without remuneration, and in many cases for a great number of years; though now for the first time the office is to be made remunerative; whether this is in accordance with either the letter or the spirit of the Prisons Act (Ireland), s. 27; and, in any case, whether he will urge the Prisons Board to reconsider or modify an order which may entail great hardship on a most deserving class of county officials?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I have always understood that the intention was to re-appoint the former holders of these offices. As, however, I find there is some doubt as to the law, I have referred the matter to the Law Officers for their opinion.

IRELAND—RELIGIOUS DISTURBANCES AT OMEY ISLAND, COUNTY GALWAY.

QUESTIONS.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

MR. ERRINGTON: Sir, before the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) puts the Question which stands in his name on the Paper, I would ask you, Whether it is in accordance with the usage of the House and the public convenience that Questions should be asked bearing closely on matters which are at present the subject of criminal proceedings, at the risk of prejudicing those proceedings?

MR. SPEAKER: There is no positive Order on this matter; but Questions are not usually put in this House on matters which are the subject of criminal proceedings. There may be occasions, however, when such liberty should be given, and I leave it to the discretion of the hon. Member for Tyrone whether he will put the Question.

MR. MACARTNEY: I do not wish to do anything contrary to the Rules of the House. I understood that the criminal proceedings had been concluded. [Major NOLAN: No.] Yes. But my Question does not bear on the facts of the case thus investigated, but is with regard to matters which took place before and since the riots, and in reference to which nobody is accused.

I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true, as stated in the "Dublin Daily Express" of April 21st, that on the 15th of April, when thirty-nine persons were summoned before the magistrates at Clifden, in the county of Galway, for riot and unlawful assembly near Omev Island, on the 2nd, 4th, and 23rd of March, the fact was elicited, on cross-examination by Mr. Henderson (the priest's solicitor), that the magistrate had actually asked the same Roman Catholic clergyman who was summoned for riot on March 2nd to assist in preserving peace in the district on April 3rd; whether it is true, as stated in the "Dublin Evening Mail" of April 18th, that during the trial Dean M'Manus and several priests, sitting together below one of the jury benches, repeated in an audible tone the evidence to be taken down by the clerk; whether it is true that, since the discharge of the persons accused of said riots and unlawful assemblies, the Protestant children attending the National Schools in that neighbourhood have been hooted and pelted with stones, and that Miss Walshe, the Irish Church Mission teacher at Errismore, was assaulted on her way home on the evening of the 1st of May by a number of women with their faces covered who were lying in wait for her, who seized her, tore her clothes, and cut her head, leaving her in a fainting condition; and, whether any steps have been or are intended to be taken to prevent Her Majesty's Protestant subjects in that part of Ireland from the persistent persecution to which for some time past they have been and still are exposed?

MR. ERRINGTON: Before that Question is answered, I wish to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, with reference to the question of the honourable Member for Tyrone, Whether, in taking steps for the due protection of Her Majesty's Protestant subjects in Connemara "from the persistent persecution to which," as alleged, "they have been and are still exposed," he will consider the justice of also protecting Her Majesty's Catholic subjects in that part of Ireland from the provocation to which they have been long exposed from the proceedings of certain proselytising societies, which wound the religious feelings of the population and tend to produce breaches of the peace?

Mr. Macartney

MR. O'DONNELL: I also have a Question to ask, and it is unnecessary to say that I ask it without any sectarian feeling. I wish to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, with reference to the Question of the honourable Member for Tyrone, Whether the Government is aware that the so-called "Irish Church Missions to Roman Catholics" in the West of Ireland are conducted by means of the publishing of placards and the distribution of tracts in which Catholics are invited to become "Christians," and the deepest convictions of a Catholic people are grossly insulted; whether his attention has been called to the conduct of the agents of these Missions, who, it is complained, thrust upon the Catholic peasantry statements that the Sacrifice of the Mass is "a sacrilegious mummerly," the respect paid to Saints "a blasphemous idolatry," confession "a system of vice," and similar provocations; whether it has been brought to his notice that these agents are in the habit of seeking out needy peasant families, and offering victuals and money as the price of conversion; and, whether the Government will cause an investigation to be made, for the purpose of preventing conduct designed to provoke to breaches of the peace, although ostensibly pursued under cover of zeal for religion?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, it is manifestly impossible to deal fully with this subject within the limits of a reply to Questions; but, as far as I have been able to ascertain, the facts of the case are given with substantial accuracy in the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney). With reference to the Questions of the other hon. Members, I believe that in some instances placards of a very objectionable character have been made use of by some of the agents of the Church Missions, though I am glad to learn that this practice has been discountenanced by the responsible heads of the movement. Now, as to the course pursued by the Government, I must point out that we have no jurisdiction over what is termed proselytizing, or the distribution of alms. ["What?"] I see I must spell the word alms, and explain that we have nothing to do with gifts of what are alluded to as victuals and money; and, therefore, our duty is simply to put down disturbances by whatever party they may be created. With this object, a force of 100 constabulary was sent into the district, and will be maintained there at the cost of the inhabitants as long as its presence may be deemed necessary. Legal proceedings were instituted against the leading participators in these discreditable proceedings, and a similar course will be adopted against any persons who may be guilty of any attempt to disturb the public peace in future.

MR. CALLAN: Can the right hon. Gentleman state whether these objectionable placards have in any one single instance been publicly discountenanced by the leader of the Irish Church Mission party; and, if so, when and where?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I have reason to believe that the exhibition of any placard of an irritating character has been discountenanced by those persons who are responsible for the conduct of the Mission.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I am sure the House will indulge me for a moment, for I live in the immediate neighbourhood of the place where these occurrences took place. I beg to say to the House, and to the right hon. Gentleman, that to my certain knowledge the zeal of certain persons ostensibly connected with this Society—or, at any rate, sympathizing with it—has led them to undertake the distribution of tracts. [“Order!”] I will conclude with a Motion, Sir, for this is really a very serious matter. The locality in which these events occurred is inhabited by some of the poorest of Her Majesty’s subjects. They are almost every one of them Roman Catholics, and there is carried on in their district a system of distributing tracts of the character mentioned in the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. Errington), which tracts, and post-cards as well, are systematically sent to the priests as well as to the people; and when it has happened, as unfortunately occurred on a recent occasion, that there have been disturbances through these poor people finding their religious feelings outraged, they are subjected to all the pains and penalties of the law, as the right hon. Gentleman says they are to be now. They are the poorest—without exception, the very poorest—individuals in Her Majesty’s Dominions; and they are now called upon to bear the expense of about 120 police, who have been distributed through these wilds. I will take an early opportunity of asking the sense of the House of Commons as to whether it is just or right that these expenses should fall on these unfortunate people. It is the duty of the Executive to keep order in all parts of the country; and it is a new law, which is not carried out in this country, that the expense should be thrown on the people of the district for keeping up the police, who ought always to be maintained there if their protection is needed. I beg, in conclusion, to move the adjournment of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: Does any hon. Member second the Motion?

MR. CALLAN: I will second it. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to say specifically if he has any authority for the statement which he has just made; and, if so, what authority? Within the last three months of my residence in Dublin, three placards were put in at my door as I was standing at my library window. They were put in the letter-box. I saw the man do it, and then I saw him go and place a similar three in the letter-box of the late Mr. Butt, and I saw him put three more in at the door of the Loretto Convent. I then collared the vagabond, and inflicted summary chastisement on the spot. I have the placards in my possession; and I would like to know whether the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), who supports the Irish Church Mission, will disavow and disown these discreditable and disgraceful practices.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That this House do now adjourn.”—
(Mr. Mitchell Henry.)

MR. NEWDEGATE: I have no information on the subject, except such as has reached me through the Press, or by means of Questions asked and discussions raised in this House. If the hon. Gentleman desires to know what is the impression produced on my mind by this information, I can only say that I think that what has happened will be remembered when hon. Gentlemen opposite again put forward, as I have heard them urge, pleas on the score of religious liberty.

MR. MACARTNEY: The hon. Member for Galway speaks of the propriety of throwing the cost of extra police upon the people in one part of the country. I know that when disturbances take place in the North of Ireland, and extra constabulary are sent down, they are charged to the county, and the Government do not have to pay for them.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: What I said was, that that does not happen in England.

MAJOR NOLAN: I wish the public to know the facts. I can speak from a knowledge of 20 or 25 years, for I have property in the district, and I know within my own knowledge, having heard many things on the spot, that, from 20 years ago down certainly to within the last four or five years, there has been a constant system of offering children clothes and food, and, in some cases, I believe, money—but I am not sure as to money—on condition of their changing their faith. Well, there are people in London who contribute to the Irish Church Mission, and they should make up their minds as to whether they wish for these disturbances, or consider whether that is a right and proper means of influencing the religious feelings of the people by giving them food and clothing on condition that they change their faith. Of course, these disturbances were extremely wrong; but I believe that those who read the evidence will see that they originated, in the first instance, in the action of a Protestant schoolmaster. I know that that is contested—I do not wish to speak with authority—but there is no doubt whatever of a system of wholesale bribery going on. There has never been the slightest feeling against the Protestants; but there has been, at different times, a strong feeling against this system of proselytizing by means of money or money's worth. What has happened is, of course, very much to be regretted; but, at the same time, the people who subscribe the money for the purpose of converting the children, sometimes the parents, ought to be held in some measure responsible for the disturbances which occur.

MR. SULLIVAN: I would remind hon. Gentlemen that they will find in the Liverpool papers of a year ago letters from English Protestant clergymen who went into these districts, and who had these circulars put into their hands; and one of these clergymen declared that if he had received one of these placards, outraging his own religious convictions, he could not have restrained his feelings, even if they had led him into violence.

MR. O'DONNELL: The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther) has not answered the Question as to whether any investigation will take place. This is a matter concerning the peace of a very large district, and in which the facts are disputed. I altogether take exception to the manner in which the Government has treated the subject; and I venture to say that if an incendiary Catholic society were to extend its operations to an English Protestant town, and were to hand about tracts and send round agents using the most foul-mouthed language with regard to the Protestant religion and its rites and doctrines, Her Majesty's Government would go a long way beyond merely quartering an extra force of constabulary in the district, and would consider whether the Catholic society had or not been guilty of the offence of provoking breach of the peace. It is all very well to speak of respect for the law, and of the necessity of avoiding outrage; but human nature is human nature in Ireland as in England. In England, conduct on the part of Catholics like that of these most unworthy Protestants in Ireland would have led to riots, and those riots would necessitate the serious attention of Her Majesty's Government. It is impossible to suppose that the Catholics of the West, or of any other part of Ireland, will put up with these continual outrages on their religion; and, though they may commit a legal crime, their natural resentment will receive the warm sympathy of a vast majority of their countrymen—the honest and free-thinking—wherever such outrages may be repeated.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

POST OFFICE—THE NEW INTERNATIONAL POST CARD.—QUESTIONS.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Postmaster General, If the new International Post Card issued by his Department, headed "Great Britain," is intended to be available for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; and, if so, is there any reason for not correctly printing the fact?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The new International Post Card is intended to apply to the whole of the United Kingdom. The reason why it was headed "Great Britain" was that, in the Convention agreed to last year in Paris, the United Kingdom is styled Great Britain all through, and not Great Britain and Ireland, and the Post Office has simply followed the designation contained in that document.

MR. SULLIVAN asked, Whether the noble Lord's Department would not call the attention of the Government to the inaccuracy, and ask them when the practice commenced of making the term "Great Britain" cover Great Britain and Ireland in negotiations and Conventions with foreign nations?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I have not thought it necessary to call the attention of the Government to the matter; but if the hon. and learned Gentleman attaches any importance to it I shall be very glad to do so.

SCOTLAND — RELIGIOUS DISTURBANCES AT DUNDEE.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that recently serious excitement and rioting were caused at Dundee by the appearance on public platforms of a person representing himself to be an ex-priest of the Catholic Church engaged in exposing the misconduct of the Catholic Clergy; whether the person in question was in the habit of mimicking in the most offensive manner the most sacred rites of the Catholic religion, such as the ceremony of the Mass as performed by the officiating priest; whether, after much bad feeling had been excited, it was not discovered that the pretended ex-priest had never belonged to any Catholic Ministry, but was an ex-convict, who some years previously had been found guilty in Canada of a disgraceful offence; and, whether, to prevent such abuse of the rights of religious discussion, some provision would be introduced, as in the Indian Penal Code, against gross and scandalous insults to the religious beliefs entertained by large sections of Her Majesty's subjects?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. WATSON): Sir, I have to inform the hon. Member that I have made inquiry into this matter, and I regret to state that I found that there did take place in Dundee some disgraceful exhibitions of the nature he describes. The chief actor in them described himself as an ex-priest of the Roman Catholic Church. I am informed that it is doubtful whether he ever held that position; but I have it on the authority of his own admission, and that is the only evidence I possess, that he was recently convicted in Canada of an attempt to commit a disgraceful offence. The law of Scotland, now that we know how the matter stands, is quite sufficient to meet such cases, and I trust to be able to give such instructions as will prevent the repetition of such a scandal.

INDIA—THE FOUR AND A-HALF PER CENT LOAN ALLOTMENT.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES MILLS asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he can give any particulars regarding the allotment of the Four-and-a-half per cent. Loan offered for subscription in India?

MR. E. STANHOPE, in reply, said, that the amount tendered was for 6 crores, 70 lakhs of rupees, while the amount accepted was 4 crores, 5 lakhs, at the average rate of 94½.

ARMY—THE 58TH REGIMENT—FOREIGN SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. WHEELHOUSE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it be the intention of the Government to send the 58th Regiment, now serving at the Cape, direct to India upon the conclusion of the Zulu War; whether the 58th Regiment has been only five years in England after ten years' service in India; and, whether, after the last return home of that Regiment, it was not despatched on foreign service before its full time in England was completed?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, it was not the present intention of the Government to send the 58th Regiment to India. That regiment had been 9 years 8 months in India, and 4 years 11 months at home. It had not been sent on foreign service before the proper time, though the exigencies of the Service had curtailed the period of its stay in England.

CUSTOM HOUSE—THE TEA AND EAST INDIA DEPARTMENTS—DEFECTIVE SANITARY ARRANGEMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the case, as stated in the "Sanitary Record" of the 16th May, that a report has been made to the Treasury by the Office of Works on the defective sanitary arrangements of the Tea and East India Department Offices in the Custom House; and, if so, whether the Treasury intend taking any action in the matter?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, the improvements suggested by a Report made in May, 1878, on the Tea Department at the Custom House had been carried out. After the Estimates for this year had been prepared—in fact, only on the 18th of April—a fresh application was made for improved accommodation in that Department, in which the statement was again made of unhealthiness. As this fresh application appeared to have been made more with a view to providing extra comfort than an improvement in the sanitary condition, and as it was overcrowding rather than unhealthiness that had to be dealt with, the application had been postponed in order to avoid a Supplementary Estimate. He could assure the hon. Member that it would not be lost sight of in the preparation of next year's Estimates.

SOUTH AMERICA—CHILI AND PERU—THE HOSTILITIES.—QUESTION.

MR. A. MILLS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any information other than that which has already appeared in the newspapers has reached the Foreign Office respecting the war now going on between Chili and Peru; and, whether any intervention by way of mediation is possible on the part of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the information which has been received at the Foreign Office is similar to that which has appeared in the public journals. Her Majesty's Government have tendered to both belligerents their good offices, with the view to a settlement of their disputes.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING ACT 1865 (AMENDMENT) ACT—INCREASE OF FEES UPON SUITORS.

QUESTION.

MR. HERSHELL asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a statement showing approximately what would be the annual sum to be levied under "The Courts of Justice Building Act, 1865 (Amendment) Act," on the suitors in the next twenty-five years, in the shape of an increase of fees, and what percentage of increase on the present fees would result.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that the annual sum to be levied under the Courts of Justice Building Act, 1865, Amendment Act might be approximately stated at some £35,000 a-year, as far as could be seen at present; but he feared it would be impossible as yet to say what percentage of increase on present fees would result, because the Bill now before the House would spread that increase over a much larger area than that on which it would fall under the law as it stood.

METROPOLIS—STATE OF REPAIR OF PUBLIC ROADS.—QUESTION.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether the streets and roads of the Metropolis are under any general Government supervision; and whether complaints have reached him of the bad condition of many of the Metropolitan roads in consequence of the indifferent materials used in their repair, and especially from the use of the circular pebble and gravel instead of broken stone, and of lumps of much larger size than those of two-inch diameter invariably adopted by Mr. Macadam in his construction of roads.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: Sir, the streets and roads of the Metropolis are not under Government supervision, nor are they under the supervision of the Metropolitan Board of Works. They are under the supervision of the respective Vestries and District Boards of the Metropolis. As regards complaints of indifferent materials, I do not recollect any complaint as to circular pebble and gravel instead of broken stone; but now and then I have had complaints of the bad state of the roads in the Metropolis, and whenever I have had such complaints I have always taken care that they were forwarded to the Vestries or District Boards responsible for the proper maintenance of the roads. I have also taken care that the representatives of those districts who are on the Metropolitan Board should have notice given them, so that they might see into the matter.

"THE GOVERNMENT AND THE TELEGRAPH COMPANIES" — PURCHASE OF THE UNITED KINGDOM ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH COMPANY — CHARGE OF FRAUD.

QUESTION.

MR. FORTESCUE HARRISON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been called to an article headed "The Government and the Telegraph Companies," which appeared in "Capital and Labour" on the 9th instant, in which it is stated that a memorial has been sent to the Lords of the Treasury containing grave charges against certain persons therein named in connection with the acquisition by the Government of the United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Company in 1869, and asserting, amongst other things, that by the award made in that transaction the revenues of the country were defrauded to the extent of over £400,000; and, whether it is true that a memorial of this nature has been received by the Lords of the Treasury; and, if so, whether he will lay a Copy of it upon the Table of the House, together with the reply of the Government thereto?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: A Memorial has been submitted to the Treasury, asserting that the Government has been defrauded of more than £400,000 in respect of the award for the acquisition of the United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Company, and they have also received a sworn declaration denying the truth of the allegation. A considerable part of the subject-matter of the Memorial does not concern the Government; but I have caused an investigation to be made into that portion which does concern the Government, and there will be no objection to laying on the Table the Report I have received on that part of the subject. I think it would be objectionable to make Parliament the vehicle for publishing statements that do not concern the Government.

NORTH OF ENGLAND—THE NEW UNIVERSITY—ISSUE OF A CHARTER QUESTION.

MR. COURTNEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If, in view of the possibility of the advisers of the Crown recommending an exercise of the prerogative in the issue of a charter of a new University in the North of England, he will arrange that an opportunity shall be previously given to this House of expressing an opinion thereon?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that he feared he could not make opportunities for the discussion by the House of the scheme for the proposed new University; but the hon. Member would have it in his power, if he thought right, to move an Address to the Crown on the subject.

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—BASES OF PEACE.—OBSERVATION.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It may be of interest to the House that I should mention that the Government have received a communication from the Viceroy of India, stating that the bases of peace have been arrived at with the Ameer Yakoub Khan.

SOUTH AFRICA—NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE BOERS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies a Question, of which I have not had an opportunity of giving him Notice, but which, if he would prefer it, I shall be content if he will answer to-morrow. On Saturday, there appeared in one of the daily newspapers a document professing to be a despatch from Sir Bartle Frere, in regard to the Memorial of the Boers. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he can tell the House if such a despatch has been received, and, if so, whether he will lay it on the Table of the House?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I have not received any such despatch. On the 24th of April, Sir Bartle Frere telegraphed from Pretoria that Copies of the correspondence between himself and the Boers would be sent by the next mail; but he made no reference to this despatch, which is dated April 17. Of course, however, it may be authentic; and, if it is so, its publication in South Africa before it reached me might be accounted for by Sir Bartle Frere having shown it to the Boer Committee, to ascertain whether they were satisfied with it as a summary of their arguments.

AFGHANISTAN AND ZULULAND—THE WARS—NUMBER OF BRITISH TROOPS.

QUESTION.

MR. WADDY gave Notice that on Thursday he would ask the Secretary of State for War to state the number of British Forces of all arms now engaged in the prosecution of Wars in Afghanistan and Zululand respectively, including in each case the troops actually under orders.

COLONEL STANLEY said, it might save inconvenience, if he said at once that he did not think he could give any information with regard to the troops employed in India. He was not sure that he had the information, or the means of procuring it; but, if he had, of course he would produce it with the rest.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

QUESTIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON asked, Whether, in the probable event of the discussion on the Indian Budget lasting more than one night, the Government would take the adjourned debate on the following Monday, or make arrangements for continuing it on Friday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he must consult with his Colleagues before giving an answer.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE asked the hon. Member for Roscommon, When the second reading of the University Education (Ireland) Bill would be taken?

THE O'CONOR DON said, he had every reason to believe that it would be the first Order of the Day on Wednesday; and, if so, he intended to proceed with it on that day.

DR. CAMERON asked, Whether the second reading of the Banking and Joint Stock Companies Bill would be taken before Whitsuntide?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not give an answer to the Question at that moment.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

[Progress.]

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(1.) £56,706, to complete the sum for Law Charges, agreed to.

(2.) £162,444, to complete the sum for Criminal Prosecutions, Sheriffs' Expenses, &c.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, it would be well if the Government would inform the Committee what steps were being taken to carry into effect the recommendations of the Committee which had inquired into this subject. Economy ought to be effected in this matter; and when the present Government came into Office they had an opportunity of effecting economy in the Administrative Department of the Courts of Justice. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that, as long back as 1873, a Committee of the House was appointed to inquire into the Civil Service Expenditure. The Committee examined into the various Legal Departments in the country, the administration of which cost £1,750,000. After reviewing the evidence they had received, the Committee considered that all the Legal Establishments were unduly expensive; and they reported that, not only were there ample fields for economy, but also great need for improvement in the administrative arrangements; in fact, in their opinion, great service would be rendered to the public by a reorganization of the Administrative Department. Two years after that Report, he had the honour to bring this subject before the House, and he was assured by the Secretary to the Treasury that it was engaging the attention of the Treasury. On looking at this Estimate, it was impossible to observe that any results had ensued from the attention which the Secretary to the Treasury then promised to give to the matter. He hoped that, after this long interval, the Government would do all in their power to put into effect the recommendations of the Committee. At the present time, economy was so very requisite, and it would be well that this opportunity should not be lost.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that what he promised last year had not been lost sight of. On the discussion of this Estimate last year the noble Lord called attention to the facts he had now re-stated; and in answer he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) could only say that a Departmental Committee had been appointed, and were about to investigate the matter at once. He was happy to say that the Departmental Committee had reported, and the Lord Chancellor had prepared a Bill on the strength of the Report of that Committee, in which he proposed to deal with the whole of the recommendations made for the re-organization of the Offices under this particular head. He trusted that that Bill would shortly be introduced, and that, in the interest of economy, the House would pass it into law.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £147,768, to complete the sum for the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, agreed to.

(4.) £52,809, to complete the sum for the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer Divisions of the High Court of Justice, agreed to.

(5.) £78,228, to complete the sum for the Probate, &c. Registries of the High Court of Justice, agreed to.

(6.) £9,375, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Registry of the High Court of Justice, agreed to.

(7.) £10,110, to complete the sum for the Wreck Commission, agreed to.

(8.) £31,542, to complete the sum for the London Bankruptcy Court, agreed to.

(9.) £366,679, to complete the sum for County Courts.

MR. WHITWELL said, that the Lords had before them a Bill dealing with the administration of justice through the means of the County Courts, brought in, he believed, at the instance of the Lord Chancellor. That Bill had not yet come down to this House. He begged to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General whether there was a probability of that Bill, which would, or, at least, ought, to materially affect this Vote, coming down to this House with any chance of it being passed this Session?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, that the Bill to which the hon. Gentleman referred had come down to this House, and would be introduced almost immediately. It was a question of some little difficulty whether the Bill had any chance of passing this Session. If it were not opposed, no doubt it would be passed; but if it were opposed, he feared its chances of passing this Session would not be very great. He hoped the Bill would receive a considerable amount of approbation; and, that being so, they would pass it this Session.

MR. WHITWELL was glad to see that his hon. and learned Friend was hopeful in respect to the Bill. The Bill, which had been introduced from time to time in this House by his hon. Friend (Mr. Norwood), had not had the opportunity of being passed; and, of course, he was quietly and honourably waiting until he could put his Bill into competition with that passed in the other House. He feared, therefore, that the Government measure would not make much progress until the Bills were referred to a Select Committee. It was a singular fact that in this year's Estimate there appeared a large increase in the expenses for conveyance of persons committed. Was that owing to the expenditure incurred under the administration of the new Prisons Act, or why should a very large increase take place in this respect? If the Estimate were correct, the increase in the expenses for conveyance of persons committed by the County Courts was £2,510. If an increase appeared in the number of persons committed, it would be a fact to be regretted.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON thought that an explanation would be found in the increase of the County Court business. They found that a greater number of cases were dealt with by the County Courts; and, therefore, they saw a proportionate increase in the expenses. Every year showed a steady increase in the amount of work done by the County Courts.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,518, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Land Registry."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, his impression was that the Land Registration Department practically did no work at all; it was, in fact, one of those unfortunate failures of Law Reform. He believed that the cause of the failure was that land registration was a kind of permissive legislation; but he did not intend to go into that argument. He believed that land registration would not be successful until they made it compulsory; but, of course, they knew there were influences at work to resist a policy of that kind. But they must deal with the matter as it was; and they had got, in point of fact, a large staff to do practically little or no work at all. Unless he heard to the contrary from his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, he must incline to the impression that there was not more work than one Registrar could do. They had a Registrar receiving £2,500 a-year; and it was really absurd, in the existing state of the Court, to have an Assistant Registrar at £1,500. This was a matter in which a piece of practical economy might be effected; and, really, considering the quantity of work done, it was simply ludicrous to have an Assistant Registrar and three clerks. He had no desire to disturb the distinguished gentleman who held the office of Registrar; but to maintain so large a staff to do so small an amount of work was simply a waste of public money. One Registrar, at a very small salary, and without a single clerk, ought to do all the work required of him. He hoped they might hear from the Government that there would be some endeavour to effect economy in this instance, unless there was some chance that this Office would have more work to do.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, this question was before the House last Session, and there was considerable discussion in respect to land registration. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) moved for a Committee to inquire into the subject, and the hon. and learned Gentleman imagined that he had hit upon a scheme for obviating all difficulty, and for making land registration a very useful institution. The hon. and learned Gentleman nominated the Committee. It was one of great importance, being composed of Gentlemen of great experience, and they had considered and investigated the question from that time to the present. The Report of the Committee had not been presented; but he believed that it would be in a short time. He should be glad if the Committee had hit on any mode of making the registration of land effective. He knew they had examined witnesses from Ireland and Scotland, where it was said that an excellent system of land registration prevailed; and it might be found, when the Report of the Committee was published, that some scheme was devised for making the registration of land effective—that was to say, that some scheme could be adopted, under which the persons who were owners of land could be induced to place their titles upon the register; and if persons were so induced, no doubt the present staff in the Land Registration Office—indeed, a very considerably increased staff—would be required. His own opinion was that it would be very difficult to make any scheme for the registration of land absolutely effectual, and to cause it to be brought into anything like universal use, unless they made registration compulsory. But he, for one, was not at all prepared to make registration of land compulsory. It was a very difficult question. It might be said, on the one hand, that it would facilitate the transfer of land—perhaps, to some extent, cheapen the transfer of land—yet, on the other hand, it would be a measure which would savour of arbitrariness, because they would compel a man to disclose to the world his title when, perhaps, he might not wish to do so. That, under ordinary circumstances, seemed to be a great hardship upon the owners of property. He might be wrong in the view he took, and it might be by some other way than by making registration of land compulsory that registration of land could be made effectual. It had been suggested that instead of registering the titles for land it would be a wise and expedient thing to provide for the registration of deeds through the country, and he did not think there would be any great difficulty in providing such a scheme. However, without occupying more time, he would say that the whole system was examined by a very competent Committee, and the Report of that Committee would, in a very short time, be before the House, and then the House would be able to judge whether matters could be so arranged as to make this land registration a more effectual Department than at present. His hon. and learned Friend was somewhat in error in thinking there was no work for the gentlemen in that Office to do. The truth was that, under the Act of 1875, very few registrations had taken place; but under the Act of 1862—Sir Richard Bethell's Act, he believed—a good many titles had been put upon the register. As those titles had to be dealt with, they occasioned a good deal of work, which had to be performed by those in this Office. He held in his hand a Return showing what had been done between the 21st of February, 1878, and the 14th of March, 1879. Under the Act of 1875 only 13 titles had been registered during that period—or rather, he believed, only six applications had been made—at any rate, the value of the property which had been dealt with was altogether only £57,000 odd. That was not much; and he confessed that under that Act very little seemed to have been done. The fact was that the Act was not compulsory, and persons did not resort to it. Under the Act of 1862 there had been placed upon the register—including transfers, changes, and so on—608 titles; and, altogether, the value of the property dealt with was £1,238,000. His belief was that if these Acts worked thoroughly well, and if people did largely resort to registration of their titles, the present staff of the Department, instead of being excessive, would be inadequate. At all events, he would ask the Committee to pass the Vote until they had had an opportunity of considering the Report of the Committee.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, several years ago he asked why, considering the small amount of work which was done by this Department, the Government did not take care to require that the officers of it should be required to perform other duties for which they were qualified? He considered the hon. and learned Attorney General had utterly failed with the whole case. The hon. and learned Gentleman had pointed out that, under the Act of 1875, they had dealt with property of the value of £57,000, and, under the Act of 1862, property of the value of £1,238,000. Of course, that was no more than £60,000 a-year, and the hon. and learned Gentleman, having admitted that the £57,000 was a very small amount of property to have been dealt with, he must admit that this £60,000 a-year was not much more. The point which he wished to ask the Treasury was whether these officers were not to be more usefully employed than they were now? He asked that the Government should look after the expenditure, and should see whether gentlemen drawing salaries might not be employed in taking up some part of the legal business in other Departments. He blamed the previous Government, just as much as the present Government, in the matter, and hoped to see more care exercised in future as to the employment of these gentlemen.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he thought his hon. and learned Friend (Sir William Harcourt) had done good service in bringing the question before the Committee. He listened attentively to the hon. and learned Attorney General, and he was bound to say it appeared to him that there was very little doing in this Department. He thought the House ought to have some better guarantee than they had at present of the work done in these Offices. It seemed to him that the lawyers were the only people whose business was not thoroughly scrutinized, and the money which was annually voted simply for the benefit of the Legal Profession. They were the only people who got any good out of the House. He thought the House ought to be particularly careful and cautious in seeing that they did not create any more of these new Offices, or else that they should be sure to attach to them some real work to be done. It might be urged that more work might come into this particular Office in the future; but the attention of the Government had been directed to this Office on previous occasions, and he hoped they would make some serious alterations in it next year, or else that the Committee would reduce the Vote. The House did not intend that these things should be perpetuated. There were other things besides this Department which were waiting for criticism; but, as to this particular Office, he ventured to think that, unless more work was done next year, some great reduction ought to be made.

MR. RYLANDS said, he thought the Committee were very much indebted to the hon. and learned Member who had brought the subject under the notice of the Committee, and who did it in a manner which showed he had devoted to it considerable attention. He was bound to say the hon. and learned Attorney General had entirely failed in justifying the expenditure which the Committee were now considering. The hon. and learned Gentleman told them, with perfect accuracy, what amount of business had been transacted, and he knew perfectly well that was not sufficient to employ anything like the staff for which salaries were charged. But the hon. and learned Gentleman told them that if certain things occurred possibly there might be more business in this Office; but he did not expect those things to occur. He said if registration were compulsory there would be more. No doubt, there would be; but this was not a question of compulsory registration; and he might remind the Committee this was a question which had gone on year after year. He thought the only way of dealing with these matters was to divide the Committee—that they should mark their sense of the extravagance of this Vote by proposing to reduce it. Of course, he was not going to move to reduce it to what he thought it might safely be brought down to, or he should move a reduction of £3,000 or £4,000, but he proposed to reduce it by £1,000; and he assured the Committee that if they would give him a majority in favour of reducing the Vote by £1,000, they would do more by that majority than by any amount of discussion. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), that these legal charges seemed to be those over which the House had the least control, and in thinking there were other cases quite as bad as this. He took blame to himself for having inadvertently omitted to take notice of an item just now which was covered up by other Votes, and was passed in No. 3. Legal officers were appointed who drew large salaries, and did no work for them; and if it happened that no notice was taken by a Member of the House the Vote was passed, although the matter might be one requiring the most careful attention. Something was said last year about certain legal officers, and he thought something ought to be done with them by the Government. He alluded to the Official Referees, and he would call the attention of the hon. and learned Attorney General to the discussion which took place last year on that subject. With regard to the Vote now before the Committee, he moved to reduce it by £1,000, and he trusted the Committee would support him, as an indication to the Government that they called upon them to make some substantial alteration.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,518, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Land Registry."—(Mr. Rylands.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped the Committee on this occasion—whatever they might do in the future—would not agree to the reduction of the Vote. He could not help thinking the House was very much to blame when it passed Acts of Parliament necessitating expenses of this kind; although it was quite true that after the Acts were passed the expenses should be brought as low as possible. However, as to the Vote now before the Committee, they had been told by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General that a Report was forthcoming from the Select Committee. He thought it would be hardly courteous to that Committee if the House were to do that which might be directly opposed to its recommendations. It was possible the Select Committee might suggest a mode of throwing more work into the hands of those officers; but he deprecated a reduction of their salaries as long as they were allowed to remain as the administrative staff. He quite admitted that the expenses ought to be considered, and the Government had shown they had considered the question by the appointment of a Committee. Certainly, if that Report was in the sense of what they thought at present, some alteration in the Vote must take place another year.

MR. WHITWELL said, the House had already experience of the result of attempting to improve this Office. A Bill was brought in by the Lord Chancellor some years ago and passed, and then they were pressed to continue this Vote because of the probability that there would be an increase in the work of the Office under that Act. That Act certainly had produced some increase; but how much? Virtually nothing. For the last 15 years they had been registering estates to the amount of £60,000 a-year, an amount which would only represent a comparatively few estates, and for that they had been paying in expenses for this Office £5,000 a-year, or at the rate of nearly 10 per cent on the full value of the estate registered. When this Office was established they were told that its expenses would be met by the fees from owners who went to it in order to validate their titles. In the face of that assertion, let the Committee notice that the amount of estimated extra receipts for 1878-9 was £6, and for 1879-80 it was the same amount, while the whole amount of registration fees was £793. An Office, in fact, which cost the country £5,400, was yielding something like £800, and the balance repaid what the country contributed for the benefit of those who availed themselves of the use of this Office. He did not think they should wait for the chance that a Report of a Committee now sitting upstairs might increase the work of this Office. No one could have said more for the continuance of the Office than the hon. and learned Attorney General; but he was sure the hon. and learned Gentleman must feel—as everyone who had listened to the debate must also feel—that the Office had not done the work which was expected of it; that the House made a mistake when it established it, and that this expenditure ought really to be stopped.

MR. GREGORY thought the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had been a little unfair in his remarks about lawyers, and he claimed to speak in this matter on public grounds. It was not for him to anticipate the result of the Report of the Committee now sitting upstairs; but he thought it would be to throw a good deal more work upon this Office. If his clients were compelled to register their deeds, he certainly should advise them to register their possessory titles also, for one would be but very little more expense than the other, and would give owners all the advantages of a possessory title. For that reason, he believed that an increase in the registry of deeds would increase the registry of titles also. In his opinion, the House itself was largely responsible for the failure of this Office. When the Land Transfer Bill was in Committee, he and his hon. and learned the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) raised a discussion about the operation of it; and if the proposition they then made had been carried out, he felt certain that it would have largely increased the usefulness of this Office. They suggested that, after a certain number of years, a person might take his title off the register and get, at the same time, a declaration of title. He was certain that many persons had been prevented from registering their titles by the apprehension that if they wanted subsequently to cut up their properties the registration would be a great source of expense. With reference to the expense of this Office, another course might be adopted. They had in Middlesex a registry of deeds, while this Office merely registered titles, and he did not see why these two Offices should not be amalgamated. He must add, also, that the fact that this Office had not had any work to do was not the fault of the officials, according to his experience, for, whenever he went there, he was received with the greatest politeness and courtesy.

MR. CHILDERS desired that the Committee should thoroughly understand the question before it—namely, whether a body of gentlemen who had had for 10 years next to nothing to do should be continued without reduction in numbers. The hon. and learned Attorney General had practically admitted that these gentlemen had very little to do; but, on the other hand, they were told that a Committee which was about to report would probably make some recommendations which would give them something to do. He must say, in reference to that, that their practice in that House had not been to find work for public officers to do, but first to ascertain the work which required to be done, and then to see that officers were appointed to do it. The other system was putting the cart before the horse. The hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had given the officials of this department great credit for their affability and courtesy to him. But there was no wonder at that. The officials must have been delighted to see him, for he was one of those rare visitors at their office, a professional gentleman with something for them to do. It had been suggested that this Office should be merged in the Office for the Registration of Deeds in Middlesex; but he would remind the Committee that of all offices this was about the least satisfactory. The Registrarships were unqualified sinecures. In 1867, a Committee was appointed by Viscount Cranbrook to inquire into the working of that Office; but for 12 years nothing had been done to remedy its abuses. He had not heard anything to justify the expenditure on the present Office, which could be reduced without the faintest risk of mischief.

MR. LOWTHIAN BELL seconded the Amendment. The formation of the Office seemed to have been a mistake; and, if so, as it was costing the country a great deal of money, it ought to be discontinued.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT did not think the arguments of the hon. Gentlemen opposite had at all touched the question at issue. They were asked to give the Office a fair trial, and they were told that the Select Committee would recommend some change. But then the hon. and learned Attorney General had told them himself that he was opposed to compulsory registration, so that work would not be found for the Office in that way. Then, again, an hon. Gentleman opposite had recommended the amalgamation of the Registry of Deeds with the Registry of Titles. But for a Registry of Deeds they did not require a Registrar at £2,500 a-year, and an Assistant Registrar at £1,500. For registration of titles a lawyer was necessary to examine the titles; but any clerk could undertake the management of an office for the registration of deeds. They were asked to give the Act a little longer trial; but he did not see why the money of the country should be spent on the hypothetical chance that some day this Office might be wanted. He would divide with the hon. Member for Burnley.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR JOHN HOLKER) replied, that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford was not completely exact in what he had said. He had not reported that this Office was really overwhelmed with work; but, at the same time, the Office did do a greater amount of work than some hon. Members seemed to suppose. During the period for which the last Return was made, property was dealt with of the value of over £1,283,000. According to his own view, the registration of titles could be of no use unless that registration were made compulsory, which, under our present system, was impracticable; but, on the other hand, many of his hon. Friends took a more hopeful view of the matter, and had suggested alterations which they thought would make this Office more efficient, and would bring in a great deal more work than it had at present. If the registration of deeds, which at present existed in Middlesex, were extended to the rest of the Kingdom, undoubtedly a great deal more work would be thrown on this Office. It was proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) to lop the salaries of these clerks by £1,000 a-year, which, practically, meant that the officials should be made to suffer for the sins and omissions of Parliament. It would be a wise thing, and a politic thing, to see how the Act worked after the new changes, and then, if it failed, let them propose to repeal the Act; but do not let them visit the defects and failures of the system upon the officers, who were not responsible for these faults, and who had done their best to carry out the Act.

MR. LOWE said, last year a Committee was appointed to inquire into this subject, and during last Session and the present one it had taken a great deal of evidence. It had now closed that work; and, as he understood from the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), they were now engaged in considering their Report—if, indeed, they had not actually agreed upon it. He did not say what the Report of that Committee would be; but, under such circumstances, as a Member of that Committee, he must decline to enter into the merits of the question now at issue.

MR. RAMSAY had so much desire to see an effective system of land registration established in England that he should have very great hesitation in giving any vote which would do away with the system now in existence. But the statement now made showed that the system was wholly inoperative. Therefore, unless some assurance were given them that, after 16 years' experience of the present system of land registry, there would be some attempt at a change and at an improvement, he should certainly vote for the rejection of the entire Vote. At present, there was simply a waste of money in this way to the extent of £5,400 a-year.

Mr. Childers.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, they were told that now that the Government had had their attention drawn to this matter it was their bounden duty to see that something was done. He would suggest that the proper time to consider that matter would be when the Committee, of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) had spoken, had sent in their Report. Then the House would be able to see what changes they recommended, and what alterations it was necessary to make. It certainly would not be fair for the Government to take the matter in hand before that time; nor did he think it would be fair either to turn round on these gentlemen and deprive them of their salaries because some hon. Members were of opinion that they had not sufficient to do.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD reminded the hon. Gentleman that the issue left to the Committee was simply the Motion to reduce these salaries by £1,000; and the justification for that step was the fact that though all these gentlemen enjoyed large salaries they had, practically, nothing to do. It was not proposed to deprive them of their salaries, which would be most unfair, but only to lessen them by about 20 per cent. He opposed this Vote, for the reason that he opposed the Acts which constituted the Office. Even after their experience of the working of the first Registration Act, and of its failure, the Government secured the passing of a second Act, although he and other Members warned the House at that time that such an Act would be a failure, and that nothing could succeed but compulsory registration. He said at the time that this system would be merely an addition to the cost of transfer, and that they could not expect it to be generally adopted so long as it was permissive. It was far better to leave the system of conveyancing unaltered, unless the House was prepared to pass an Act providing for a compulsory registration of title. For these reasons, he should give his support to the Amendment.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND was quite aware that the Office, as now constituted, had not sufficient work, and on that point he was entirely at one with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), and his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). For all that, he trusted the Committee would not allow itself to be carried away by the youthful impetuosity of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands). They must deal fairly with gentlemen who had given up the practice of their Profession and had taken important duties under the Act of Parliament. Although the Act had turned out ill, still they ought to give these gentlemen fair notice. They now heard that alterations were proposed which would give these gentlemen more work to do; and if those fell through, he certainly should be prepared to reduce the Vote in the next year. He certainly would do so himself in the next year, and he thought others would support him. But it did seem to him unfair to strike a sudden blow at these gentlemen, who had done all in their power to make the Act a success, and who certainly were not to blame if it had failed.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY could not understand such an argument at all. They were asked to pass the Vote now, and were told that if that were done this year it would be a warning for the future. But that was what they were always told, and was a principle which would prevent the House from ever rejecting any Vote that was ever proposed. Of course, the rejection of the Vote might inflict some hardship on the individual; but it was the duty of the Government to redress that, and to see that no injury was done. He must protest against the view that, in common justice, they could not propose these reductions without doing some injustice to individuals. How, if that view were accepted, was the House ever to effect a reduction in the Votes? If they thought that the Office was not working satisfactorily, it was their duty as Members to vote against this Vote, and it was the duty of the Government to see how they could best provide for these gentlemen, who, if they were no longer employed in that Office, certainly might be employed in some other way. He remembered the discussion when this Office was first formed. They were then told that the Office was to be self-supporting, and that so much business would come in that the fees would pay all the expenses. But they found that that was not so; and the hon. and learned Attorney General made the matter still more melancholy by declaring that it never could be so. He declared that the Office could never pay unless registration of titles were made compulsory, and he then showed that compulsory registration of titles was impossible. If that were really the opinion of the Government, then the sooner this Office were abolished the better.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER was of opinion that it would be very unjust to abolish these salaries at present. The gentlemen who received them held their posts under the authority of two Acts of Parliament. The Registrar and Assistant Registrar were both men of large practice. They were taken from them, and put into these Offices, the duties of which they thoroughly and efficiently performed. How, then, could they possibly deal in this way with them? No doubt the system of registration of titles was a failure. He said, when the first Act was proposed to the House, that it would fail; while, as to the second Act, which was proposed in order to give the Office something to do, he stated in the House that no such result could be hoped for from it. What he had said had turned out to be true, and it was what he had always expected, because no system of registration of titles ever could succeed. He was a Member of the Committee to which reference had been made, and he believed that its Report would shortly be ready. He believed the Committee would recommend, instead of a registration of title, a registration of deeds. In face of such a proposal, it would be a very rash thing to abolish this Office just at the very time when a change was to be proposed in the law, which would give it work to do.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT wished to know whether the Government intended to endorse the pledge of the hon. Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland), that this Vote should not appear again in the Estimates in its present form, unless some change were made in the arrangements?

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he did not pretend to give any pledge on behalf of the Government or the Party. He merely said that unless some change were made he should not himself support the Vote.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT had misunderstood the hon. Baronet. But he wanted to know what the House was sitting in Committee at all for, if salaries could not be altered? The duty of the Committee of Supply would be a farce if this argument were to apply. The argument was contrary to every principle upon which the Committee of Supply was founded; and he was surprised to hear his hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) endorsing it. The country had provided a regular system for dealing with cases where Offices were abolished by means of the Superannuation Acts; and, therefore, they might vote on this question without inflicting any hardship whatever on the gentlemen composing the Office. The reduction proposed, too, was not nearly so great as would take place if the officers were abolished.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 88; Noes 140: Majority 52.—(Div. List, No. 102.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(11.) £18,690, Revising Barristers, England, agreed to.

(12.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £11,673, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Police Courts of London and Sheerness."

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, this was one of those expenses which the whole country was called upon to bear, but which properly should be defrayed by the Metropolis. He had moved on a previous occasion to reduce another Vote as regarded the charge for the police at the Patent Office; but he did not press that matter because, after the discussion, he thought there was some reason to believe that that charge really was one for national purposes. On the other hand, it could not, in his opinion, be maintained that the Metropolitan Police Courts, with the exception, perhaps, of Sheerness and Chatham, were really maintained for national objects. No doubt, at those two last-named places, a good deal of police business did arise out of the national Dockyards there; and, so far as they were concerned, he would not trouble the House with any observations. As regarded the others, he would remind the House that in the country they had to pay for their own police courts, and, practically, to bear the whole cost of the summary administration of justice. But the Metropolis obtained from the national funds not merely funds for the maintenance of its police courts, but the money with which to build them. Only last Session, they had a Bill before them to provide money for the erection of a police court at Bow Street out of the national Revenue. Out of the national funds, also, they were paying for the new Courts of Justice, which, to a considerable extent, were the Assize Courts of the Metropolis; while, if Leeds, Liverpool, or Manchester wanted new Assize Courts, the people of the locality had to bear the cost of them. In this Vote, £14,163 was asked for; but there was a charge made elsewhere of £5,403 for superannuation allowances, which brought the total cost of the Metropolitan Police Courts up to £19,166. Against that, he was aware it was said that they should set the amount received for fees at the various police courts. The amount estimated from this source in 1879 was £19,700, so that the fees would appear to pay all the costs of the courts. The Committee must, however, bear in mind that a portion of the payments for the police courts, and the whole of the salaries of the magistrates, amounting in all to £35,500, were taken from the Consolidated Fund. It had been said that some of the business transacted at these police courts was of national importance and necessity, and he was quite prepared to admit that that might be the case in some exceptional cases. For that reason, certain amounts might be fairly asked for from the national funds; but it was not fair to charge the country, and especially the Provinces, with the whole of these payments. Unless some explanation were given, convincing him that he was in the wrong, he certainly should carry this to a Division, and he should move the reduction of the Vote by £10,000.

He should not feel so strongly on this subject, if this were the only case; but the present was only one of a series of Votes, in the nature of eleemosynary contributions to London and its outlying districts, made at the expense of the local authorities in the country. The Government, and its supporters in that House, were always ready to taunt the Provinces with their lavish expenditure for local purposes, forgetting that by their Bills they had compelled them to undertake these works, and had then heaped upon them, in addition, these payments for works in the Metropolis, which ought, according to all principles of taxation, to be borne by London alone. He had always been an advocate for a re-distribution of seats, in accordance with population; but when he thought of what 20 Members had been able to do for London, he shuddered to think of what might be done by four times that number, and he supposed that would be the proportion to which London really was entitled. Not only had they secured for the Metropolis, at the cost of the nation, the great central Parks, which were part of the ornament of the capital, but they had also made the nation pay for the outlying Parks, like Battersea. Museums, Picture Galleries, and Free Libraries, which, in the country, would be paid out of the local rates, in London were erected at the cost of the Consolidated Fund. The time had come when something like a determined stand should be made, on the part of the Provinces, against this charge of local Metropolitan expenses on the Imperial Revenue, and he should, therefore, take a Division on the matter.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,763, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Police Courts of London and Sheerness."—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

Mr. HIBBERT thoroughly agreed with his hon. Friend. The time had certainly come for considering the propriety of paying for these local purposes out of the Imperial funds. Now that the question of giving certain amounts from the national purse towards the alleviation of local burdens had been considered, they ought to do something more, by taking part of this Vote from off the Imperial Exchequer and throwing it on the Metropolis. In the country they had to pay for their police courts out of their local rates; and if they wished for a stipendiary magistrate, he was only appointed on condition that his salary was paid by the locality over which he presided. In the Metropolis it was very different. There they had £34,000 charged on the Consolidated Fund for the salaries of the magistrates; they had all the salaries and expenses connected with the courts paid out of the Imperial purse; and, in addition to all that, the country had also to pay for building the different police courts. He did think the time had come when this question ought to be really considered; and although he did not suppose his hon. Friend would be all likely to succeed on a Division, still the time had certainly come when the representatives of the local taxpayers should make a protest against the principle involved in this Vote.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON was not surprised that the hon. Member had brought forward this subject, for it had been raised again and again, and fought over and over again, on that Vote. The question simply was, whether or no the Metropolis was to be considered as an exceptional locality because it was the capital of the country, and whether or no it did not gather within its circuit so much of the life of the country, so much of the habits and customs of all the rest of England, that it was fairly entitled to charge these expenses on the general taxpayer? Certainly, these police courts had been charged on the general Exchequer ever since the year 1839; and he was not sure whether the Vote could not be traced back to 1790, and to the time when Bow Street was sufficient for all the needs of the Metropolis. For a great part of the year many of the people that London contained within its bounds came to it from all parts of the Kingdom; and it was on this ground that these charges had always been treated as national, rather than local. The question had been fought out over and over again; and, for these reasons, it had always been decided that these Votes were a general charge.

Mr. RYLANDS said, if there was anyway of convincing the Provinces that, in addition to their own heavy local burdens, they ought to pay still further to maintain the institutions of the Metropolis, the sentiments, almost approaching to poetry, with which the Secretary to the Treasury had defended the Vote, would have certainly done it. But the very circumstances to which the hon. Gentleman had alluded as justifying this charge were just the very circumstances which should seem to point out that, in common justice, the Metropolis ought to bear, to a very large extent, its own charges. It was perfectly true that a number of persons came annually to London from all parts of the Kingdom. But did they not spend a very large amount of money when they were here among the ratepayers? While, no doubt, the police courts were required, to some extent, for the work arising out of this influx of visitors, it was equally true, on the other hand, that the visitors brought with them the means of recouping the inhabitants very largely for that additional expenditure. But there was also another influx going on. A very excellent friend of his, whose son—an hon. Baronet—now occupied a seat in the House, and who, like himself, came from Lancashire, once said that the North was the best place to make money, but that London was the only place to spend it. Now-a-days, a large number of people, who had made large fortunes in the country, came to London to spend them, often living here at the very time that they were deriving large incomes from various parts of the country. All this pointed to the conclusion that the Metropolis was very wealthy, and was yearly drawing to itself a larger amount of wealth, and that it was perfectly unjustifiable that, from year to year, Votes should be proposed, the effect of which was to impose taxation upon the inhabitants of the country at large, in order to relieve London from burdens of a character which other districts bore for themselves. The hon. Gentleman told them that this was an old story. No doubt it was. He himself, in the last Parliament, objected to the Vote in regard to some of these charges for police courts. He was supported on that occasion by his right hon. Friend opposite the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Selater-Booth), who was at that time a Member of the then Opposition, and he was actually one of the Tellers. On that occasion they ran the then Government very close indeed, and there was some doubt whether there would not be a tie. Of course, he did not expect his right hon. Friend to carry the enlightened opinions he then expressed to the Treasury Bench. The reason why that agitation produced no fruit was that there had not been sufficient attention drawn to the question in the country. His hon. Friend (Mr. Chamberlain) had spoken of the influence of the Metropolitan Members. But the interests of London were backed up, not merely by those Members, but by a large number of other gentlemen, who, though they represented country constituencies, were London men. As a consequence, the country did suffer when its interests came into collision with those of the Metropolis. It was only necessary, however, to call attention to what he believed to be a gross injustice to force the Metropolis to pay those charges which the country districts already had to bear.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER believed that it would be no use discussing this subject so long as London was governed as at present. Who was to pay this rate, supposing it were made? Would they throw it upon the parishes, and call upon a poverty-stricken district, like Whitechapel, to pay it, or would they add the charge to the general rate of the Metropolitan Board of Works, under which they all at present groaned? So long as the machinery for managing London remained what it was at present, they would have one vestry trying to throw the charge upon another, and each evading the responsibility. Until somebody was responsible for the general management of the Metropolis, the system—if it could be called a system—would remain what it was at present.

MR. M'LAREN was decidedly of opinion that the Provincial towns were used very unfairly in this matter, and that, so far from London paying nothing, it should help to pay the expenses of other towns. If they took the two Houses of Parliament alone, and estimated the expenditure of each Member at £1,000 a-year, that gave an expenditure of £1,000,000 in the Metropolis, brought from the country; and, as everybody knew, this estimate was largely within the mark. He totally disagreed with the assumption that Londoners were burdened by the presence of strangers from the country among them.

On the contrary, he thought the Londoners should give the Provincial towns a bonus for the large amount of money they spent in it yearly. It was perfectly absurd to go on in this way. Only within the last few months they had been asked for something like £90,000 for the erection of a new police court. Why should the people of Manchester and Birmingham and Edinburgh pay for that police court? Why did not London pay for it, as other places had to do, when they wanted new courts? This lavish expenditure, at the cost of the country, had no justification whatever.

MR. DILLWYN said, it was quite true that this question had been discussed over and over again, but it had never yet been fought out thoroughly; and he was therefore heartily glad that his hon. Friend had taken the matter in hand. The question had already been discussed on Parks, Police Courts, Libraries, Museums, and Free Libraries. None of them grudged the National Museums, Libraries, and Parks; but he did object to grants for Parks in the suburban districts of London, and he had objected to it, unsuccessfully, year after year. They were now asked to pay for the police magistrates out of the national Exchequer. But, in his own town of Swansea, there was a stipendiary magistrate, who had often to decide very important shipping cases brought in from other places, and yet he was entirely paid by the ratepayers, and they got no help towards his salary from the nation at all. He hoped his hon. Friend would fight this out thoroughly. He probably would not be able to do much this year; but next year he certainly ought to offer a systematic opposition, and challenge every Vote which charged local expenses on the national Exchequer.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR would cordially support this Amendment, and any others of the same kind, as long as grants-in-aid were given. At the present time, £5,000,000 annually were distributed to the various localities, and he did protest against the continuance of those grants. They had been very largely increased since the present Government came into power; and he feared there was a great deal of favouritism in the way in which the money was spent. That could not, indeed, be helped. Any Government would be certain to favour those parts of the country which gave it the most support. He had suggested, instead, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should give up to the different localities certain taxes which were exacted solely for legal purposes—like the dog tax, the carriage tax, and the hawkers' and appraisers' licence duty. These taxes were levied solely for police purposes, and the Government might free themselves from all imputations of favouritism and injustice if they made this change. Certainly, otherwise, they could not stop where they were; for, year by year, they would be forced to go on increasing these grants. Since the Government had come into power these grants-in-aid had increased by £3,000,000 sterling; and he did appeal to them to free themselves from the odium which at present attached to these grants by making the change he had suggested. Nothing had done the Government more harm than their increasing Budgets, for the people would not see their explanation, that they put into one pocket what they took out of the other.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that had municipal government been granted to the Metropolis generally, the municipalities would have undertaken all these matters of expenditure in connection with the police courts; but the denial of these institutions, and the delay in setting right that old grievance, made it appear to be necessary to go on contributing out of the national funds all these sums of money for purely local purposes. The Police Force was maintained out of local rates, aided by the Government grant, which the Metropolis shared in common with all other local jurisdictions; and he could not conceive why the money now asked for out of the Consolidated Fund should not be paid in the same way, unless it was that the system was to continue until some competent power and influence in the House of Commons should prevent it.

MR. PARNELL joined the hon. Member for Birmingham in his appeal to the Committee to reduce this Vote by the sum stated. He also pointed out to the Committee that the case had a very much wider application than that which had been brought forward. In Ireland they had to pay out of local rates for the expenses of the police courts, and that out of local sums which were not at all under the control of the ratepayers, as was the case in Birmingham. Their case was, therefore, so much the worse than that of the people of Birmingham, because they had a considerable amount of control over the expenditure of money raised for the purpose of supporting the police courts; while the people in the Irish towns and localities subject to the Grand Jury laws had no control whatever over the expenditure of money raised for those local purposes. That being the case, he thought that Irish Members might very properly join the hon. Member for Birmingham in his attempt to draw attention to this subject. He wished to know why the Metropolitan cities should get such Votes, over the towns in the United Kingdom? A Vote was taken on the Estimates for Police Courts in Dublin; but none was taken under the head of petty sessional courts throughout the country. It would seem, therefore, that the Government, for some reason of their own, had determined that the police courts in the Metropolitan cities should be helped in this manner by Votes from the Imperial Exchequer, but that the police courts and petty sessional courts throughout the country should not be so assisted. He asked that the Secretary to the Treasury should give a Governmental reason for this, if he was acquainted with it; but, if not, he (Mr. Parnell) suggested that the Vote might very properly be postponed until he discovered that reason. If hon. Members objected to vote money in the dark for purposes entirely inconsistent with the general practice and without any sort of reason in support, it was perfectly useless to say that "the practice had been going on for some time." That might be a good old Civil Service argument; but it had been noticed that the Service had been obliged to abandon, one by one, a great many of their old arguments and practices, and had to seek refuge in more modern tricks. He therefore joined the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) in pressing the Government for some reason why there was this difference and inconsistency between the practice of the Government as regarded the Metropolitan cities and the other localities throughout the country. Perhaps the Chief Secretary for Ireland could enlighten the Committee with regard to his part of the business, which entered into the present question in a very marked and important manner.

General Sir George Balfour

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 38 ; Noes 74 : Majority 36.—(Div. List, No. 103.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(13.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £352,800, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for contribution towards the Expenses of the Metropolitan Police, and of the Horse Patrol and Thames Police, and for the Salaries of the Commissioner, Assistant Commissioners, and Receiver."

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, this Vote raised the same question as the previous Vote had raised, although in a different form and not quite in the same degree, inasmuch as the Metropolitan Police Force received from the national funds a contribution larger in proportion than that received by any of the country police courts. He therefore thought it his duty again to raise the question by moving that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £100,000. The Secretary to the Treasury had very truly told the Committee that this matter had been fought out over and over again in the House of Commons ; but he need hardly point out that no impression was ever produced upon the Government until questions had been fought out a great number of times ; and that if opposition to these Votes had not been successful in the past it was because they had not been fought out enough. However, he assured the hon. Gentleman that they would endeavour to avoid this in future. The question was one which would excite a great deal of interest in the country ; and if, up to the present time, that had not been the case, it was because the accounts were so kept, and the debates upon the Estimates so timed, that the country at large did not perceive the extent of the taxation which was really being gathered from them. In his opinion, these Votes should be opposed, not merely because they were unjust to the country districts, but because they were also demoralizing to the people of London ; for which reasons he should raise the question whenever he had the opportunity.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That a sum, not exceeding £252,800, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for contribution towards the Expenses of the Metropolitan Police, and of the Horse Patrol and Thames Police, and for the Salaries of the Commissioner, Assistant Commissioners, and Receiver."—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON quite understood the point of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) in the last Vote, but could not understand it in this. The present Vote stood in almost the identical position as the Votes for police in the different localities of the country, which were supplemented in aid of those localities by a grant made in each case of half-pay and clothing of the Force, and that, up to last year, was practically the mode in which it was assessed in the Metropolitan. The rates, as the hon. Member was aware, might be called upon up to 9d. in the pound, which was the limit under the Act. Of this amount, 5d. in the pound was raised on the rates of the Metropolitan, and the remainder made up by Government. This change, which took place about 14 months ago, was in lieu of half-pay and clothing ; because, during the three previous years, it had been found that the charge amounted, on an average, to 4d. in the pound. Besides this, the amount of trouble saved in fixing the proportion was so great that his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary agreed to the suggestion of a 4d. rate as a fixed sum, which, on several occasions, was found to be practically below the amount contributed when the old "half-pay and clothing" system was in force. The rate of 4d. was, therefore, substituted in London for the contribution of half-pay and clothing. This matter was purely one of account. The fixed sum had saved an enormous amount of trouble in the Department of the Secretary of State for Home Affairs.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, not wishing to give any unnecessary trouble, asked leave to withdraw his Amendment, in view of the perfectly satisfactory explanation of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury. He had been under the impression that a larger proportion was given to the police in London than to those in the country districts.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked, what proportion of the rate was paid by the Imperial Exchequer for the police in the country districts? As a London ratepayer of 30 years standing, he thought that body were badly treated; and he would like to know why the Treasury had fixed their contribution at more than one-half the amount allowed by the Act?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped to make this plain to hon. Members. As he had before stated, there was an Act under which the Metropolitan Police were organized, and which fixed a 9*d.* rate as the largest amount which could be levied in any one year for the police in the whole Metropolis. When the first subvention was made, it was for one quarter pay and clothing of the Police Force throughout the country, and the localities had exactly the same as the Metropolis. More recently, in 1874-5, the subvention was raised from one-fourth to one-half; and the amount, as he had previously stated, in different years, came at one time to 4*d.* and a fraction, at another to 4½*d.*, and at another to less than 4*d.* But the accounting was so complicated, and the constant checking of these accounts was so great an addition to the labours of the Department, that he had suggested to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to discard the fractions, and fix the sum of 4*d.* in the pound as the amount of contribution to the Metropolitan Police which, with the 5*d.* to be raised from the rates, completed the amount which could be levied under the Act.

MR. RYLANDS considered the arrangement altogether inconvenient and unsatisfactory. He would take the case of Birmingham, Liverpool, or any other large town. The Corporations of these towns had to lay before the Secretary of State for the Home Department a statement of the number of their police force, and of the actual expenditure upon that force; if the expenditure did not, on any ground whatever, appear satisfactory to the Home Office, if the force were kept down to too low a number, or if there were any other circumstance in the management of the force which, in the opinion of the Home Office was not satisfactory, they would intimate that the subvention would be withdrawn.

6... in the Metropolis there seemed to be an extraordinary arrangement in operation. It was, he presumed, under the Act of Parliament that in the Metropolis the amount of rating for police purposes must not exceed 9*d.* in the pound. In accordance, then, with this, the Metropolitan authorities, having power to levy the sum of 9*d.* in the pound, proceeded at once to spend up to it.

Go.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON reminded the hon. Member that it was not the Metropolitan authorities who did this. The whole Metropolis was, in this respect, under the management of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who satisfied himself as to the expenditure on the Police Force and its efficiency.

MR. RYLANDS understood that the Home Office had the control of the Force, and could levy upon the Metropolis a sum, not exceeding 9*d.* in the pound, for its support. Presuming this amount to be sufficient, then, considering that at the present moment the London Police Force was costing a sum equal to 9*d.* in the pound, and that the subvention amounted to only 4*d.* in the pound—it would seem that the London Force was not subventioned by a sum equal to the subvention of half the Expenditure granted to police forces in other parts of the Kingdom. Was that so? If not, he could not understand the case.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON would endeavour to explain. The 9*d.* in the pound was the amount which, under the Act of Parliament, could be levied; but if the Secretary of State for the Home Department found that an increase of the Police Force was necessary, and that the expenditure went beyond this amount, he would come to the House for their sanction to another Act, or would ask to be allowed to increase the rate. Hitherto, this amount had been sufficient; but he could assure the hon. Member that it was only sufficient for the requirements of the Metropolis. The 4*d.* in the pound for the subvention to the Metropolis was, as he had already pointed out, the exact equivalent proportion of the amount given by Government to the different localities, on their representing what had been the expenditure upon their police forces every year.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY contended that this was a great injustice. Instead of the Imperial Treasury contributing 9*d.*, they only contributed 4*d.* in the pound; from which it was clear that they only supplied one-half of the proper amount.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON pointed out that exactly the same proportion paid in the Metropolis was paid in the different localities. The one-half referred to by the hon. Member was the one-half pay and clothing.

MR. PARNELL was disposed to think that one of the reasons why it had been found necessary to supplement the Metropolitan expenditure for police out of the Imperial Revenue was that a sort of fancy police force was kept up in the Metropolis. It was found that whenever police were wanted for fancy purposes in the country—such as for the Derby—the Metropolitan Police Force, like the band of the Guards, were at once called into requisition and sent down at the expense of the Imperial Exchequer. ["No, no!"] His contention was perfectly true—that a very large proportion of the cost of the police, when the Metropolitan Police were sent to such places as he had referred to, fell upon the Imperial Exchequer. It would be a very useful thing to find out how much per 1,000 of population in each of the cities—say, of London, Birmingham, Edinburgh, Manchester, and Liverpool—it cost to maintain the police force; for he was sure it would be found that the cost of the police force of London, as well as that of Dublin—where a similar city force existed in an intensified form—greatly exceeded per 1,000 of population the cost in the other cities and towns throughout the country. He fancied it would be found that the cost of the police forces paid out of local resources in Birmingham and Manchester was probably not more than one-half, as compared with the population in London and Dublin. Before this Vote came on next year, he thought it would be exceedingly useful if some hon. Member would move for a Return, in a tabulated form, of the cost per unit of the population, for the police in the Cities of London and Dublin.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(14.) £890,148, to complete the sum for Police, Counties and Boroughs (Great Britain).

MR. DODSON wished to have some explanation with regard to this Vote.

The Committee was aware that the grant-in-aid of pay and clothing for the police in counties and boroughs was, in the first year of Office of the present Government, increased from one-quarter to one-half, and that during the few years which had elapsed since that time the amount had very nearly trebled. The grant-in-aid, which in the year previous to their taking Office amounted to £322,000 for all the counties and boroughs of Great Britain, was estimated for the present year at nearly £900,000. And this could be accounted for neither by the increase in the number of men, nor by the number of the forces certificated to be efficient. In the case of the English counties the grant-in-aid, although it was not shown by the present Estimate, had increased by nearly £220,000—that was to say, it was, in 1873, £162,000; while for the year ending September, 1878, according to the Local Taxation Returns, it amounted to £381,000. At the same time, it was obvious that the increase in the number of men during the time named entirely failed to account for the great addition to the expenditure, and to that fact he desired to call the attention of the Government. Again, while the grant-in-aid of the English counties had increased by £220,000, the police rate in those counties had only been diminished by the sum of £50,000; and it was, therefore, clear that the increased aid given to the counties must have had the effect of stimulating expenditure by lessening the burdens on the localities, and making the authorities more indifferent to them. He would remind the Committee and the Government that when it was proposed to increase the grants-in-aid of the police in the counties and boroughs from one-fourth to one-half of the pay and clothing, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had on the 16th of April, 1874, introduced the change as a merely temporary arrangement, saying—

"We intend, therefore, to make proposals with regard to the relief of Local Taxation in the present year. They must be regarded not as absolutely final, but as proposals which we think will meet the present emergency, and will, to a great extent, facilitate what we may have to do hereafter."—[3 Hansard, ccxviii. 657.]

This was said after adverting to the proposal to surrender an Imperial tax to local authorities, and observing that it was worthy of consideration, but too complicated for a new Government to attempt. Again, upon the same subject, he said—

"Having dwelt . . . upon the question of Local Taxation, I have only to say that it is a matter which will continue to engage our attention with reference, not only to the question of burdens, but to the further very important question as to the improvement of administration."

He (Mr. Dodson) presumed that was said in contemplation of County Boards or municipal institutions for the counties. And, further, the Chancellor of the Exchequer went on to say—

"And the possible necessity of altering the present system and of devoting some branch of general Revenue for local purposes."—[Ibid., 661.]

It was, of course, obvious, without expressing any definite opinion as to the merits of the scheme, that it was one which the Government intended to consider; and he thought it would, at all events, have this merit—namely, that the localities would be the managers and controllers of their own funds, and have a direct interest in economy. But under the present system of grants-in-aid the stimulus to economy was distinctly lessened, because they could dip their hands into the pocket of the Treasury and obtain relief in proportion to their expenditure. An attempt had been made last year by the Home Secretary to put some check upon the increase of the Vote; but it would be observed that the Vote went on increasing year by year. He would suggest to the Committee that if the Government were going to continue this system of grants-in-aid in proportion to the expenditure which the localities chose to incur, they should avail themselves of the control which the giving of these grants ought to confer for pressing upon the localities the importance of what he ventured to call "local centralization," in order to get rid, as far as possible, of the very small police forces existing throughout Great Britain. He felt that the Government must be desirous of arriving at that result within just and reasonable limits; and he was willing to admit that, to a certain extent, they had succeeded in carrying out the plan, although much remained to be done. There were in Great Britain, at the present time, between 200 and 300 different armies of police which, in some cases, consisted of only one man, and in others numbered up to 500 or 600. It was perfectly obvious that such a number of small forces was attended with many great drawbacks, and he was sure the Home Office must be perfectly aware of them. There was a great disadvantage in these small forces, both in point of efficiency and expense. He was not arguing in favour of a Central Police Force throughout the country, but for getting rid of these small armies, and amalgamating them with their neighbours in the counties or larger boroughs; and he maintained that since the Government had changed the system of grants-in-aid they should use the authority which the giving of such grants allowed them in dealing with the local authorities, to press upon them the advantage and necessity of this kind of amalgamation. He trusted the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department, would be able to furnish some satisfactory explanation respecting the increase of this grant.

Mr. WHITWELL could not agree with what had fallen from the right hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson) in his wish to abolish all the police officers of the local boroughs in the country; because he had seen and tabulated, to a great extent, the large increase that had immediately followed the annexation of small and larger boroughs to the system which had been adopted by the Home Office of subsidizing the establishment the moment it came under their power. Among a number of cases he was acquainted with was one where the establishment of the eight men who were quite sufficient to do the work of the place had to be raised to 12 before the Government would give them the grant. He remembered that in the first year after the Chancellor of the Exchequer adopted, under pressure, a system of granting half-contribution or subsidy, both he and the First Lord of the Admiralty, then sitting as Treasury Secretary, promised the Committee most faithfully, in the autumn of that year, to see if something could not be done to prevent such increases.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, having made himself acquainted in the course of several years with this subject, desired to say a few words with reference to it. He admitted that in the last few years the number of police had increased; and it could not be doubted that the expenditure had also increased, in a proportion greater than the increase in the number of men; but this was due to the increased precautions which became necessary, by the people in the country being brought together at centres, necessitating additional men, as well as to the increase in the cost of wages and clothing which had taken place during the last few years. Before the grants-in-aid were increased, there had been rather a tendency to diminish the standing of the forces in different parts of the country; but the system afterwards set up, at his suggestion, gave the Secretary of State for the Home Department control of the numbers of the men, and, by keeping them in check, increased their efficiency. One force gave larger wages than the other forces in the neighbourhood; and it was for the purpose of bringing the different forces into something like harmony that the Secretary of State had adopted the present system. He believed that the system was still working well; but he could not hold out any hope that any great diminution in the force would result. The tendency in some districts was to ask for an increase to the force from the fact that they were becoming large commercial centres. While he was at the Home Office, a number of applications came to him from the Northern districts; and it was stated that it was absolutely necessary, for the maintenance of order in those districts, that the force should be increased. He believed that that increase was still going on. He was sure that his right hon. Friends at the Home Office were keeping the expenditure in check; but if they could once bring about an amalgamation of the small forces with the large ones, a plan supported by the Inspectors, they would produce greater efficiency, and, at the same time, greater economy in the management of the force throughout the country. As pointed out by the right hon. Member for Chester, the difficulty had always been that in small boroughs they preferred to keep their own two or three men, with, perhaps, two or three officers, rather than become parts of a central force, whereby economy in the matter of officers would be enormous. But it was found that these small places preferred to keep their little dignity of a police force, and in one borough—that of St. Ives—they actually had a force consisting of one policeman.

Mr. Dodson

MR. DODSON observed, that the additional expenditure on the Police Force was ascribed by the Secretary to the Treasury partly to the increased pay of the men and partly to the increase in the cost of clothing. He might remind his hon. Friend that although the grant had increased the cost of clothing had diminished, and, therefore, the increase was not due to that cause. With respect to the rise in wages, that could not be the reason for the additional expenditure; because, if there was an increase in one direction, the decrease in the cost of clothing would counterbalance that. The explanation which had been given did not at all meet the case of the English counties. The grant-in-aid of the English counties, in 1873, was one-fourth of the pay and clothing, and amounted to £162,000. From the local taxation Returns, it appeared that in 1871 the grant was £381,000. Thus the grant had more than doubled. But in that time the increase in the number of men and the increase in wages would not account for the additional expenditure. He should like to know whether it was to be understood, from what had been said, or from the silence of his hon. Friend, that the system of grant-in-aid, which was originally proposed only as a stop-gap, was to be looked upon now as having been adopted permanently? He should like to know whether it was seriously intended to allow the local authorities to continue to control their own expenditure, and to claim a grant in proportion to that expenditure, and whether the notion of the surrender of an Imperial tax was definitely abandoned?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that he could not be expected to go into the whole question of local taxation, nor did he think that that was the proper place to do so. At the same time, he was perfectly willing to state his own individual opinion with regard to local taxation; and he might say that he hoped to see the day when, instead of subventions-in-aid, many matters might be handed over entirely to the local authorities. He did not, however, say that the question of a police force was one that should be handed over to the local authorities, or that it was a matter in which the control should be given over to the local authorities. It must be remembered that the maintenance of a police force was a matter of national concern; and it should not be forgotten that, besides the local authorities, the whole country was interested in the proper maintenance and efficiency of the police force. If the subventions in aid of the police were to be discontinued, and the control of each division left to its particular locality, in many places, such as he had mentioned, where one single policeman was kept, a very insufficient number of policemen might be maintained, and the proper regulation and efficiency of the force might be very seriously impaired.

MR. RAMSAY thought that the right hon. Gentleman had done good service by drawing attention to this subject. He did not agree in thinking that the consolidation of the police forces of the small boroughs with the counties was desirable, or could be easily attained in England, because of the fact that the small boroughs might object; and even if it could be done, he thought it would be better that each separate rating area should have the control of the expenditure upon the police within its bounds. As respected the amount of this grant, in his opinion it would continue to increase unless some step was taken by the Government to prevent it. His reason for so thinking was the experience of the past few years. These grants were always increasing, and would continue to increase. They had increased by the amount of £17,000 in one year, and his opinion was that Her Majesty's Government should consider the expediency of making an alteration in the present arrangements, though it was possible, with the present Parliament, that that would be a hopeless task. The principle upon which the grants were given to the local authorities might be just; but unless the local authorities had the local control and responsibility, they lost more than they gained by means of the grant. He greatly deprecated the increase of these grants, for he did not see that there was any corresponding advantage to the country. The loss of local administration and control was of greater importance than the sum that the counties and boroughs obtained by way of grant. In short, it would be better for the State to do away with the grants altogether, than to continue them in the present form. There was no advantage to the ratepayers in receiving a grant-in-aid, when the cost of the police was continually increasing; for it must be remembered that the ratepayers in counties and boroughs were also taxpayers to the Imperial Exchequer, and, by receiving the grant, they had to pay more money, without securing any control by the local authorities in carrying out the expenditure. As he had said, the loss of local administration and control was much greater than the gain. The local expenditure was sure to be greater when the grants-in-aid were received than it would be if the sum required were wholly levied in the localities, and was under their control. It was to this end he wished to make these remarks—to suggest to Her Majesty's Government that they should consider the expediency of revising the policy adopted upon this subject. He thought that great good would be done if the Government would make known its intention that no increase would be allowed on the grants beyond the sum that had been received by the different localities during the past few years. He could see no advantage in going on with this indefinite annual increase, which, he should contend, gave no corresponding advantage to the country.

MR. RYLANDS wished to call attention to the fact that the grant given in aid of the police force in counties and boroughs during the last year was £890,914. During that period £452,000 was granted in aid of the police force of the Metropolis alone. Why London alone should be relieved of its taxation to about one-half of the total grant he could not understand, and it seemed to him to be a matter worthy of attention. It did seem that the grant and the subventions to London were very much in excess of the sum granted to the other parts of the country. Probably that arose from the greater number of the police force, and the greater extent in proportion to the population. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson) had referred to the gradual increase of the subvention; and he was bound to say that he looked upon this enormous increase as being a very serious matter. From his experience in the management of local affairs, he was quite sure that these subventions had a tendency to do away with the desire for economy on the part of the magistrates and the members of town councils; and he thought that it was one of the most unfortunate circumstances that local administrations all over the country should show their willingness, from time to time, to accept from the Government for the time being bribes to relinquish their local administration and their local control. He did not, for one moment, wish to make any charge against the present Government, for his observations applied equally to former ones. He considered it was a most serious mistake on the part of the localities to give up the management of their public business in return for Government subventions. He did not attribute this action to the occupants of the Treasury Bench, or to any of the Gentlemen who were now carrying out this policy in Parliament, so much as to the permanent officials of the public Offices. Hon. Gentlemen would know that the permanent officials of public Departments were always pressing forward every system of centralization which gave the Department greater power over localities. Of course, that power could not be obtained unless they were prepared to give money as a bribe for the relinquishment of local administration. He objected altogether to that system, because he believed it was contrary to the public interest. He had no doubt at all that the system was very much opposed to economy; and he should be very glad to see public opinion out-of-doors brought to bear upon Members of that House in order to put a stop to the system. He was quite aware that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in a speech made a short time ago, justified the policy of giving these subventions to the local authorities, by saying that at least, so far as they were a charge upon property, it was only taking money out of one pocket and putting it into the other. He altogether disputed that proposition. In the first place, they took the money out of one pocket—a considerable amount when everything was reckoned—but it was not put into the other pocket, for the local expenditure was not diminished to an equal extent. But it should be remembered that the incidence of local taxation was very different to that of Imperial taxation. By these subventions in aid of local objects, property, upon which local expenditure was charged, was relieved, and the charge put upon the Exchequer was levied, to a considerable extent, upon the consumers of articles paying duty. Putting the charge upon the Imperial Exchequer was, in fact, levying it upon people of no property to the relief of some of the burdens of property. It did not appear to him that that was taking the money out of one pocket and putting it into another. These grants were being continually made, until the sum total of them swelled up to a very large expenditure, and local control and management was entirely done away with. At the same time, they formed a very considerable burden upon the taxpayers of the country. This was a most dangerous course to pursue upon the part of the Government, for it was increasing the expense of the central authority by increasing the general expense, and by relieving local rates. He thought that the only practical course for the House to pursue was to resist any measures which would increase this system; and he should be glad to see any practical scheme, either in the way which had been suggested, or by any other means, by which this expenditure should be prevented from increasing year by year.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbotson

Mr. STEVENSON observed, that the excuse for these grants was that they were to enable the Government to have some control over the efficiency of the police forces in the different parts of the country. The proportion of general aid to local expenditure was first one-third, then one-fourth, and now had increased to one-half. This increase necessarily increased the influence of the Government Inspectors. When the population increased, additional police were put on contrary to the judgment of the local authorities, because the Government had prescribed a certain number of policemen according to the population. That was one objection to the control being taken from the local authorities. A Bill had lately been brought in dealing with loans to local authorities so as to diminish the facilities for borrowing, and to prevent local authorities being led into an extravagant expenditure which they would not otherwise have thought of. The reason alleged for the Public Works Loan Bill was that local taxation required to be checked. If it were desired to check local expenditure, nothing better could be done than abolishing these grants-in-aid. In his opinion, the whole policy on this matter required alteration re-consideration.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON protested against this being taken as an opportunity for entering into a local taxation debate. They were dealing simply with the Vote by which sums were granted in aid of local expenditure, and, in so doing, they were carrying out the decision of that House, not in that Parliament, but come to by a large majority of that House in the previous Parliament. This Vote was simply in pursuance of that decision. Of course, it was quite open to hon. Members to propose to reverse that policy by means of a Motion in that House, but not otherwise. The question of the police in the districts, and the question of local taxation generally, were quite distinct. An hon. Member had insisted that the Home Office had laid down a hard-and-fast line with regard to increasing the police according to the number of the population. So far as his knowledge went, there was no such regulation at all, nor was there any rule of any kind with regard to the number of the police. All that the Inspectors of police had to do was to inspect the force, and to see that it was properly conducted, and sufficient for the maintenance of order. From his own knowledge, he could assert that the localities were allowed to manage their own police, and that the matter was almost entirely left to them. He could give instances where the force was not sufficient for the maintenance of order, and the districts in which that happened were those which maintained their own police force, independent of inspection, and without taking the Government grant. Moreover, those districts were not officered as they ought to be when the necessity for a proper regulation of crime in the country generally was regarded. He had always advocated, and still advocated, an amalgamation of the small police forces; for, however much the maintenance of a very small force might gratify the vanity of particular districts, they did not conduce to the public good.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR, having paid great attention to this subject, would like to make some observations with regard to it. The expenditure upon the police force had been gradually increasing, and in 14 or 15 years it had risen by no less a sum than £274,000. In 1878-9 the expenditure was £871,000; this year it amounted to £891,000. These figures showed—and he had no hesitation in affirming—that there was absolutely no control over the police force. The figures showed that there was a gradually increasing expenditure throughout the country for the police force. Even in his own economical country—Scotland—the cost of pay and clothing was increasing, although it did not keep pace with the increase in England. He wished to press upon the Secretary of State for the Home Department that, in order to exercise a proper control over the expenditure, it was necessary to pay attention to the details, and look minutely into the numbers and pay of the police. In his opinion, the best plan was to abolish the grant-in-aid, and to give up the tax which was collected in counties. No proper control could be obtained over the expenditure until the whole management of the matter was left in the hands of the different localities.

MR. PARNELL said, that he could not assent to the doctrine of the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury, that this discussion was improper, when it had not been ruled out of Order. At the beginning of the Session the Government stated, when they took facilities for the discussion of the Estimates, that their chief reason for doing so was to give hon. Members more opportunity of discussing the Estimates. But now the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury informed them that they ought not to discuss the Estimates, except in such a way as he laid down. He thought that the hon. Gentleman was departing somewhat from his usual humble and kindly role, in assuming such a tone as that. He submitted that nothing in that debate had been out of Order, and since it had been in Order, it was not competent for him to use his high authority and position in trying to check a free debate. There were many questions which ought to be discussed; and now the Government had given them greater opportunities for discussion, he pledged himself, when the Irish Estimates were reached, to use those facilities to the fullest extent, whether the Government liked it or not. He hoped that the Secretary to the Treasury would not forget his character of humbleness in talking to them.

Mr. Stevenson

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON remarked, that he had no desire to prevent any hon. Member from discussing any part of the Estimates, and he was sorry that it should be thought that he had been discourteous in what he had said. All he wished to do was to remind hon. Members that they were not discussing local taxation generally, although the police force was a part of the question. If it were necessary to raise a discussion upon the policy of the Government in carrying out a system affirmed by a majority in the last Parliament, then what he said was that he hardly thought that was the proper time to raise that discussion. He protested against so raising a discussion as to relieving local taxation upon a Vote which affected only a part of the subject. He was very sorry if it should be thought that he had been discourteous, and he might say that he never intended to threaten any Member.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, that, so far as his experience went, the present system of the police was very useful and very proper. At any rate, all who came into contact with the police force must confess that the present system was a great improvement upon the former one. The police were something like a local army in the country, and were kept up for the benefit of the nation, and he believed that the expense of the police should be contributed to by everyone. For that reason, he should support the present system. In Ireland a constabulary force was kept up by Imperial funds; and that seemed to him to be very proper at present.

MR. RAMSAY wished to explain that he did not feel that the Secretary to the Treasury intended his remarks to apply to the few observations which he had addressed to the Committee. The point at which he aimed was that Her Majesty's Government should insist upon making the amount which was now given in aid of the police the maximum. He would press upon Her Majesty's Ministers that they would consider the expediency of making the average of the grants that had been given to the several cities, counties, and boroughs during the past four years the maximum amount of the subventions. In that way they would prevent discussions, such as had arisen on the present occasion in consequence of the enormous increase in the grant. It would be an advantage to the community to know that the great annual increase in this direction had stopped.

MR. MUNTZ objected altogether to Imperial grants in aid of local rates. He did not think that a greater mistake could be committed by the Legislature than this system of giving grants for the encouragement of local extravagance. For many years he had wished to see the system abolished; and he thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Ramsay) was quite right in suggesting that the present grant ought to be the maximum. So long as the grant was continued in its present form the local authorities were encouraged in extravagance; and the more money they had the more they endeavoured to spend. He thought that the effect of centralization in increasing taxation was a matter that ought to be considered by the House.

MR. CLARE READ thought that one of the great reasons for the increase in the amount of the Vote of which so many hon. Members had complained was the competition which went on, in so many instances, among the rural authorities, and that blame in the matter could not fairly be attributed to the action of the Government. Wherever there was a wealthy borough in a county the desire appeared to be to provide it with as many constables as possible; and it was to that cause, and the great increase in the rate of wages, that the augmentation of the Vote was, in his opinion, due.

MR. SULLIVAN would remind the Committee that in Ireland Governments seemed somehow or another always to contrive matters so as to create anomalies more absurd than those which existed in any other part of the Empire. In Dublin, for instance, there was a police force which was not managed by the municipality and which yet had to be paid for out of the local rates.

Vote agreed to.

(15.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £359,126, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the superintendence of Convict Establishments, and for the Maintenance of Convicts in Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies."

MR. PARNELL said, he thought the Government ought to consent to the postponement of the Vote until the Report had been laid on the Table of the Royal Commission which had been appointed to inquire into the condition of convict establishments, and which he understood intended to propose certain plans with regard to their future management. Last Session, or rather the Session before, the question of convict establishments had been brought under the notice of the House, and a Commission had been appointed for the purpose of inquiring whether some system of inspection over them would not be advisable, as well as in the case of the borough and county prisons, which were placed on an entirely different footing. The county and borough gaols were originally very much under the direction of the magistrates; and although the Act of 1877 destroyed, to a great extent, the power and functions of the visiting Justices, it still left them a certain amount of authority, and gave them certain facilities for looking after their management. But the convict establishments, which were the outcome of the system of transportation, had been introduced into England when it was found that the Colonies would no longer consent to receive our criminal population. Those establishments were new things; nobody was interested in them. They were not like the borough prisons, which had grown up with the growth of local institutions in England. They were ingrafted on the prison system of the country hastily, with little or no preparation, and with scarcely any safeguards or facilities for local inspection. Hence they were very much shut out from the light of day, and it was almost impossible to investigate any case, of which one might from time to time hear, because every one of the functionaries, from the highest to the lowest, were mixed up in a conspiracy for the purpose of protecting the present system. There was no independent inspection whatever; and it was because that state of things had been pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in reply to a Motion which had been brought forward, had promised that a Royal Commission should be issued to inquire into the whole question of the management and discipline of those establishments. That Commission had been appointed shortly afterwards, and had prosecuted its labours during the Session of 1878. Those labours, he was given to understand, were almost, if not entirely, concluded, and the Report of the Commission would soon be ready to be produced. He thought, therefore, that, taking into account the long time which had elapsed since there had been any discussion on the question, it would be desirable that the Vote should be postponed until hon. Members had the opportunity afforded them of making themselves acquainted with the nature of that Report. He wished, he might add, to bear his humble testimony to the very great service which had been rendered by the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) as a Member of the Commission. He had heard from many sources in Ireland that the hon. Baronet had taken the greatest pains in the conduct of the inquiry to investigate the condition of the convict establishments in that country, which were rather worse than the general run of those institutions. He was, therefore, thankful to him for the manner in which he had discharged a difficult and responsible duty. He would conclude by appealing again to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who, he believed, fully recognized the importance of the question, to consent to the postponement of the Vote.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS could assure the hon. Gentleman that he had but one object in dealing with the establishments to which his remarks related, and that was that justice should be done, and that no punishment should be inflicted in the prisons of the country except such as was absolutely necessary. The hon. Gentleman might rely upon it that whenever the Report of the Commission was made it would, if it contained any suggestion for the improvement of the management of those establishments, receive the best attention of the Government. He hoped, however, the hon. Gentleman would not press for the postponement of the Vote, or if he did so that the Committee would not sanction the proposal, for it was necessary that the salaries of the officers should be paid, and the cost of the maintenance of the prisons defrayed, otherwise the system must come to an end. The only object of appointing a Commission to inquire into the subject was that the system of penal servitude, which had been substituted for transportation, should be thoroughly investigated in all its bearings, in order to see whether discipline was fully and properly carried out, and to ascertain the relative results of penal servitude and what, as contrasted with it, was called imprisonment. No hon. Member would, he thought, believe that systematic cruelty was practised in our convict prisons; and he could only repeat that if the Report of the Commission showed that any improvement was needed, not a single day should be lost in giving effect to any recommendation upon which the Government might deem it expedient to act.

Mr. HIBBERT said, that, however severe the convict system might be, there were many prisoners who did not look upon penal servitude as being so severe a punishment as imprisonment for long periods. In two instances which had come within his own knowledge, when presiding at Quarter Sessions within the last two years, one prisoner who had been sentenced to two years, and another to 18 months' imprisonment, had begged, in the most earnest manner, to be sentenced to penal servitude instead. It was clear, therefore, that however severe penal servitude might be—and he did not mean to contend that it was not a very severe punishment, or that the law with respect to it did not require amendment—criminals did not regard it as being more severe than imprisonment, at least in some cases.

Mr. COLE said, the question which had been adverted to in the course of the discussion was one with regard to which he had entertained a very strong opinion for some years past. He had occupied the position of Recorder for many years, and one of the greatest difficulties which he had experienced in the discharge of the duties of that office was the awarding the proper amounts of punishment for the offences which he had to try. It often happened that a prisoner who was brought before him was convicted of some small crime. He might have previously undergone a short period of imprisonment, also for a small offence, and there was his former conviction staring the Judge in the face. What was he, in these circumstances, to do? To pronounce a sentence of penal servitude for the full period of seven years was to inflict a terrible punishment, yet there was no power to give a less period. Those who were practically acquainted with the subject were also aware that two years' imprisonment was a terrible punishment. It had been frequently known to have driven those upon whom it had been inflicted to insanity. Yet, in many of the cases which came before him, the only alternative was between imprisonment for 18 months or two years, or a sentence to five years' penal servitude for a first offence, and seven if there was a prior conviction. The alteration in the law which was made some years ago, and which took away from Judges the power of passing sentences of three years' penal servitude, was, in his opinion, greatly to be regretted. Why, he would ask, should not that power be restored? He was anxious to impress upon the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in the strongest way he could, the necessity of making the change. He had not long ago the pleasure of a conversation with a learned friend of his who, perhaps, tried more prisoners during the year than any Judge in the Kingdom—as many as 150 prisoners every session (except sessions being held annually)—and he, as the result of his great experience, had informed him that the difficulty of duly apportioning punishments under the present state of the law was one of the greatest with which he had to deal. The gentleman to whom he referred was the Recorder of Liverpool, who had authorized him to express, if ever he spoke upon the subject in that House, his strong feeling that the law ought to be altered. He hoped, therefore, that the Home Secretary would feel it to be consistent with his duty to accept an Amendment which he intended to propose in the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill, giving the power to Judges to pass a sentence of three years' penal servitude.

Mr. HOPWOOD said, the question was one of great interest, and that he, to a great extent, concurred in the observations which had been made by his hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down as to the expediency of enabling Judges to pass sentences of penal servitude for a shorter period than five years. But leaving that point, he should like to know what prospect there was of some adequate system of inspection being brought to bear upon our great convict establishments? Were those great, solemn establishments, with their lofty walls and barred doors, to be altogether shut out from the view of the general public? What he wanted was that there should be somebody, on the part of the public, to look into them, and to see what was the mode of life and the position of their unfortunate inmates. He, for one, regretted that the power of the Visiting Justices had been almost destroyed, and he hoped to see their authority resuscitated and re-invigorated, so that, as far as possible, there might be a constant system of inspection of those institutions. There was another point connected with the subject which he was anxious to bring under the notice of the Secretary of State, although he had no doubt it was one which was frequently present to his mind. It was well, however, that it should be mentioned in that House, in order that it might be discussed, for the discussion might bear fruit in the future. We had, in those immense establishments of which he was speaking, a certain number of criminals who were doomed to undergo different periods of penal servitude. He was aware that the humane, and he believed the necessary, mode of administering the law required that those criminals should be afforded the hope that part of their term of punishment might be remitted. He did not wish, he might add, to raise too many doubts with regard to the administration of justice; but he must say that more than once or twice or three times in the course of his life he had felt convinced that a man had been made to undergo a term of penal servitude to which, though innocent, he was condemned. There was, of course, a great deal of difficulty in dealing with such case, and he knew very well how readily the Secretary of State, and his Predecessors in Office, had responded to any appeal made to them to entertain and consider cases of the kind; but then it should be borne in mind that, in some instances, the necessary money was wanting to bring forward evidence; or death, perhaps, had removed some of the witnesses, or the Judge who tried the case; the result being that the wretched convict was left to endure his long period of unmerited punishment. That being so, would it not be possible, he would ask, to have an inspection of those prisons, and a review of the cases of the prisoners, to see whether or not some of the inmates might not safely be restored to civil life? It would require, no doubt, a high authority, and the possession of a lofty mind and judgment, in order that such a commission might be properly discharged; but, in the great majority of cases, the Judge who tried a prisoner could be appealed to; he could be asked to refer to his notes, and asked to give his opinion on the case; and, in that way, all the necessary precautions might be taken, and a proper amount of care bestowed upon each case as it arose. And, though caution was necessary in restoring convicts to civil life, he believed there were eminent authorities in the management of convict prisons in whose opinion at least one-third of the prisoners who were confined in them need not be detained there. Was not that a matter worthy of consideration? Was it not a terrible burden on our consciences that all this mass of human degradation should be maintained at the public expense, without any attempt being made to find out whether among the many cases there were not some of those convicts who might, without injury to society, be restored to it, and whether there were not some who had been innocently condemned? Was not the House of Commons incurring a great moral responsibility by not endeavouring, in regard to such a question, to perform its duty in some degree?

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, there were two points mentioned by the hon. and learned Gentleman in the course of his remarks with respect to which he entirely agreed with him, while there was one on which he differed from him altogether. He was, and had always been, in favour of the independent inspection of convict prisons; and he hoped the Commission would recommend some scheme for the appointment of independent Visitors of all those establishments. He also concurred with the hon. and learned Gentleman in the opinion that there should be, at all events in all serious cases, the most ample opportunity given to a man who was wrongly condemned to have a new trial. The most suitable time, however, to deal with that question would be when the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill came on for discussion. But he would beg to remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that a man who had been convicted of a crime could always appeal to the Home Secretary without expense, and that no Home Secretary would be worthy to hold the Office if he did not most carefully investigate those cases which were brought before him. The point on which he differed from the hon. and learned Gentleman—and he did so most absolutely and entirely—was the expediency of sending a roving Commission all over the country to see how many offenders who had been properly convicted and sentenced to penal servitude might be again turned loose upon society. With such safeguards as he had mentioned against allowing an innocent man to suffer, it would be most unwise, in his opinion, that there should be any uncertainty as to a sentence being carried out after it had been passed.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON was sorry the right hon. Gentleman had not deferred his remarks for a few moments, because he was desirous of having a discussion on a matter which he had very much at heart—he meant the question of industrial labour in prisons. No doubt, the present system was a great improvement on that which formerly existed, when the course adopted with regard to prisoners assumed more of the character of retribution. But the great difficulty was how far it was possible to try to reform a criminal inside the walls of a prison without injuring the honest man outside. Now, he was afraid that in the endeavour to reform the offender they had, to an undue extent, interfered with the well-being of the honest man. ["No, No!"] The hon. Member who cried "No, no" was not, perhaps, as well acquainted as he was with the details of the subject. He knew that in the prison at Wakefield, and those in other towns in the North of England, trades had been carried on to such a degree as to be exceedingly injurious to the interests of the honest working man. He would mention, especially, the mat and brushmaking trades. Honest respectable men had come to him, and had also gone on deputations to the Home Secretary, who had represented that they had been literally starved out of occupation through the monopoly of what was called prison labour. For that he did not hold the right hon. Gentleman in any way responsible; for he knew he was most anxious to redress, as far as lay in his power, the grievance of which those poor men complained. The right hon. Gentleman had been good enough, when the Prisons Bill was passing through the House, two years ago, to adopt an Amendment which he had moved, in order to form the recital to a clause in that Act, with the view of preventing the unfavourable operation of prison labour in the way which he had just mentioned. He had not very long ago, he might add, put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman, as to what was being done in the matter, and as to the total absence of any allusion to industrial labour in prisons in the Report for last year which had been laid upon the Table of the House. The answer was, that the Report did not at all apply to the present year, and that a Commission was now sitting with the view of redressing any grievance which might be shown to exist. Now, the inquiry would, he hoped, be carried out in a thorough manner. He, for one, was opposed to punishments being inflicted on offenders by way of retribution, or in any spirit of vindictiveness. The proper course was to endeavour to make a convict a better member of society, if possible, by reforming him. He would not, therefore, prohibit industries in gaols. If a prisoner knew a trade, let him follow it, and, if not, let him be taught one; but let not that system, at the same time, be carried out to the prejudice of the honest and respectable citizen who never committed a crime, and who had only his honest labour to depend upon. His attention had lately been called to the fact that there were absolutely tenders made from certain prisons for the manufacture of goods, not for the use of those prisons, or for the benefit of the prisoners, but in order that their work might go into the market and compete with that of the honest labourer outside.

They were seeking to reform the criminal at the expense of the honest working-man, and he protested against that system as one utterly unnecessary and unjust. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether his attention had been called to certain tenders issued from prisons in Lancashire to manufacturers, stating the price at which work could be done for them in the prisons, and whether that rate was one that would undersell the honest working man out of prison? It was a great evil, if such a system was in practice. If the right hon. Gentleman had not seen those tenders, would he make inquiries respecting them, or issue such orders as would prevent those proceedings in the prisons generally?

MR. HIBBERT did not at all agree with what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Serjeant Simon) with respect to prison labour. He held the opinion that the more industrial labour was extended in prisons the better it would be for the prisoners, provided that the trades carried on did not undersell the trades carried on outside. He rose, however, to ask his right hon. Friend for some little explanation about the amount voted for prisoners in convict establishments in the Colonies. There appeared to be one prisoner at Malta, 36 in new South Wales, 195 in Tasmania, described as paupers, lunatics, prisoners, or prisoners' children, costing £60 a-year each, and 225 in Western Australia, costing £100 a-year each, while our own convicts cost £48. He thought that some promise should be given as to when these grants in aid of Colonial convict establishments should cease.

MR. SULLIVAN wished to call attention to a subject referred to by him last year. He reminded the Secretary of State for the Home Department that he had admitted it to be most objectionable that a stipendiary Coroner should be retained for a Government prison; but in page 208 of the Estimates the salary of that officer again appeared. He begged, again, to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to this fact, which had probably escaped his attention.

MR. WHITWELL said, the subject just referred to by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) had also been alluded to by him when the Votes were before the Committee last year. The whole Vote was one which could not be looked upon without a feeling of pain, inasmuch as it dealt with no less than 10,838 unhappy persons under confinement. He proposed to reduce this Vote by the sum of £4,950, being the amount of the cost of maintenance of invalids, lunatics, paupers, pauper children, &c., in Tasmania. He could not see why money should be voted for this purpose to the people of Tasmania. With regard to the Vote in aid of the Colonial magistracy, police gaols, &c., for Tasmania and Western Australia, which latter place had the control and management of the sum of £12,000, although he was perfectly aware that these grants were to expire in 1883, he considered that it was much better that they should be compounded for by the payment of a larger sum at once. The right hon. Gentleman would probably give an answer as to whether this would be done. Another question which he desired to ask was, whether the allowance to the prison officers included superannuation allowance, or whether that would have to be credited to them when the grant ceased?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that, so far as the convict prisons were concerned, the work of mat-making, supposed to be improperly competing with honest labour, had been reduced, and, in many establishments, entirely discontinued. This industry was mainly directed to the supply of Government offices and establishments—which was, of course, perfectly allowable. If the necessity for industrial labour existed, the articles manufactured under the system ought not to be placed on a shelf and allowed to remain; they must be disposed of. His theory had always been, as far as possible, to make use of the labour of prisoners for the benefit of the State; and he was, at that moment, under considerable contracts with the Admiralty, and was endeavouring to get the Army to make contracts with the prisons for clothing, blankets, and matters of that kind. He thought nobody could possibly object to their making what they could for the public service, provided the canon laid down by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) was always followed—namely, that the proper market prices outside were not undersold; and the hon. Member might rely that the principle was not in any way lost sight of. The expenditure on the convict establishments in the Colonies was one which could not be put a stop to in a moment, for the simple reason that the men were there, and so long as they were there the Vote would necessarily continue. The reason why the expenditure was large in comparison with the number of prisoners was that though the latter was rapidly diminishing the same staff must be kept up. Even if the number of prisoners was 50, they would require the same number of men to look after them as if it was 100. Hon. Members would see, by the Report of last year, that the number of prisoners in Western Australia was 350 up to the 31st of December, 1876, and that in December, 1877, they only numbered 275. The latter number comprised prisoners, lunatics, and paupers out of employment. As to Malta and Gibraltar, he found, when he came into Office, that not a farthing was voted, as far as he understood, for Gibraltar; but the Vote of £20,000 for prisons in Malta he could not understand. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: Hear!] His hon. and learned Friend knew all about it. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: No, I want to know.] With regard to the Coroner referred to by the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), he believed this must have been the Coroner who went to Dartmoor last year, and who was then paid by the State. But the hon. and learned Member would see that there was no Vote for this officer in the present Estimate. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury and he were entirely agreed that it was a wrong thing that the Coroner should be paid by the State.

Mr. Serjeant Simon

Mr. WHITWELL asked for information as to the pauper children in the Colonies charged for under the Vote?

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS explained that these were thrown upon the hands of the Government by persons who, having been sent out as convicts, had become insane. Of course, these could not be turned adrift.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY could not understand how this Vote could be postponed until the Report of the Royal Commission was in the hands of hon. Members as had been suggested by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell). He rose for the purpose of asking the Home Secretary when that Report might be expected? With regard to the subject of compensation for punishment undergone by prisoners wrongly condemned, and the discharge of prisoners before the expiration of their sentences, he was of opinion that the more certain punishment was made the more efficacious it would be, and that the only way in which a prisoner should be able to earn a remission of his sentence should be by good conduct. A sentence once pronounced ought, in his view, to be carried out. He would take the opportunity of reminding his hon. and learned Friend of a saying of the late Chief Baron O'Grady. A man, whose trial had been by various means postponed for a period of 18 months, was brought before him and convicted of a discreditable offence. The prisoner pleaded guilty, but brought a strong recommendation from the prison authorities, stating that his conduct had been of much use in the moral education of the other prisoners. The Chief Baron received that testimony with extreme pleasure; it was delightful to find that the prisoner had been so well conducted during confinement, and that circumstance ought to be taken into consideration; but he added—"I think, therefore, that as you are a gentleman who behaves so exceedingly well in prison, and so exceedingly badly out of it, the best thing I can do is to keep you there as long as I can."

SIR HENRY HOLLAND, as one of the Royal Commissioners, stated that the evidence had been closed, and that the consideration of the Report would begin on Friday. He hoped the Report would be presented to Parliament shortly after Whitsuntide.

Mr. MUNDELLA drew attention to the estimated charge for 600 military prisoners, which, according to the footnote on page 205, amounted to £20,000. He could not conceive why this amount appeared under this head; it should have been debited to the War Office.

Mr. PARNELL said, this was the third Session that the Committee had refrained from discussing this Vote, on the ground either that a Royal Commission was about to be appointed, or was taking evidence. He suggested that, as the Report was so very near its presentation, the Committee ought to postpone the Vote until that Report was before the House. The Report would be necessarily a voluminous document, and time was needed to direct the attention of the Home Secretary to those points which were considered of importance, while it would be quite impossible for him to carry out the recommendations of the Committee without undertaking fresh legislation. It therefore followed that the House should have the opportunity of fully considering the Report before it voted the money asked for on the present occasion. With that object, he begged to move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped that the hon. Member would not persist in his Motion to report Progress. The Committee having been through an enormous amount of evidence, their Report would require some time for its consideration; and he absolutely declined to discuss that Report until he had an opportunity of reading the evidence. He trusted the Committee would not provoke discussion upon the Report in a serious manner until the evidence was before the House.

MR. PARNELL wished to point out to the Committee that unless the Home Secretary did something with a view to carry out the recommendations of the Report next Session, he would have no opportunity of doing so at all, because the next Session would be the last of this Parliament. Unless the Committee had an opportunity of discussing this Report partially, at all events, and publicly, during the present Session, legislation thereon could not be rendered a matter of any certainty. It would be very wrong that a serious question, upon which hon. Members had been working hard for a number of years, should be thrust off to another Parliament; because it was a matter of great doubt how many of those hon. Members might be returned at the next Election.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ANDREW LUSK hoped the Home Secretary would offer some facilities to magistrates to grant orders to the friends of prisoners to visit them in prison. It was very distressing to have to refer poor men and women, who wanted to be allowed to see their relations who were undergoing imprisonment, to the Home Department. The stringent regulations of the Secretary of State for the Home Department were a very great hardship upon poor and ignorant people, who still had feelings of affection for their relations, even though in prison; and he trusted that some way would be found to relax them. It was almost impossible for these poor people to reach the Home Secretary at all; and that, in his opinion, was a strong reason for granting some other means for communication between the unhappy prisoners and their friends.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS pointed out that the hon. Member was discussing a subject which was not before the Committee.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON stated, in reply to the question of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), that the military prisoners were formerly charged for under the Army Votes; but that since the prisons had been taken over by the State, the cost was paid out of the Prison Votes.

MR. MUNDELLA maintained that if the accounts were to be kept correctly, the charge for the military prisoners must be debited to the several Departments of the Army and Navy; otherwise the comparative cost of the different Services was erroneously estimated.

MR. HIBBERT said, it was not the fact that this portion of the Vote was dealt with in the sense presented to the House.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.—[BILL 150.]

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Mr. Parnell

MR. NEWDEGATE: Mr. Speaker, the terms of my Amendment to the second reading of this Bill are—

"That this House will not recognize or accept as binding any Treaty or other engagements entered into by Her Majesty's Ministers, which might forestall or limit the control of this House over the financial resources and taxation of this Country, until further information as to such contemplated engagements has been laid upon the Table of this House, and this House shall have had an opportunity of expressing an opinion thereon."

It is due to the House that I should explain why I have ventured thus early to call the attention of hon. Members to the subject of my Motion. It is now 19 years since this important subject was seriously debated in Parliament, and during those 19 years this House has undergone great changes. The number of Members who had seats in the House during the debates of the year 1860 upon the Commercial Treaty with France is very limited; and I find that among the other Members of the House there prevails in a certain degree a misunderstanding of the real position of this House with respect to Commercial Treaties, especially as that position is affected by the announcement of Her Majesty's Government that negotiations are pending for the renewal of the Commercial Treaty with France for six months. That, Sir, seems to be a very limited period; but my experience of the effects of the Treaty of 1860 is such, that I think I am bound immediately to claim the attention of the House before these negotiations proceed further. Sir, the Treaty of 1860—the Commercial Treaty with France—is not an ordinary Commercial Treaty. The Party, who at present sit on this side of the House, felt very strongly in 1860 that, in its substance and in the circumstances under which it was negotiated, the Treaty of 1860 constituted a very wide departure from the only precedent of a Commercial Treaty with France which at that time existed—the Commercial Treaty negotiated by Mr. Pitt in the year 1787. Let me refer for a few moments to the circumstances under which the Treaty of 1860 was negotiated. It was not until the 23rd of December, 1859, that the public became at all aware, far less this House, which was then in Recess, that there was any idea entertained of contracting a Commercial Treaty with France. It then appeared that the late

Mr. Cobden, a distinguished man, but not a Member of Her Majesty's Government, was employed in Paris in negotiating for a Treaty of Commerce directly with the late Emperor of the French, and that he had for some time been in communication with M. Rouher, one of the French Ministers. Lord Cowley, our Ambassador, was informed that such negotiations were going on, and he wrote to the late Lord Russell, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—

"I conclude that your Lordship is aware that Mr. Cobden is unofficially negotiating for a Commercial Treaty between England and France."

The reply of Lord Russell, I believe, confessed that he was aware of the circumstance; but up to or about the 23rd of December, 1859, Lord Cowley, our Ambassador in Paris, knew nothing of it. Lord Cowley concluded his despatch by saying that he could have no feeling of jealousy on the subject, and that he hoped Mr. Cobden would be officially intrusted with the conduct of the negotiations. Immediately upon that, Mr. Cobden was officially employed; and let the House observe, the first information that negotiations were in progress arrived on the 23rd of December, 1859, and upon the 23rd of January, 1860, the Treaty was signed. Parliament met upon the 24th of January, and on the 10th of February the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his Financial Statement, having induced this House to take Ways and Means before Supply, so that he might include in his Budget the substance of the Treaty, so far as it affected the finances of this country. Her Majesty's then Ministers, under the Leadership of Lord Palmerston, had a large majority in this House, and on the 20th of February, in considerably less than two months from the first announcement, this House found itself committed to the substance of the French Treaty, so far as it affected the taxation of this country. These were very rapid and unexpected proceedings. The Conservative Party used every exertion to induce Her Majesty's then Ministers to conform to the precedent of 1787, but without success. When Mr. Pitt undertook to negotiate a Treaty of Commerce with France, how did he proceed? He negotiated the Treaty. He placed it before the commercial public, and so left it for five months before he proposed it to Parliament; and when he proposed it to Parliament, he did not propose at once to incorporate the provisions of the Treaty in the Budget, but asked the consent of each House of Parliament to that Treaty by Resolution. Could there, Sir, be a greater difference between two modes of procedure, than between the mode of procedure adopted by Mr. Pitt, and the mode of procedure adopted by the Government of Lord Palmerston? I know that among the Members of this House, who cannot clearly recollect what occurred in 1860, the idea exists that Parliament has little or nothing to do with Commercial Treaties—that the conclusion of a Commercial Treaty is an affair of the Government, and that Parliamentary consent, if necessary at all, is a mere formality. No Member of this House, Sir, except he be a Member of the Government, acting on behalf of Her Majesty's Ministers, can propose the imposition of any tax, or the increase of any tax; and exactly upon the same principle no Member of this House, unless he be a Member of the Administration, and is authorized by the Government, can negotiate a Treaty, and least of all a Commercial Treaty; because a Commercial Treaty may affect the financial resources of the country for years to come; it may affect, as the Treaty of 1860 affected, and control, as the Treaty of 1860 controlled, the power of taxation, which is vested in this House, not for one year only, but for 10 or 20 years. I will now state to the House why, after the experience we had in 1860 of the secrecy and rapidity with which the last Commercial Treaty was negotiated, I have thought it my duty, on the first intimation that that Treaty is to be continued, renewed, or altered—I believe it is intended that this Treaty is to be altered—to intervene. I have, therefore, thought it my duty to ask the House to affirm that we have not forgotten the functions of the House in reference to this matter, because the House forgot its position in this matter. The conclusion of the Treaty would, to the extent of its provisions, incapacitate this House from performing its function of regulating and granting taxation. This abdication on the part of the House might be for an unlimited period, for any period which it might please the Government to assign as the duration of the Treaty. I have reason, as I will presently show, to remember these circumstances. Under this Treaty the number of articles in the British tariff was reduced from 419 to 48. The duties abolished were almost entirely upon articles, not of necessity, but of luxury. It will be enough to state, in illustration of the sweeping nature of this Treaty, that the total amount of taxation which it either abolished or reduced—mind you, abolished or reduced—not for the year, nor for five years, but during the period of the existence of the Treaty—for 10 years Parliament deprived itself of all control over financial resources which yielded £1,700,000. If these Customs duties had been left, according to the natural increase and growth of Customs duties, they would have yielded more than £2,000,000 now. This is not a small item. I will not trouble the House by going through the principal articles affected by the Treaty—such as the reduction of the wine duties in favour of French wines, which created great jealousy on the part of the Spanish and Portuguese Governments. The number of articles upon which Customs duties had been levied, and which were thus either abolished or reduced, was very large; these articles were chiefly the produce of France. That this should have been the case was the ordinary condition of Commercial Treaties between two countries; but the extraordinary condition of this Treaty is that this House bound itself to the Government of France not to impose or reimpose, during the period of the Treaty, these duties upon the produce of any country in the world. This extraordinary provision has, by the operation of this Treaty, been made fundamental as regards other Treaties—the foundation of engagements unspecified in other Treaties—and for the benefit of other countries. The direct engagement on the part of this country under this Treaty is with France only. The benefit which we receive in return for this abandonment of the power of taxation is reciprocated by France only, whilst the rest of the world gets the uncompensated benefit of our concession. Under this Treaty we can claim nothing from Germany, nothing from the United States, nothing from Austria, nothing from Belgium, or from Russia. The commerce of each of these States profits by this Treaty at the expense of this country. Such are the provisions which the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day (Mr. Gladstone) declared to be consistent with the object of the Treaty; but they are provisions which I wish the House fully to understand before it commits itself to a renewal of this extraordinary engagement. I trust the House will allow me to verify what I have said by quoting the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In his Financial Statement of the 10th of February, 1860, he said—

Mr. Newdegate

"I come next, Sir, to the English covenants. England engages, with a limited power of exception, which we propose to exercise with respect only to two or three articles, to abolish immediately and totally all duties upon all manufactured goods. There will be a sweep, clean, entire, and absolute, of manufactured goods from the face of the British tariff."
—[3 Hansard, clvi. 834.]

The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

"France is perfectly aware that our legislation makes no distinction between one nation and another, and that what we enact for her we shall at the same time enact for all the world."
—[Ibid. 837.]

I have said that I have had reason to remember the effects of this Treaty. Among the duties which were immediately abolished under its provisions were the duties on silk manufactures, and these included the duty of 15 per cent upon ribands, the article chiefly manufactured in Coventry at that time, and in a district extending from Coventry 10 miles northwards, including the town of Nuneaton, and several other populous manufacturing places. Mr. Disraeli and the Conservative Party in this House were kind enough to assist me in the endeavour to prevent the abolition of this duty from being immediate; but the Government were inexorable. The abolition of the duty was immediate. Parliament broke up, and in the month of September following I found myself the chairman of a relief committee in my own neighbourhood, with 22,000 persons to provide for beyond those who could obtain relief under the Poor Law. This state of things was, in great measure, produced by the suddenness with which this Treaty came into operation—an operation as sudden as the negotiations for the completion of the Treaty were rapid. Her Majesty the Queen, with her usual benevolence, subscribed for the relief of the distressed work-people. The Prince of Wales also subscribed, as did the right hon. Gentleman the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, who himself had forced on the Treaty. I was employed for three winters in distributing some £47,000 to relieve the distress which had been occasioned by the operation of that Treaty among my constituents. But the effects of the Treaty were not restricted to my constituents. I remember that there were in Manchester eight firms of broad silk manufacturers, who petitioned in favour of the Treaty and the abolition of the Customs duties. I have a copy of their Petition now. Every single firm whose representative signed that Petition has since failed, and in my own district this branch of industry has been reduced to one-third or one-fourth of what the trade was in 1860. I believe not more than one-fourth of what it was then remains. We were told that we were behind the time, and our produce was inferior to that of France; but I have the satisfaction of knowing that at the first Exhibition of Paris the riband, which won the first prize from all the French ribands, was manufactured within four miles of my house in Warwickshire. I think I have some reason, then, to remember what has been the operation of this French Treaty; and I am most anxious that this House should thus early, after we have received the intimation that the continuation or renewal of this Treaty is contemplated, remind Her Majesty's Ministers that without the consent of this House—and I trust that the consent of the House will not be given without due consideration—it is impossible either to renew, to alter, or to continue this Treaty with France, or to negotiate any other. Allow me, for the information of those hon. Members of the House who have not had the advantage or misfortune of being here so many years as myself, to show that this House must be a party to, and responsible for, any Commercial Treaty that is contracted. We have nothing directly to do with negotiations for a Treaty, any more than we have the power of proposing taxation. The negotiation of a Commercial Treaty, like the negotiation of every other Treaty, is a function of the Executive Government, just as the proposal of every tax is delegated to them—that is their duty and privilege; but the sanctioning of a Commercial Treaty is just as much the function of this House as is the consent which we are appointed to give or withhold from the proposals of the Government for taxation. In this very Treaty, the 5th Article, a very important one, begins in these words—

“Her Britannic Majesty engages to recommend to Parliament to enable her to abolish the duties of importation on the following articles,” &c., &c.

The 5th Article begins—

“Her Britannic Majesty engages also to propose to Parliament that the duties on the importation of French wines be at once reduced.”

And the 7th Article begins—

“Her Britannic Majesty promises to recommend to Parliament to admit into the United Kingdom merchandise imported from France at a rate of duty equal to the Excise duty,” &c.

This House, then, is responsible for every Commercial Treaty. It is the function of this House to sanction or reject every Commercial Treaty. This power is identical, which the House possesses, either to accept or reject the proposal of the Government for the imposition of taxes. It is perfectly true that this House ought not to directly interfere with the negotiations of a Commercial Treaty. I know that it was the general feeling that, until he was duly authorized and appointed, the late Mr. Cobden outstepped his duty as a Member of Parliament by the part he took in the year 1860. What he did was no doubt prompted by an excess of zeal; but if he erred in the first instance, his error was subsequently condoned, and more than condoned, by his being appointed the Representative of this country for the purpose of carrying on the negotiations. All the more, however, is it the duty of this House to avoid, if possible, the difficulty which might be entailed by the House feeling itself unable to sanction the provisions of any Treaty which may have been negotiated. I know that this feeling weighed very heavily upon some Members of the Conservative Party in 1860. The circumstances of Europe at that time were somewhat critical. It was thought by some a very great advantage to this country that we should be on good terms with the Emperor of the French, and I know positively that this circumstance weighed very deeply with some Members of this House, who otherwise might have been anxious to press some modification of the obligations which this country undertook by that Treaty. It is for this reason, Sir, I now invite an expression of opinion on the part of this House with regard to this important subject. As this Treaty must expire on the 31st of December next, I ask this House now to consider, I ask the commercial public now to consider, whether there are any provisions in that Treaty which, in their opinion, need alteration; and if that be their opinion, now is the time that they should approach Her Majesty's Government with their suggestions. Now is the time, and the only time, when, conveniently and safely, the commercial experience and opinion of the country can be brought to bear with a view to the future. I hope the House will forgive me for thus bringing under its notice the position in which we are placed. In the year 1860 the feeling was in favour of the system of free imports, to which, for nearly 20 years, this country has been bound to a great extent by this Treaty—bound to the system of free imports from the whole world, whilst the expectation of Reciprocity is by this Treaty limited to our commerce with France only. For nearly 20 years, then, we have been fettered by this Treaty. In 1860 the expectation was rife that the great commercial countries of the world, that Europe and the United States would reciprocate the abandonment of import duties which this country had then adopted, and of their own accord freely follow our example in this respect. Sir, there is no such expectation now. Russia shows no sign of an intention to relax her high tariff. Some persons speak of Russia as if her Government were ignorant on this subject. But Russia reduced her import duties, with a view to the adoption of Free Trade, as far back as the year 1815. She tried the system for five or six years, but found it to be so ruinous that she abandoned it in 1821, and never after renewed it. Again, in 1816, the United States largely reduced their import duties; but they, too, found the system so ruinous that they raised their duties in 1828, and have ever since, though not so steadily as Russia, refused to abandon their Customs duties. With reference to this commercial legislation and these commercial engagements, it behoves the House to consider the political temper of the world. The tendency of the world, I need hardly say, is now in the direction of Imperialism. You have the German Empire established, the Austria-Hungarian Empire consolidated, and the Empire of Russia extended. France has not abandoned an Imperial policy in matters commercial because she is a Republic; and there is no commercial policy more Imperial than the commercial policy of the United States of America. What are the United States but a Federation of Sovereign States? The Republic, which combines these Sovereign States, by this Federal Union is essentially Imperial. Look at her financial policy, her Imperial power, and her central combining Republican Government, the seat of which is at Washington, yet the Central Government cannot impose direct taxation except in time of war. The imposition of direct taxation is the privilege of each Sovereign State, and they guard that privilege against the Federal power with the utmost jealousy. In times of peace the only financial resource of the Federal power of America is taxation by Customs duties. That distinguished man, General Grant, ex-President of the United States, visited Birmingham last autumn; and, on that occasion, the able junior Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) made an eloquent speech—such as, indeed, he usually makes—in the expectation that he would receive from the ex-President some encouragement to hope that the United States would abandon their protective system. And what said General Grant? He said that he had not been accustomed to make political speeches until he came to England; but he could assure the hon. Gentleman who had been so eloquent, and whom he had found hospitable as a host, that the example of England had been firmly impressed upon her descendants in the United States; that they had seen England's commercial greatness and power grow up under a protective system of Customs duties; that the people of the United States would follow the example of the people of England, and that when their commercial prosperity and power became as great as that of England had been, perhaps they might adopt the system of free imports. You will always find an Imperial system of government disposed to levy taxation by means of Customs duties on imports, just for the same reasons as that which induced the framers of the Constitution of the United States of America to prescribe that system. You may, in the face of this Imperialistic movement throughout the world, call this retrogressive policy, or what you like; but it has become, none the less, but the more, a duty incumbent upon Her Majesty's Government to consider this matter most carefully and thoughtfully before they again commit themselves to the system of free imports in favour of all the world, by a renewal of this Treaty, under which they have Reciprocity from one State only—France. Apart from the question of commercial gain—whatever the House may think of the economical disadvantages of Customs duties—there is no doubt that taxation by Customs duties is the form of taxation most easily levied throughout a wide Empire—in the distant portions of a scattered Empire. That is a consideration which at once recommends it to the Minister of an Empire. I have heard great surprise expressed that Prince Bismarck has recommended a high Customs tariff for the German Empire. When I heard that that most estimable of Sovereigns, the Emperor of Germany, had been twice assailed, and at last wounded, I felt grieved. Have we not heard of Nihilism, and of the revolutionary and discontented spirit prevailing in Germany and in Russia? May it not have occurred to Prince Bismarck that, if he needed fresh taxation, it would be well if, by the form of taxation he should recommend, he might revive the filial feeling of the German people towards their Emperor, to whom they had looked up as to a father? Was it not wise on the part of Prince Bismarck to sacrifice some economical advantage, if by the establishment of a system of taxation that, without extreme pressure, would favour the feeling of filial devotion in the nation towards their Emperor as the Chief of a paternal Government, while it would furnish the means of cementing the Empire he had so successfully laboured to erect? I venture, then, to move the words that stand in my name; and I do so in the hope that the Government will take the same broad view that they took in 1787, and give the House an assurance that they will not imitate the Government of Lord Palmerston, and deny to us, and thus deny to the country, full opportunity of considering the provisions of any Treaty which they may renew or propose. So that, before the House of Commons is asked, as it must be asked, to give its sanction to any new or renewed Commercial Treaty, we shall each and all of us be assured that we shall have time to consult our constituents. If any engagement is to be entered into between this country and France, I hope it will be with France alone, leaving this country at liberty to negotiate with the other Powers; not compromising our position towards the whole world through France, but negotiating with France, for herself only, so as to secure Reciprocity with France, whilst our hands shall remain free to seek Reciprocity from the other nations of the world. I hope that any future Commercial Treaty will be in the sense of Mr. Pitt's Treaty of 1787—that the Conservative Ministry of the present day will follow the example of that great Conservative statesman, by affording ample opportunity for consideration and inquiry, before they propose that this House should commit itself to any scheme they may have in hand.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will not recognize or accept as binding any Treaty or other engagements entered into by Her Majesty's Ministers which might forestall or limit the control of this House over the financial resources and taxation of this Country, until full information as to such contemplated engagements has been laid upon the Table of this House, and this House shall have had the opportunity of expressing an opinion thereon,"—(Mr. Newdegate),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, that he had listened to the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down with much interest, as he had given them a new idea of the intention of protective duties, for it appeared that those duties were levied in Russia to protect the life of the Emperor. The hon. Member was enthusiastic in favour of his old scheme. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had lately read in a newspaper that there were only three great statesmen now living who believed in Protection—namely, Prince Bismarck, Lord Bate-man, and Mr. Mac Iver. But it was plain that a fourth might be added to these in the person of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. Now, looking at his Amendment, he must say that it was well worthy the consideration of the House, though he might say that he was rather doubtful about the grammar—he thought it was bad, but it was good sense; and he was very glad that the hon. Member had had the courage, sitting on the Ministerial side of the House, to move an Amendment to the Budget of his own Chancellor of the Exchequer, because, although they had two nights' debate on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), the subject had not been thoroughly thrashed out even on that occasion. He had himself intended to propose an Amendment at a subsequent stage of the Budget proceedings; but his noble Friend on the front Opposition Bench got up and asked him, as a matter of convenience, not to move it then, and he had acceded to his request, though at the time he thought he was rather pooh-poohed by his noble Friend. In fact, his Amendment was rather too good for the noble Lord. However, he thanked the hon. Gentleman opposite for giving him the present opportunity of expressing his views on the Budget. No policy could be carried out without involving more or less expenditure, and that was the meaning of the expression of the Prime Minister; but the expenditure depended upon policy. He presumed that the reason why his hon. Friend had brought forward this Amendment was because his hon. Friend felt as he felt—that on many important occasions the policy which the Government were going to adopt had been unduly kept back from the House. The House had been kept far too long in the dark concerning it. The hon. Gentleman, in his Amendment, advocated the desirability of not "Recognizing or accepting as binding any Treaty or other engagements entered into by Her Majesty's Ministers which might forestall or limit the control of this House over the financial resources and taxation of this Country, until full information as to such contemplated engagements has been laid upon the Table of this House."

Well, their opinion on the great lines of policy had been very often ignored and their power limited, but eventually they had the bill to pay. When anybody talked of late about the foreign policy of the Government, they were told—"It's no use talking about it; let bygones be bygones." If the policy of the Government were abandoned, there would be something in that advice; but they found that the Government intended to proceed on exactly the same line on which they had formerly proceeded. At a late Conservative dinner, Lord Salisbury said the Government, for the sake of peace, had given up a great deal, but they could give up no more. It was the foreign policy of the Government—a policy which they seemed resolved to persevere in—which entailed the enormous military expenditure, and that expenditure was the heaviest burthen of the enormous Revenue which had to be raised. He need not dwell upon the details of the Budget; it was a Budget which might be summed up in the sentence in which the moralist advised the young man—"Always live within your income, even if you have to borrow money to do it with." It was the old story—the Liberals came in and earned money; the Conservatives came in and spent it. The Liberals were the drudges of politics, who earned the money; the Conservatives were the Gentlemen who succeeded them, and spent it. ["Question."] Well, he thought the question was the Budget. ["No, no!"] When all this money had been borrowed to carry out the policy of the Government, he was rather surprised at the course taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite, who condemned the proposed remission of the Income Tax by the late Prime Minister in 1874. The First Lord of the Admiralty said we had not a ship or a man too many. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) thoroughly agreed with that statement. If they were to carry out the policy the Government intended should be carried out, in his humble opinion, they had far too few men, because they were told that the Government were resolved to do its duty to the world. If this little Island were to do its duty to the world in the sense of the Government, three times the money asked for at present would be required for that purpose. He wished Ministers, who regarded it as their duty to be interfering in every part of Europe, would bear in mind the speech in which their Colleague, Lord Cranbrook, had asked what divine right this country had to go crusading in every part of the world? The present was not the right time to call upon the country to raise an enormous sum of money. There were, of course, two opinions about the depression now existing in the country. One was the opinion held on the other side of the House, that it arose from four bad harvests, one hard frost, and the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank. The other was the opinion prevalent on this side of the House, that, although those causes had something to do with it, the commercial depression had been greatly aggravated by the enormous expenditure which had been imposed, and by the feeling of insecurity which the foreign policy of the Government had created. ["Question."] He knew that hon. Members on the opposite side of the House did not wish him to go at any great length into this matter. He had heard right hon. Gentlemen on the front Ministerial Bench declare that theirs was a policy of Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform. He need not say more with respect to their policy of peace, than that they had already two wars in hand, and any number on the stocks. As to retrenchment, the country was now called upon to raise a larger Revenue than it had ever previously been required to furnish; and as to the reforms effected by the present Administration, the less said the better. He had said that England was engaged in two wars; but they had heard that night that one of those wars had been brought to a conclusion. [Cheers.] He heard the cheers of hon. Members on the opposite Benches who rejoiced that peace had been made; but he condemned the war in spite of the success that had attended it, for he could see nothing to be delighted at in the fortunate issue of a policy of triumphant wrong. What the cost of the war in Africa would be no one knew, and why was it carried on? He supposed it was to retrieve what was called the military situation. In other words, revenge, because they had been defeated in one battle. He altogether condemned the spending of money for such a purpose. He, therefore, gave his hearty support to the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, not because he thought that Commercial Treaties were the only Treaties which should be brought under the review of the House, but because that Amendment struck at the neglect of the opinion and sentiment of the House; and because he felt that if the views embodied in the Amendment were carried out, it would be more difficult in future to involve the country in those ruinous enterprises which had done so much to bring discredit upon them, and which, if not prevented in the future, would involve them in still greater disasters and distress.

MR. MAC IVER said, it was much to be regretted that the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle should, in seconding the very important Amendment introduced by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, have favoured the House with a speech that must have been prepared for some other occasion, and sought to divert attention from the real point at issue. What had the speech of the hon. Baronet, save a little at the commencement and conclusion, to do with the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill? The renewal or abandonment of our commercial relations with France, however, had a great deal to do with it. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) should depart this life, his epitaph might be—"Estimable in all relations of private life, he gave us sour claret cheap, and ruined the weavers of Coventry." [Murmurs.] The motto of the Cobden Club was—"Free Trade, Peace, Goodwill amongst Nations"—good intentions enough, no doubt; but they had all heard of the way that was paved with good intentions. Well, the word "reciprocity" was a very much abused word; but he ventured to think that even Mr. Cobden never meant that the people of this country should fight the battle of Free Trade single-handed against the world. Where, except in England, he asked, could they find any statesman who seriously advocated unqualified Free Trade? The good intentions of the Cobden Club were not sufficient; and he thought that, without Reciprocity in some form, true Free Trade could not exist. They must be permitted to sell as well as to buy. All barriers between one nation and another should be broken down, and there should be the most unrestricted interchange of commodities between the nations of the world. That was the kind of Free Trade which he wished to see, and he was not the only man in England who wished to see it. It was not Free Trade at all unless they could sell with advantage as they bought, and they were not so enabled under the Commercial Treaty with France; they were not so under their commercial relations generally with the rest of the world. Why did the French people meet us so hardly in the case of sugar, for instance? Was it not the belief that we in this country were steadfastly and firmly wedded at all hazard to the principles of Free Trade, and that we should never modify them? He asked that we should look at the circumstances of each case by themselves; that we should be Free Traders as far as it was practicable, but that we should be Protectionists where it was our interest to be so. That was something very different from advocating Free Trade at all hazards. He would only trespass for a very few moments more upon the attention of the House; but he wished to make one quotation which many hon. Gentlemen opposite might have seen or heard of for the first time. It was from a book called Smith's Wealth of Nations—

"It must sometimes be a matter of deliberation how far it is proper to continue the free importation of certain foreign goods, when some foreign nations restrain by high duties the importation of some of our manufactures in their country. This case naturally dictates retaliation, and that we should impose the like duties upon some or all of their manufactures coming into our country."

Such was the opinion of Adam Smith, and he commended it to the study of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Reciprocity, in his (Mr. Mac Iver's) view, meant, as in any good dictionary it was defined to mean, "equal mutual rights or benefits to be yielded or enjoyed." Reciprocity involved the great principle of fair trade as well as Free Trade; that we should encourage the mutual interchange of commodities. The commercial relations existing between this country and France did not meet his idea of Free Trade. What did they get from, and what did they give to, France? From the Board of Trade Returns he found that they imported to the value of about £45,000,000 of goods of one kind or another from France, and that they sent to France in exchange £25,000,000, of which only £14,000,000 worth could be said to be manufactured goods, the residue consisting of raw material. M. Michel Chevalier well stated French policy on this subject, in writing to the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce two years ago, when he said—

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

"We collect Customs duties to protect the manufacturing interest, and the surtaxe d'entrepôt was for the protection of the shipping interests of France, by making it impossible for foreign nations to compete with her shippers for the conveying of a large part of her imports."

He was glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) in his place, because he wished to tell him that, as regarded our commercial relations with France, he knew nothing whatever about the most important points affecting the shipping interests of the country. He wished to explain to the right hon. Gentleman and to the House that the surtaxe d'entrepôt, no matter what the theory might be, was, owing to our geographical position, practically a differential duty against Great Britain. England was the only country from which foreign produce was likely to be re-exported to France, and this was a special tax of about 30 francs a-ton against such shipments. They heard a great deal, but he must say chiefly for election purposes, about what the Opposition would like to do. Let him point out what they had done. The French Treaty was unquestionably very much their work. He charged against the right hon. Member for Birmingham and his Friends that in this Treaty they reduced the duties on the luxuries of the rich; but they did nothing whatever that could in any way benefit the working man in England. ["Oh!"] Was that not true? Would the right hon. Member for Birmingham contradict it? They had done some things, no doubt. They interfered with sugar refining in Great Britain, and the ruin followed, not only of the sugar refiners of England, but of the sugar-growing Colonies, on whom the policy re-acted. We were a nation of producers; the consumers were the drones; but he knew, as a carrier, that he was now taking to French and Italian ports cotton which, under other circumstances, would come to this country. This showed that other nations were now making for themselves what we used to make for them, and they were enabled to do this by their restrictive duties, which we could never induce them to abandon unless we had something to give them in return. The silks and woollens we got from France could, in many instances, be made better and just about as cheaply in England, very little, indeed, would turn the scale. The extra cost of home-made goods— $\frac{1}{2}d.$ or $\frac{3}{4}d.$ a-yard—would be an inappreciable tax on the consumer. Hon. Members did not know whether their coats were made in France or England. [Laughter.] The loss to the English manufacturer was real indeed. He was at a disadvantage as compared with the more extended range of customers of the French manufacturer, for he must find his only market at home—he was shut out of our own Colonies as well as France. This Commercial Treaty with France was a thoroughly bad bargain, and he desired to see a new one more advantageous to British interests. Let hon. Members remember that John Stuart Mill had written—

"A country cannot be expected to renounce the power of taxing foreigners, unless foreigners will in return practise towards itself the same forbearance. The only mode in which a country can save itself from being a loser by the revenue duties imposed by other countries on its commodities is to impose corresponding revenue duties on theirs."

Hon. Members opposite could hardly get over that. The day was gone by when mere abuse would be considered a sufficient reply.

MR. PEASE thought that the House would agree with him that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was very much to be congratulated that evening, as a diversion had been made in his favour. They had come down to hear the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, and they had had a discussion upon Free Trade. With regard to the arguments which had just been used, he was sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to dispose of them in a very few sentences. His great object in rising was not to discuss the Protectionist measures of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, or the remarkable speech of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver), but to make a few remarks upon the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, on introducing the Bill, had stated that they should all feel that the demand this year upon the National Exchequer was unusually great. He thought it was generally agreed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was asking for a very considerable sum of money. He was not about to find fault with the Government on the manner of defining payments which they proposed and to which he objected; but he thought that the policy which was being pursued cost the country a great deal of money, and would cause much further expenditure. It behoved them to look at what the state of the country really was at the present time, when they were indulging in a foreign policy which would require a large expenditure. If there was any trade or description of industry which required protection at the present moment, it must be agriculture. But would any hon. Member be bold enough to come down to the House to ask that corn and meat, or any of those articles the cheapness of which had done so much to vindicate the policy of the country, should have Protectionist duties placed upon them? And what was the state of the industries of the country? The manufacturing districts of the North, especially on the western side of the country, were at the present moment almost paralyzed. The iron and coal trades were in a very depressed condition. Whether they looked to the commercial, the agricultural, or the manufacturing interests of the country, they found them all in the same state. And when the Chancellor of the Exchequer came to the House and asked for an abnormal amount of taxation—5*d.* in the pound Income Tax—and no remission whatever of taxation, it became a very serious matter. The House might know by the state of the Poor Law Returns what the condition of the country must have been during the last two years. The figures of those Returns, showing the percentage of paupers, spoke for themselves; and in that state of things the Government ought to use every possible effort to stop the enormous expenditure going on abroad and at home. They had an extravagant war in South Africa, and it seemed to him that they had a Governor there who had violated every instruction sent to him, and who had acted in direct opposition to all the directions as to policy which he had received from the Home Government, and at that moment was plunging them into a war which was a disgrace to their Christianity and civilization. The war was condemned by Her Majesty's Government, and would cost them no less than from £5,000,000 to £10,000,000. Whilst things were in that state abroad, they might look for some check upon the expenditure at home. He had gone pretty carefully through the various items in the Estimates. There were various charges for education, for the police, and for grants which were made in aid of local taxation, and in almost every Department of the State the expenditure was increased. With regard to education, it seemed to him that the noble Lord the present President of the Board of Trade (Viscount Sandon) made a very considerable mistake in allowing the additional grants from the Government in aid of local taxation as regarded education. He would call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to a paragraph in the Report of last year, in which it was said that the demand for educational purposes from the Imperial resources would become still greater. By the Education Act they had again placed local hands in the Imperial pocket; and they had also done the same thing by giving an opportunity of borrowing for purposes neither national or Imperial. He believed that these facilities for obtaining money for education, for sanitary, and other purposes, was producing a very considerable waste. It was very easy to borrow; but it was very difficult to repay. He had not the slightest doubt in his own mind that if local taxation had been more resorted to for purely local purposes, they would have had the Imperial Exchequer not only left alone, but the local taxation considerably lower than at the present moment. He made these remarks because he felt that this country, if it were going again to be prosperous, must adopt the rules by which it had become prosperous, must practise economy at the present moment. Economy had to be exercised by all classes of the people, and ought also to be exercised by the Government, both in regard to their foreign and home policy. A reduction of expenditure seemed to him to be the only means of restoring that prosperity, the absence of which they so much deplored.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD was not going to follow the discussion into all the questions that had been raised, for he did not think that the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill was necessarily connected with the last Commercial Treaty with France. He wished to make a few remarks upon a portion of this Bill—namely, its provisions with regard to Income Tax. The incidence of the Income Tax was, as the House knew, of a very harsh character; and he understood it was the desire of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to mitigate the hardship inflicted upon persons who were made collectors of Income Tax against their will. If his object in introducing the 23rd clause into the Bill were only to meet the objection raised by the hon. Member for Plymouth with regard to the forced collection of the tax, he would not move the rejection of the clause; but he should move a provision to except the City of London from its operation. There was another matter upon which he begged to give Notice that he should propose in Committee a clause which should require all the collectors of Income Tax and of Inhabited House Duty to give a statement to the taxpayer of the demands made upon him. He should propose that the statement should contain the assessed value of the property, its nature, and the rate at which it was charged. At the present moment the collector of local rates gave a most perfect statement, showing the nature of all the rates levied, and the value at which the property was taken. It was indefensible that a collector should be allowed to demand the Queen's taxes without furnishing a similar document. He would offer no objection to the second reading of the Bill, and trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not object to the Proviso which he wished to introduce.

MR. BOURKE: It may be convenient that I should now say something on the subject of the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire; and I am sure that, if necessary, the House will afterwards listen to any observations which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer may wish to make. There is one observation made by the hon. Gentleman with which I agree, and that is, if the House is really to take notice of the Commercial Treaties which are likely to be negotiated within the next few months or years, now is the time to speak out. The Government will be happy to hear, not only what Members of this House, but what persons versed in commercial matters throughout the country, may have to say upon the subject. I think it would be well for the House to reflect upon the character of Commercial Treaties generally. If the House will allow me, I will state in a few words my own opinion with respect to them. There are two kinds of Commercial Treaties—one which contains the "most favoured nation clause," and the other, which is a general tariff Treaty. For many years past, foreign nations have made two kinds of tariffs—first, a general tariff, relating to all nations; and, secondly, a conventional tariff, which covers the importation of goods from countries with which they have Treaties or Conventions. Unless a nation has made a Treaty containing a "most favoured nation clause" with those countries, it will be treated under the general tariff, and not the Convention tariff. Then, with regard to tariff Treaties, England has but one—the Treaty of 1860—of which we have heard so much to-night. That Treaty, as we all know, was passed in consequence of the desire shown by France, in 1860, to relax her Protectionist policy. But after that Treaty had been concluded with France, others were made with Holland, Belgium, and other nations, all framed on the model of the Anglo-French Treaty. The consequence which immediately followed was a general lowering of tariffs all over Europe. The advantage derived therefrom by this country was not merely the advantage it derived from the increase of its commercial intercourse with France, but the advantages derived also from these other Treaties with other nations, from all of which we received the most-favoured nation treatment. In measuring, then, the advantages which we obtained by the Treaty of 1860, we must not only consider the advantages we gained by the lowering of the tariffs in France, but we must also take into consideration the advantages derived by our export trade all over the Continent under most favoured nation Treaties which we have with all European Powers except Spain. I do not think it is necessary for me to expatiate on the advantages which this country gained by that Treaty, because a very few figures will show the enormous increase in our trade since 1860; and statistics will speak far more eloquently than I can do on this subject. I will take three periods—the year 1859, before the Treaty was negotiated, and the years 1866 and 1877, after it. The value of the goods exported from the United Kingdom to all parts of the world in 1859 was £130,000,000; in 1866 it was £188,000,000; and in 1877 it was £199,000,000. Next, taking the particular tariff countries—Belgium, France, Germany, Holland, and Italy, we exported to them, in 1859, £26,000,000; in 1866, £45,000,000; and in 1877, £47,000,000. Contrast that with the trade to the three non-Treaty countries—Russia, Spain, and Portugal. In 1859, our exports to them were £7,119,000; in 1866—five years after the Treaties with these other countries—it was £7,258,000, or very nearly stationary; and in 1877, £6,190,000. That shows the enormous difference between the Treaty and the non-Treaty countries. In the non-Treaty countries we have an almost stationary condition of trade; while in the tariff Treaty countries we have, as I have shown, a very large increase. Next, let me give a few figures of the imports into the United Kingdom. In 1858-9-60, the imports into the United Kingdom from France averaged, in round numbers, £16,000,000. For the three years—1875-7—they were £45,000,000, an increase of nearly 200 per cent. The exports of domestic produce from this country to France in the years 1858-60 averaged about £5,000,000. In 1875-77 they averaged more than £15,000,000, an increase of 300 per cent. I think these figures are the best answer I can give with regard to the success of these Treaties. There can be no doubt that things are in a very unsatisfactory state in foreign countries, for it is quite clear that Protectionist theories are making progress in many nations. I cannot feel, for one moment, that that is any reason for retracing our steps; and, on the contrary, I believe that the great Free Trade theories are growing stronger and more powerful every day in this country. I do not know whether it is the result of universal suffrage or not; but I am rather inclined to think that universal suffrage does at first tend to Protection, and until the voice of the consumer makes itself heard, I think it is very likely we shall see a continuance of those theories. But what would be the position of England if the Treaty with France were to lapse? We should have to submit to about 20 per cent higher duties being imposed on our exports all round, for we should simply be put under the new general tariff, which, though it did not promise to be so objectionable as the existing one, would certainly be far less favourable to our traders than the existing Convention Treaty. There are other topics raised by the hon. Member, such as shipping, into which I need not go; but there can be no doubt of one thing—that Commercial Treaties do insure what commercial men, above all things, require, even above low duties, and that is certainty. Under the Treaties, commercial men are able to make their contracts and their orders in advance, which is what is to them absolutely necessary. I know, from interviews I have had with various gentlemen every day, that there are persons who are at this moment suffering from the present uncertainty about the French Commercial Treaty, because they do not know what the French tariff will be six months hence. As I have already said before, the negotiations with respect to the new Treaty are going on; but the French Government, as is very natural from its point of view, says that it is impossible for it to enter into any negotiations with regard to a special tariff until they have settled what their general tariff is to be. That general tariff is now before the Legislature; and I am afraid it will be some time before its discussion is concluded. The arrangement which they have offered—and which I certainly think we shall accept—is that the present Convention shall continue for six months after the promulgation of their general tariff. That is the arrangement which has been proposed to us, and which we shall probably concur in. When the arrangements for the general tariff are concluded, we shall thus have six months after that for negotiation; and I do not think that these legislative changes in France will take place very rapidly, so that this country will have plenty of time to look round. With regard to two or three observations which were made by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), I would say, in the first place, that it is no duty of mine here to-night to defend the exact procedure followed in the Treaty of 1860. It may very well be that it would have been better to have given a longer time before all the Budget arrangements were made. But, then, that Treaty was made by Mr. Cobden taking advantage of the particular disposition of the Emperor of France just at that time, and he was anxious to get the Treaty concluded as speedily as possible. Considering the enormous amount of detail gone through, I do not think the negotiations took a very long time. Perhaps it would have been better to have proceeded by Resolution, as was done in the case of Mr. Pitt's Treaty of 1787, and that, undoubtedly, would have given the House a greater opportunity of discussing the details. But that is not a matter before us now. There is no reason why the House should ever abandon the functions it possesses of considering Commercial Treaties; but that, again, is a very different thing from binding the House in the way proposed by this Resolution. Parliament, in fact, has already practically full control whenever any Customs duty is proposed to be altered, so that in all tariff Treaties the House has full control. Considering what the Forms of this House are, I do not think it is ever very likely that any Commercial Treaty would be carried without the House having many opportunities of giving an opinion on the subject generally.

Mr. Bourke

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: The House had the figures before them in that very Treaty.

MR. BOURKE: No doubt; and, certainly, in 1860, there were many divisions, both in this House and, I think, in the House of Lords. Certainly, there were many long debates in both Houses. I can quite understand that it is possible that a Treaty can be made which it would not be formally necessary to bring before this House; but I do not think there is any danger of that occurring in a way to preclude Parliament from giving its opinion. Another objection to my hon. Friend's Resolution is that it would be perfectly impossible for this House to negotiate the details of any Treaty. Anybody who knows what it is to negotiate a Treaty, even on one particular article, knows what it is, and how awkward, how perfectly impossible, it is for this House to negotiate any one particular portion. Much less, of course, could that be possible in regard to the whole tariff. It is, of course, all very well to lay down the rule that you can make a better Treaty here in this House than you can by negotiations outside.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I expressly guarded myself against that assumption. I especially said that that was not our function.

MR. BOURKE: I am very glad to be corrected by my hon. Friend. It is not what we think a good Treaty that has to be aimed at. You have to aim at something which both sides will think a good Treaty, and to attain that there must be give and take. This House cannot, in fact, enter into all the intricacies of these negotiations; and if it did, it would strike a deep blow at Ministerial responsibility. That is a principle which we should strive at every point to maintain. But this Motion takes it away from Ministers, both in regard to negotiating a Treaty, and in regard to the way in which it is to be carried out. Under these circumstances, I am afraid Her Majesty's Government cannot agree with this Resolution. At the same time, I agree most thoroughly with my hon. Friend that this question is very well worth consideration; and now that new Treaties are likely to be made with foreign Powers, I think the more that this question is considered, in and out of the House, the better.

MR. NEWDEGATE confessed that he did not quite understand the answer which the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had given him; for he had certainly never said that it was the function of the House of Commons to negotiate a Treaty. As the existing state of the negotiations, it appeared, from what the hon. Gentleman said, were in suspense, until the tariff of France had been formulated, it was, therefore, perfectly in vain to ask for further information. With the permission of the House, he would for the present withdraw his Motion, upon the understanding that any Treaty that might be negotiated would be submitted to the House in accordance with Constitutional precedent.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

VALUATION OF LANDS AND ASSESSMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 144.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, he strongly objected to the progress of this Bill, for, as he read it, its principles were entirely opposed to those rules of valuation now in force in England.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. WATSON) replied that the matter was very easily explained. Section 37 of the Poor Law Act of 1845 provided for a particular mode of valuation and assessment. In 1854, the Valuation Act for Scotland was passed, and that had since been amended by several Statutes, which provided a general mode of valuation, on which all local taxes other than poor rates were now levied in Scotland. But certain Railway and other Companies assessed under the Act of 1845 were in the habit of disputing the valuation of their undertakings for the purposes of the poor rate, and the result had been to lead to much litigation and expense. The only object of the Bill was to do away with this exceptional legislative enactment, which had proved most expensive and detrimental, and to allow these properties to be assessed on the same basis as all others. Whether it was necessary to amend the present Valuation Act was another question, into which he would not now enter. His only object was to remove the expense and anomaly at present created by the difference between the two Acts.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, in England properties were first assessed on their actual rent, or annual value, and subsequently, according to their nature, were subjected to certain deductions, so as to bring out the actual rateable value. In Scotland, although the same principle had been enacted by the Legislature, it had never been carried out with the same care and precision as in England. The last Report on this subject recommended that the system pursued in Scotland should be assimilated to the system pursued in England. Of course, he was aware that it would save money and trouble not to carry out the English system; but it was the only scientific means by which they could arrive at the true rateable value; and unless the Government really proposed to have one system in Scotland and another in England, he could not understand how they could expect this Bill to pass. After hearing the explanation of the Lord Advocate, he was more than ever convinced that the Bill was an undesirable one, and, therefore, he would move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. J. G. Hubbard.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. WATSON) said, that in every county and in every borough in Scotland there was an annual valuation roll made out, according to the terms of which all taxes were to be levied, and the electoral roll was made up. That was found to be a safe and speedy and cheap form of obtaining the valuation upon which taxes should be levied. But there was one single exception to that system—the poor rate was not levied upon that valuation. The Poor Law Boards throughout Scotland, who were intrusted with the compilation of the roll for the purposes of the poor rate, had found that Railway Companies had caused them a great deal of trouble and expense, and they were most anxious to adopt the ordinary valuation roll as the basis of assessment for the poor rate. If the general system were to be altered, that must be done by an amendment of the Act of 1854. By opposing the present Bill, the right hon. Member for the City of London insisted upon the Parochial Boards being involved in litigation and expense, instead of taking the course which they wished to pursue. In 1870 a Select Committee of that House reported in favour of that which was now proposed to be done by this Bill—namely, that the anomaly should be abolished between two different valuations existing together for the purpose of taxation. There was no question raised here except whether the anomaly that now existed should continue in force, and whether there should be a separate valuation for a single local rate which was the occasion of difficulty and expense to the ratepayer.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, that last year several deputations came up from Parochial Boards in Scotland, and they assured many of the Scotch Members that this clause to which the learned Lord Advocate had referred was the subject of a great many conflicts with the Railway Companies in Scotland, and that they were very anxious that this Bill should pass. As there was great unanimity in this matter, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, that this was a most important matter. The principle of these deductions was well established. It was recognized that there should be a deduction of 5 per cent from the gross annual rental in the case of land; whereas in the case of houses they were subject to 20 per cent deduction. If this system were abolished, house property would suffer to the extent of 15 per cent. If the deduction were allowed to be abolished in Scotland, it would be said that, in justice and common sense, the same rule must be applied to valuation in England. If the Lord Advocate would insert the 37th clause of the Act of 1854, he would not object to the Bill; for he quite admitted that railways and canals were of an exceptional character, and required exceptional treatment. He objected to any treatment of houses and canals different to the system which was being pursued in the Valuation Bill for England now before the House. He could see no reason why they should pass in the same Session two Bills—one regulating the valuation of land and houses in England, and subjecting them to the deductions of from 5 to 20 per cent in order to arrive at their rateable value, while in Scotland the same thing should not be done.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY observed, that in Scotland they desired to get rid of the anomaly of the local rates being levied on two different valuations, as it was found to be a great practical inconvenience. It was to remove that anomaly—in the desirability of which all parties were agreed—that the present Bill was introduced.

MR. FORTESCUE HARRISON remarked, that all Scotch Members were agreed as to the desirability of this Bill becoming law.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. WATSON) said, that the Scottish people were very amenable to reason in questions of taxation, and he did not think there was any desire on their part to bear an undue share of burdens. But for several years past the Parochial Boards and the ratepayers throughout the country had experienced great difficulty and inconvenience from having a separate basis of assessment for the poor rate; and they had come to the conclusion that it cost them a good deal more out of pocket to keep up the two valuation rolls than it would to put the poor rate upon the same footing as their other local taxes.

MR. PAGET wished to take an opportunity of saying that he did not consider that, because a Bill was brought in for Scotland affirming a certain principle, it at all followed that the same principle was to be introduced into England. He liked Scotch Members to settle their own affairs in their own way; in England, they had always worked on a different system, and they considered that they had done so with good reason. In rating houses and land, they had held that if they were to rate them upon the gross value an injustice would be committed. House property, it was felt, required deductions from the gross rental, which did not apply in the case of land. And in the Bill now before the House for the valuation of land in England was laid down a scale which made a considerable difference between the deductions in the case of lands and the deductions in the case of houses. He thought it was right that when the English Bill came on for discussion Scotch Members would do them the justice to allow them to manage their business in their own manner.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, this was a question affecting the increase of taxation in Scotland, and if the principle of the Bill now before the Committee were adopted the same arguments would be applied to England. If Scotland was to be dealt with absolutely separate from England, and was not to be taken as a precedent, he should have nothing to say; but he saw now, plainly, that in giving their sanction to this arrangement they were permitting an argument to be raised against themselves for the application of the same principle to England. It would be said that "what you have done for Scotland you cannot say is wrong in England, and you must collect your Queen's taxes upon the gross annual value, instead of upon the rateable net value upon which they ought to be levied." For these reasons, he should press his Amendment, unless the Government postponed the consideration of the Bill until the English Valuation Bill was brought on.

Motion negatived.

Clauses 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Repeal of s. 37 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 83, and s. 3 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 80).

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, that this clause was one in which a proper equitable provision ought to be inserted. There was no doubt that assessments ought to be made upon the rateable value, and that proper deductions ought to be made in accordance with a scale. It was the laziness of the Scotch which prevented their adopting the scale recommended by Parliamentary Committees. He, therefore, begged to propose that it be inserted in that part of the Bill.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 8, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 9 (Amendment of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 20).

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY moved, in page 3, line 26, to leave out from "if," inclusive, to end of clause.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER moved, in page 3, after Clause 8, to insert the following clause:—

(As to ascertaining the annual value of mines and minerals.)

"The yearly rent or value of all mines and minerals and of the works connected therewith shall be ascertained in manner following (that is to say): all surface and underground works, shafts and adits, engines, machinery, plant, tramways, private railways, canals, and railway sidings connecting such mines with any railway or canal constructed or maintained under the authority of any Act of Parliament, or with any public river by which such minerals are conveyed, or with any works at which such minerals are manufactured; and all land and buildings (not being dwelling-houses or workshops) occupied in connection with and for the purposes of such mines and minerals, shall be regarded as part of such mines and minerals and included in the valuation thereof, and the yearly rent or value of such mines and minerals including as aforesaid shall be calculated in each year at the rate of _____ per cent. of the lordship paid for the quantity of minerals gotten from such mines in the immediately preceding year, or (where such minerals are not let) of the fair letting value thereof in the same parish."

He said that railways were increasing, whereas mines were always decreasing in value. For that reason, he proposed the insertion of this clause; and he proposed to insert 25 per cent of the lordship paid for the minerals as the criterion of the yearly rent. The clause was in accordance with the principle which had been adopted with regard to railways, and evidence was given before the Select Committee on the Valuation of Lands and Assessments Bill of 1870, which made out a stronger case for relieving mines than railways.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. WATSON) said, that he could not accept this clause, which would make an entire change in the system of rating. In the case of railways they were compelled to resort to a very artificial system of valuation, for they were obliged to value them in a very special manner, because they were situate in a great many parishes. So they had resorted to the system of taking the railways as a whole; and, after making proper deductions for the expenses of working, they had assessed the annual value of the railway, and then they divided the amount so found amongst the different parishes through which the railways ran according to mileage. That, no doubt, was an artificial system; but they had been compelled to adopt it for want of a better. He did not think there was any reason for adopting the same principle with regard to mines; for, if they did, in all similar cases—such as iron-works and other descriptions of property—artificial systems would have to be adopted which would make wholesale changes upon the Act. Railways were rated exceptionally under Clause 37 of the Act of 1854.

Amendment negatived.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

GREAT SEAL BILL [Lords].—[BILL 180.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Mr. J. G. Hubbard

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that he should like to know something about the Bill, inasmuch as it contained certain clauses in red ink, indicating an addition to the National Expenditure. He could not understand the meaning of the 5th clause of the Bill, in which it was stated—

“Whereas by the Great Seal (Offices) Act, 1874, all duties and powers required to be performed by or vested in the purse-bearer to the Lord Chancellor (including the duties of chaff wax, sealer, and deputy sealer) are required to be performed by and vested in the Gentleman of the Chamber attending the Great Seal and it is expedient to amend the said enactment: Be it therefore enacted as follows:—

The said duties and powers, so far as they relate to passing documents under the Great Seal, shall, as the Lord Chancellor from time to time by order directs, be performed by and vested in the Gentleman of the Chamber attending the Great Seal, or in the officer performing the duties of Messenger to the Great Seal.”

That, so far as he could see, made no particular difference in the state of things that now existed; only the next paragraph, which was in red ink, enabled this Gentleman of the Chamber to receive an additional salary for doing the duties he had already to perform. A few years ago, they had endeavoured to get rid of the expenditure upon some of these useless offices. Amongst the offices which had disappeared, he was happy to say was that of a lady, who was called “the embroideress,” and who enjoyed a considerable salary. The Bill spoke of a gentleman called the “chaff wax, the sealer, and the deputy sealer.” But he had already been appointed, and received a salary of £400 a-year, with an additional £100 for discharging the duties of purse-bearer. But, by the clause in red ink, the Lord Chancellor was to be allowed to give him such additional salary or remuneration as he pleased. Thus the public were to be called upon to pay an additional salary to the officer performing the duty of messenger to the Great Seal, who had already £400 a-year, and an additional £100 for discharging the duties of chaff wax and messenger to the Great Seal. Thus a provision was made for increasing such sums, and the Secretary to the Treasury was responsible for a Bill accumulating salaries upon the chaff wax, sealer, and deputy sealer, and officers, whom the public knew nothing at all about. It seemed to him that it was nothing more than a job. Everyone, who knew anything about the matter, knew the persons who received these salaries were those who had held confidential posts in the household of the Lord Chancellor at former periods; and the object of the Bill was to enable the Lord Chancellor to give them such sums as might appear right to him. He should certainly oppose this Bill, until he knew something more about it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, that his hon. and learned Friend seemed to think that this Bill was intended to increase the Expenditure of the country; that was not the case, for one great object of the Bill was to abolish an office that had hitherto been occupied at considerable expenditure. A short time ago, there was an officer who was called “Clerk to the Attorney and Solicitor Generals. All patents, upon passing under the Great Seal, were prepared by the Clerk to the Attorney and Solicitor Generals, and for doing this he was paid by fees. The duties which that officer was called upon to perform were not very onerous, and by no means complicated; but these warrants for the passing of letters patent being very much alike, their preparation did not involve any great amount of trouble—the trouble, if trouble there was, devolving upon the Attorney and Solicitor Generals. This officer was in existence at the time his hon. and learned Friend occupied the post of Law Officer, although he did not seem to be acquainted with him, possibly because he was so occupied in the Office he filled that he had not become thoroughly acquainted with all under him. The occupier of that office had recently died; and it had been thought right to abolish the office altogether, with the consent of the Attorney General and the Solicitor General, and to confer the duties of the office upon the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, who, according to this Bill, was not to get any additional remuneration for performing those duties. In other respects, the duties of the office would be performed as hitherto; and if any warrant for the passing of letters patent was required to be prepared, it would be sent to the Law Officers of the Crown to be settled by them. With reference to the other officer to which his hon. and learned Friend had directed attention—the office of purse-bearer, including the duties of the chaff wax, sealer, and deputy sealer—there was, in fact, no chaff wax, sealer, or deputy sealer. The duties of the office were to be transferred to officers to be nominated by the Lord Chancellor, in accordance with the Great Seal (Offices) Act, 1874; and, in order to carry out the provisions of that Act, this clause had been inserted in the Bill, by which all the duties and powers to be performed and vested in the purse-bearer to the Lord Chancellor, including the duties of the chaff wax, sealer, and deputy sealer, were to be performed by the Gentleman of the Chamber attending the Great Seal, or upon the officer performing the duties of messenger to the Great Seal. The object of that was to diminish the expense of these offices. The officers mentioned, as would be seen by referring to the Great Seal Act of 1874, had already certain duties to perform; and he would find that that Act provided that the additional duties in question were to be performed by gentlemen nominated by the Lord Chancellor. They were to be paid out of the money provided by Parliament, and the officers so performing the duties were to receive such additional salary as the Treasury, on the recommendation of the Lord Chancellor, should see fit and proper to allow. It was only right, when extra offices were thrown upon an officer, who had at present a great many duties to perform, that some slight increase to his salary should be made. For that reason, it had been thought right to insert the present provision in the Bill, enabling the slight increase to be made, on the recommendation of the Lord Chancellor to the Treasury, and the Treasury would then grant it. The hon. and learned Gentleman might be quite sure that no additional salary would be allowed by the Treasury, unless it were absolutely necessary.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

INDIAN MARINE BILL.—[BILL 182.]

(Mr. Edward Stanhope, Mr. John G. Talbot.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Edward Stanhope.)

The Attorney General

MR. WHITWELL said, that no explanation had been given the House with regard to this Bill. So far as he could see, the Bill proposed to give the Governor General powers similar to those in the Mutiny Act, and for a certain branch of the Service, called the Indian Marine Service, including a great many persons, some of whom might be considered ordinary labourers. Power was given to inflict exemplary and speedy punishments, and some of the punishments were very heavy, and some were of a very light character. The Bill gave the Governor General power to authorize these laws to be put in force before receiving instructions from England; but they were to be repealed, if disallowed. With the exception of death, nearly all the punishments might be inflicted upon a British subject born in England. The Bill also gave power, under these laws, to punish by death Natives of India. Powers to inflict penal servitude upon British subjects, with the sanction of the Government at home, were also given. Therefore, he thought that this Bill was one of the most serious character, and that it should not be read a second time at that hour. He should move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned." (Mr. Whitwell.)

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that the Bill was of a very simple character indeed. It contained powers exactly similar to those which had been in force a great many years, by which the Government of India was empowered to make regulations with regard to persons serving in the Marine Service. The Indian Navy was abolished; but it had been subsequently found, after very careful inquiry, that it would be necessary for India to have under its own control a few vessels for local purposes. For that reason, the Government of India had authorized a small Marine Service; but they had no power, as the matter stood, to enforce any discipline in the Service. For that reason, they proposed to give to the Governor General, by this Bill, power to regulate the Service. There was nothing peculiar in the Bill, and any regulations made under it were not to be enforced if the Secretary of State disallowed them. That was all it was necessary to say upon the subject; the hon. Gentleman, therefore, would see that the Bill was of a simple character.

MR. BARING inquired whether the powers were given to the Governor General, or to the Governor General in Council, to make regulations under the Act?

MR. E STANHOPE observed, that the phrase used of the Governor General in Council was the one always made use of in Acts of Parliament.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT was surprised that this Bill should be taken so late at night. It was not the annual Mutiny Bill for India—that had been repealed. This was a new Bill, and he did not think that it should be taken at that time.

MR. ONSLOW thought that some further information should be furnished by the Under Secretary of State for India with regard to the state of this Marine. The Indian Marine was abolished some years ago, on the understanding that Her Majesty's Navy should undertake all its then duties, and the Indian Government agreed to pay about £70,000 a-year towards the expenses of the Navy. Now, it seemed that the Indian Marine was to be established on its old footing; and it appeared that many of the duties which ought, in his opinion, to be performed by Her Majesty's Navy were to be thrown upon the Indian Marine. He thought that they should be told the reason for this expenditure, and the necessity for an Indian Marine co-existent with Her Majesty's Navy in Indian waters. If this Bill were to be extended to a great extent, he thought it would be in the interests of the Indian Exchequer that it should be opposed.

MR. DILLWYN thought that such a Bill as this should be taken in a full House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER consented to the adjournment of the debate.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

TERMS OF REMOVAL (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. MONTGOMERIE, Bill to provide for uniform Terms of Removal from lands and houses in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MONTGOMERIE, Sir WILLIAM CUNINGHAM, Mr. MACKINTOSH, and Sir WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 189.]

COSTS TAXATION (HOUSE OF COMMONS)

BILL.

On Motion of Mr. RAIKES, Bill to amend "The House of Commons Costs Taxation Act, 1847," ordered to be brought in by Mr. RAIKES and Mr. MOWBRAY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 190.]

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 20th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Tenant Right (Ireland) (35), negatived.

Committee—Report—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, Amendment * (78); Omnibus Regulation * (41-87).

Third Reading—Local Government Provisional Orders (Ashton-under-Lyne, &c.) * (79), and passed.

INDIA—DISTURBANCES IN BOMBAY.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I wish to put a Question to the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India, of which I have given him private Notice, on a subject of great importance, mention of which has again been made in the newspapers this morning. For some days past, very strange reports have appeared in the newspapers of grave disturbances which have taken place in the Presidency of Bombay, in the Deccan, and of incendiary fires near Poonah; and, in the papers of yesterday, there was a more detailed account. It was reported that the magistrate's court, and other public buildings, had been fired, that large bands of armed Dacoits were marauding the country, and great loss of property has ensued. Lastly—which is a very remarkable circumstance—a manifesto is said to have been put out by some of these bands, in which there are not only statements made as to the great distress of the country, the severe pressure of taxes on the people, but a reward of 1,000 rupees is placed on the head of the Governor, Sir Richard Temple, unless he complies with their demands. The state of things is no doubt serious. It is impossible to say quite what it means, and what causes have produced it—whether these are merely armed bands, or bands acting in concert and sympathy with the population; but I believe that it is almost unprecedented in Indian history in our day that such a manifesto should be issued threatening the life of the Governor of one of the British Provinces. I shall be glad to hear from my noble Friend, Whether or not these statements are correct, and whether he can throw any light upon the subject?

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: There can be no doubt that great distress prevails in the Deccan; and I have, in private letters, received accounts of that distress. It is also true that within some weeks past, to a certain extent, the Dacoits have committed numerous robberies and other outrages; but I have no knowledge of the particular transactions reported in the newspapers within the last few days—though I think them not unlikely, inasmuch as it has been reported that bands of Dacoits have been traversing the Provinces and committing outrages to a certain extent. Seeing such detailed accounts in the newspapers, I telegraphed this morning to the Governor of Bombay asking for information; but I have not as yet received a reply. The latest accounts which I received by last mail conveyed the intelligence that although bands of Dacoits had been traversing the country, the Deccan was quieter, and that things seemed to be settling down.

TENANT RIGHT (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Earl of Belmore.)

(NO. 35.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he desired to explain what the Bill proposed to do, and endeavour to remove some misapprehensions which existed with regard to it, and then he would explain some two or three Amendments which he desired to introduce into it in Committee, if the Bill should reach that stage. The noble Viscount sitting near him (Viscount Lifford) had given Notice of his intention to move the rejection of the Bill. That, he thought,

The Earl of Carnarvon was much to be regretted; but as he believed this step was founded on certain misapprehensions, he would now endeavour to remove them. The Bill, if amended in accordance with his views, would be practically the same as that introduced by Mr. Mulholland, the Member for Downpatrick, in the other House some time ago, but which did not reach this House. The Bill, so amended, would not work any alteration in the present state of the law affecting land in Ireland. It would simply be a declaratory Bill, intended to clear up a point which caused a considerable amount of useless and vexatious litigation in Ireland. At the time when the Land Act of 1870 was passed, the Government considered that in legalizing the usages of the Province of Ulster, they were not only legalizing tenant right in the case of tenants from year to year, but also in the case of tenants holding by lease. But after the Land Act became law, it was questioned whether this was so, and more than one decision was given in opposition to the views of the Government. He himself believed that those views were correct—an opinion in which he was fortified by the expressions of the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack, and of the noble and learned Lord the then Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Lord O'Hagan); and since the Bill had been laid on the Table of the House, one of the Judges of Assizes in Ireland had given judgment in a case in the same direction as that to which the Bill pointed. The Amendments which he wished to introduce into the Bill were of two kinds. There were certain words in the Bill which, if they were allowed to remain unqualified, would extend the operation of the measure beyond the Province of Ulster. The words to which he referred were not within the scope of the Preamble of the Bill, which expressly pointed out that the Bill was intended to apply in the case of the usages of Ulster. He proposed, therefore, that all such words in the 2nd section of the Bill as would extend the operation of the measure beyond the Province of Ulster, as well as the words "or other usages analogous thereto," to be found further on, should be struck out of the Bill. He had no desire to legislate in the dark for the other Provinces, and it would only lead to confusion to introduce this custom in places where it did not previously exist. His next Amendment was of a different character. The 2nd clause of the Bill ran at present as follows:—

"In the case of any claim under the 1st section of the principal Act in respect of a holding which, if it had been held from year to year, would have been subject to the usages known as the Ulster tenant-right, the persons entitled to sustain such claim shall be entitled to do so, notwithstanding that the said holding may be held under a lease that shall have expired."

To these words he proposed to add the following:—

"Unless the landlord shall give satisfactory proof that it has not been the custom on the holding, or on the estate of which such holding forms a part, to allow the benefit of the said custom or usages at the expiration of such lease or leases."

